The Week.

MR. JOHNSON has at last found what he imagines to be a snug and safe harbor for his "policy." The Supreme Court has come to his aid, and has already declared military commissions illegal—thus putting an end to military interference with the action of the local authorities at the South—and it is fully believed will take strongly conservative ground in several cases now before it. Mr. Phillips's mode of meeting this difficulty is to impeach Mr. Johnson, and in some way, which we do not well understand, get at the court, and remodel it so as to make it a help and not a hindrance to radical policy. We have discussed the matter elsewhere. But in the meantime Mr. Johnson is easier in his mind than he has been for many months.

THE ocean yacht race has been won by the Henrietta, and Mr. James Gordon Bennett, Jr., who certainly, as the only one of the owners who yachted as well as raced, by being on board his own craft, richly deserves his success. The passage made by the winning yacht—thirteen days and twenty-three hours—is, we believe, the shortest ever made by a sailing-vessel, and few incidents of sea voyaging, if we except the late race of English tea clippers from China, have been more remarkable than the shortness of the interval between the arrival of the three yachts. The yachtsmen have been received with open arms by their brothers in England. The New York Herald draws from the race a moral favorable to the settlement of the Alabama question.

SUMMARIES of Mr. David A. Wells's report on the Tariff are finding their way into the newspapers, and from them it appears that he takes very much the same ground as Mr. George Walker in his recent letter, namely, that relief for the troubles from which manufacturers are now suffering is to be found not in higher duties, but in the reform of the currency and the lowering of the internal revenue taxes. In other words, he thinks the true remedy for our present ills is to increase the purchasing power of the community, while an increase of duties would only cause a general rise of prices, leaving everybody just as he is at present, and leaving manufacturers just the same arguments for more protection that they use now. There is a point at which protective duties, on any theory about them, cease to be a tonic, and become simply an unhealthy stimulant. You give the patient a dram to stiffen him up against the foreigners; its effects pass, and he feels weaker than before, and calls for another, and so he goes on, his craving increasing as his strength and endurance decline.

A SHARP and very interesting letter in the New York Evening Post last week, in reply to some harsh strictures of that journal on the management of the great New England mills, contains a good deal of novel information about these establishments. The most important fact revealed by it is, that the workers are now nearly all foreigners, the native Americans having gone into higher and lighter occupations, and that their "manners and customs" are, therefore, very perceptibly lower than those of their predecessors. As might have been expected, the French Canadians are the best cooks, and have the most varied bills of fare in their boarding-houses. Mr. Atkinson comments with deserved severity on the ridiculous practice now so common, both among protectionists and free-traders, of associating particular opinions on the tariff with moral depravity. Some of the best and purest men and deepest thinkers in the world are free-traders, and have reached, through deductions both from the principles of human nature and from the facts of history, the conclusion that free trade is the best thing for all the nations of the earth, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of civilizers and enrichers, and, nevertheless, it is the fashion with the Tribune and a certain set in Congress to treat all free-traders as "scoundrels," "knaves," "cheats," designing fellows, and if Americans they are denounced as hired with "British gold." In like manner, some of the free-trade organs insist upon it that all attempts to raise the tariff are the result of a deep-laid scheme on the part of manufacturers to live on the public and escape hard work and competition, and grind the faces of the poor. It would, however, be impossible to show that there is one whit more selfishness at the bottom of protectionist arguments than at the bottom of free-trade ones. Of the millions in this country who believe in protection, only an infinitesimal fraction have any direct interest in keeping out foreign products. But in the months of December, January, and February, the debates in the newspapers on this point are apt to be more amusing than instructive.

THE letter-carriers of New York are out for the fourth time with their annual poetical address to the public, printed in a neat little pamphlet, which contains besides the verses a good deal of information on almost all points relating to the mail service in this city. We find, for instance, that, during the first nine months of 1866, the total number of letters from abroad delivered by carriers in this city was 7,683,222, and of city letters the number was 2,926,507. To this total of 10,609,729 letters must be added 1,008,778 of newspapers. For the same time, between January 1 and September 30, there were collected from the lamp-post boxes 9,609,646 letters, a much larger number than one would have expected. It may be ungracious to say so, but we do not find among the puns in Col. A. J. H. Duganne's freely given appeal any specially strong reason why the carrier, more than other respectable people with a light employment, should have his customary claim to a pecuniary remembrancer allowed.

THERE has been another beautiful shipwreck—this time in the Sound. The ship was the Commodore, a splendid old boat, which the first heavy gale of wind smashed, disabled, and sent adrift. The crew were a highly disciplined body of men, who got gloriously drunk on the approach of danger. The captain and pilot were, however, kind enough to remain "cool," and after tossing about for some hours, in a snow-storm, the boat went ashore, on a convenient beach, and the passengers were landed, with their life-preservers carefully and neatly buckled on. Nothing more symmetrical and well arranged has been exhibited on the stage. One of the passengers, Mr. Duncan, of Philadelphia, examined some of the hog-frames of the ship after the wreck, and found them thoroughly rotten. This circumstance is of some value, as it saves much wearisome discussion on the cause of the accident.

THE Washington correspondent of the Tribune declares that the President "is said to have conferred with the judges of the Supreme Court in regard to the position assumed by Congress towards the Southern States." Statements of what "is said" are of little value unless we know who "said it." It is very unlikely that President Johnson knows anything more about the way in which the Supreme Court is likely to decide on any of the great questions of the day than anybody else. The judges may not be "sound" on the reconstruction question, but most of them, at least, still retain a strong sense of judicial propriety, and find better occupation than talking over their decisions with Mr. Johnson.

THE Excise Law, which Judge Cardozo succeeded in practically abolishing for some months, having gone up to the Court of Appeals, has of course been declared constitutional, and will now be strictly enforced by the police. What effect it may have on the minds of the Legislature, that the Republican majority last fall was decidedly diminished by the prohibition of Sunday lager-bier to the Germans, it is too soon to say. That consideration will, perhaps, be of force when others would not; but it is certain that, unless the Legislature shall modify the law, residents in the metropolitan district will have quiet Sundays, and residents of neighboring towns within easy reach will suffer from a weekly invasion of the roughs of New York and Brooklyn. In any event, Judge Cardozo's remarkable theory that a license was a contract has been exploded.

THE colored people of Philadelphia offer their fellow-citizens this winter a lecture course, which it is safe to say is surpassed by no other in the country in point of ability and respectability. Nor is this the first season they have put to shame the prejudice which still insists on their exclusion from the street-cars, and the bench which, as only the other day, refuses to punish those indecent assaults which one may look for in vain even in the city of New Orleans, in its public conveyances. It is an unfortunate satire on this unchristian proscription, that Philadelphia stands quite alone in compelling its city cars to suspend running on Sunday. The churches, we know, are strong enough to oppose the popular demand for Sunday cars. Are they also responsible for the prevailing spirit of caste, which is certainly not more at war with our notions of democracy than with the religion which they profess?

WE suppose the School Committee of Boston, Dr. Ordway, Rev. Dr. Lothrop, and the rest, are not afraid of being charged with want of delicacy, or, indeed, of being considered as dreadful brutes by a number of their constituents. But they seem to us to have settled, for the time at least, the question of corporal punishment in schools, which has long vexed the Bostonian mind, in a very sensible way. "The use of corporal punishment," says the Mayor, "has been abridged, and though it could not be entirely abolished without giving up that idea of force which must lie behind all authority of government, yet more attention has been given to less repulsive modes of discipline." The teachers of primary and grammar schools under the new rule, are not to be allowed to whip girls, except when whipping is deemed necessary by the supervising master of the district. What the less repulsive modes of punishment are to be we are not informed, nor to whom the new modes are to be less repulsive.

THE recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Indiana cases, discharging persons condemned to death by military courts during the war, is likely to have, in some ways, serious consequences. Dr. Mudd, who is now enjoying himself in the Dry Tortugas, has already been moved by it into applying for a habeas corpus, but the application being made before Chief-Justice Chase, who dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court in the recent case, has been denied.

WE will make any necessary retractation if news of another Slievegammon comes before 1867 is forty-eight hours old, but meantime we feel pretty safe in pronouncing Mr. James Stephens the most impudent of all the famous blatterers and swindlers who have ever crossed the water to ply their vocation on American soil. Thousands and thousands of dollars, we suppose, he has stolen from poor women who really need new calicoes to their backs and whole shoes to their feet; he has inflamed the hearts of thousands of deluded men by speeches that he must have known while he was uttering them were tissues of absurdities and falsehoods, and he has done all that in him lay to disgrace the people he belongs to and to put off the day of such deliverance as they need. We hope sincerely that the cable may bring us, "before the beginning of another year," news of his capture by the British Government, for he is either a rogue on whom sympathy would be wasted, or he is so remarkably good an imitation of one that respect for honesty ought to lead to his imprisonment as much as if he were a confessed criminal. But we suppose that he has really no defence of himself to offer and is what he seems. Meantime, in default of any open outbreak, we have thrilling accounts from the special correspondent of the Herald of secret machinations and complots. Stephens's agents, "working from the river Liffey, have undermined Dublin to a very great extent," and will soon blow up the whole city. The scheme formerly adopted by an Irish conspirator would have been less laborious, and would, no doubt, have toppled down as many domes of the oppressor as Stephens's mine; we refer to the device of boring a hole in a London gas-pipe and touching off the jet of gas, the result being a sudden illumination by which the borer's arrest was secured, but no explosion. Further, we are told that "the revolutionists propose to blow up the castle and kill or carry off the Lord Lieutenant."

GOVERNOR ORR has recently sent word to Brigadier-General Scott that the negroes in the neighborhood of Kingstree, South Carolina, have been forming military organizations, and has demanded that a stop should be put to their proceedings. General Scott, who, we believe, is not a Northern radical, unless, indeed, a residence of some months in South Carolina has made him one, sent up a commission, who reported that the negroes had done nothing of the kind charged against them, and seemed to have no disposition to do so; but that they had met together to consider whether they had better emigrate to Florida or stay in a district where the landholders had agreed to pay no more than six dollars a month to laborers. There has been a good deal said, some of it truly, about the manufacture by Northern men, by means of false reports, of opinion hostile to the South. This correspondence is a sample of the way in which Southern men continually manufacture opinion hostile to the negro, and, in the South, lying against the negro not seldom means neither more nor less than murder. Several negroes, we make no doubt, will be killed and others maimed in South Carolina in consequence of this accusation; for the governor will be held to have told the truth and the Bureau officers to have made wilfully a false report; and every South Carolinian will feel sure of two things, that no nigger has a right to a gun, and that niggers are getting so "sassy" that they must be kept under somehow—which means shooting on small provocation. Meantime, Rhett's paper, the Charleston Mercury, welcomes the New Year with the old chant, "A furore Normanorum libera nos, O Domine!"

THEY have been having a sensation trial in Chicago. A woman named Cosgriff murdered her paramour in a liquor saloon. The victim was a gambler, and very rich. The woman was found guilty of manslaughter only, and got off with a year's imprisonment. The remarkable part of the proceeding was the address of the prisoner's counsel, who completely outshone Mr. Rogers of New Jersey. In his opening he made the following declaration: "I knew George Trussell [the murdered man] well. As I shall one day stand with him in judgment before the God that made us both, I will say that there were many things about him that I liked. His smile was fascinating, his powers wonderful. They were fatal to the unfortunate prisoner." The jury, of course, could not stand this kind of thing very long, and having heard of Trussell's "smile" and "the many things about him" that Mr. Asay "liked," nearly let the woman off.

The news of the week from England is meagre and unimportant. It seems to be proposed by the leaders of the reform movement to make up for the shortcomings, in point of numbers, of the last demonstration, by preparing one still more imposing for the opening of Parliament in February, and to line the streets leading to Westminster Hall with great, and, it may be, threatening crowds of would-be electors. Perhaps the most remarkable incident of the agitation is the confession of "Blackwood's Magazine," the Tory organ par excellence, that if reform is to be supported by physical intimidation, Lord Derby had better bring in a reform bill at once. That he will bring one in, though doubtless very unwillingly, seems probable. Disraeli is said to insist upon it, and the Conservatives, little as they like him, cannot do without him. Should they fairly commit themselves to an extension of the suffrage, the sole point of difference between them and the Liberals would be in the length to which each party was willing to go. All other distinctions have long ago disappeared, and this one fairly established and recognized, of course the end would be certain and not distant. There is no defensible line between ten-pound suffrage and manhood suffrage on which either party can take its stand. All restrictions short of this are purely arbitrary, and can have no basis but the views of expediency held by a privileged minority. That Mr. Lowe thinks a man whose house is rated at five pounds a year better fitted to vote than a man who lives in lodgings, is of course no argument.

The diets of the various Austrian provinces continue to attack the Government savagely, but Von Beust, the new minister, seems to be a man of sense, and is going steadily on, apparently trying to establish constitutional government over the whole empire. We say "apparently," because there is nothing more uncertain than Austrian policy. One of the curious signs of the times is the call of the Viennese city council for the banishment of the Jesuits.

The French scheme of military organization, the only thing now talked of, still hangs fire. The Emperor seems to hesitate before public opinion; but if the plan fails he cannot maintain his position in any future complications with Prussia, and everybody expects complication of some kind before long. A great military disaster following the blunders of the last two years would be fatal to the dynasty.

There appears to be little question that the Pope will remain at Rome. The liberation of Venetia, the disappearance of foreign troops from Italian soil, and the smallness of the area which now constitutes "the patrimony of St. Peter," appear to have disarmed the national hostility to the Papacy. The Roman national committee have announced that peace is to be maintained, and the ultimate disposition of the Eternal City left to negotiation, so there has been no symptom of disorder since the French left. Moreover, the Italians want to keep the Pope. They may not consider him useful, but he is highly ornamental, and, even if he were nothing but a relic of the olden time, they would like to preserve him like any venerable ruin or work of art. A pamphlet has appeared, supposed to be either written by Ricasoli or "inspired" by him, which points to a peaceful solution of the whole difficulty, and the Pope, it is said, agrees to receive an Italian envoy. His Holiness, also, as we said last week, does not want to go. Poor Admiral Persano is to be brought to trial for misbehavior at the battle of Lissa. The fault has been clearly shown not to have been his, but the public demand a victim, and the Government is doubtless not sorry to furnish one. Parliament has a terrible job before it in filling up the deficit in the treasury, but with peace established and the kingdom consolidated, no great trouble on this score is apprehended.

THE FREEDMEN.

The grand jury of Calvert Co., Md., have indicted a colored man, named John Lox, for harboring his own children. It appears that in 1865 it was sought, through the Orphans' Court, to get these children apprenticed from their father, who, however, satisfied the court of his ability to support them. On the strength of a former property in John's wife, Dr. James Duke shortly made a second attempt, which succeeded, in spite of the renewed protestation of the father. Lox then appealed to the Criminal Court of Baltimore, and Judge Bond ordered the children delivered to him. Upon this the suit first mentioned was based. Numerous cases like this have occurred in the same vicinity, and the conflict of authorities is very distressing. Indeed, Gen. C. H. Howard reports that it is estimated "there are six hundred cases of unjust apprenticing in Calvert, and almost as many in Anne Arundel."

—That mediæval legislation (the phrase is true in spirit if not as to the point of time) which we remarked in the Carolinas a short time since, is constantly obtruding itself. A few days ago, Colonel Bomford interfered to prevent the sheriff of Raleigh from flogging a negro, whereupon Judge D. D. Fowle ("a Daniel come to judgment") ordered the indictment of all the military officers concerned in the rescue, and called upon the governor to carry out the laws of the State. On the 21st December two negroes were hung for highway robbery, as whites would have been in a similar case.

—Mr. Wilson's bill instructing the President to prohibit corporal punishment in the States lately in rebellion, though ostensibly in the interest of the freedmen chiefly, is really of the highest beneficence to the whites, upon whom their own barbarity towards others has (as the universal law is) rebounded. That the President needs instruction is evident from his suspending the order of Gen. Sickles, which forbade the use of the lash in his department.

—The "Storrs School" is the name of a house just erected for the education and religious instruction of the freedmen in Atlanta, Ga. It cost $6,000, and is very complete in all its appointments. The society of the Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Cincinnati, were the chief contributors towards its erection.

—In Maryland, Virginia, and Kentucky, the Civil Rights act is practically annulled by the decision of the State courts denying its constitutionality. In Tennessee, General Grant's order is defied or evaded. It is absurd to call that society "restored" or "republican" in which, if the judge be right, the sheriff and the constable or the jury will probably be wrong, and all are commonly united in refusing to execute equal and exact justice between blacks and whites; while if, by a miracle, arrest, conviction, and just sentence overtakes the white offender, the governor himself, or perhaps the President, makes haste to pardon him.

—General Ord reports the same old story from Arkansas, under date of December 19, 1866. In the remoter districts the life and rights of the freedman are at the mercy of brutal whites and indifferent courts. In the cotton districts the laborers are kindly treated, and schools are desired and encouraged. On the poor lands the farmers who have been disappointed in their crops avoid paying their dues to their hands by driving them away with violence.

—Five thousand freedmen have been removed from the District of Columbia during the year, and still some 26,000 remain. The demand for help from the North is greater than the willing supply.

—The freedmen of Louisiana have 144 schools (40 private), and support entirely the 139 teachers whom they engage. The Bureau is about to provide a building and school furniture for a colored school, to be opened by the Catholics in Carrollton, for the accommodation of 500 or 600 pupils. Bishop Wilmer, the new Episcopal bishop of Louisiana, is said to be deeply concerned for the religious instruction of the freedmen.

—General Wood reports a general improvement in the relations between employers and employed in Mississippi. The negroes are exposed to much hardship on account of the unfavorable crops, but are preparing to work vigorously during the coming year. The interest in education is growing among both whites and blacks.

LITERARY.

An international copyright law would have at least the good effect of diminishing the wrangling among American reprinters over English books. There are some two or three small firms that always republish in cheap form a popular book, such as "Griffith Gaunt," in violation of the moral rights of those who have paid the author for advanced sheets, and have first printed it. It is complained now that Messrs. Harper & Brothers have again used their great resources to endeavor to crush a minor rival. Messrs. Littell, Son & Co., of Boston, published in the "Living Age" as serials "Miss Marjoribanks," "Sir Brook Fossbrooke," and "Madonna Mary," with the expressed intention of issuing them afterwards in book form. Whether they had paid for them, we do not know, but by the courtesy of the trade they were entitled to them by priority. Just before the concluding numbers were published, the house just mentioned published the whole in book form at much less than the usual rates. Taking warning by the two earlier novels, Messrs. Littell, Son & Co. offered Messrs. Harper & Brothers their stereotype plates of "Madonna Mary" at manufacturer's prices. They preferred, however, to refuse that offer, thus depriving Messrs. Littell, Son & Co. of even that slight chance of profit.

—Not the least interesting of the recently published English books is "Notes on the Folk-Lore of the Northern Counties of England and the Borders," by William Henderson and S. Baring-Gould. Curious traditions and relics of popular superstition abound in the border-land of England and Scotland, though they are rapidly getting effaced by the influence of railways and large cities. They are almost always found to be pagan in their origin, and even those that relate to Christ and the saints and the customs of holy-days are proved by comparison with their various forms in other countries to be derived from heathen sources. There is, perhaps, a relic of the Saturnalia in the custom by which St. Stephen's Day in Cleveland is devoted to hunting and shooting, it being held that the game-laws are not in force on that day. In Devonshire the same day is selected to beat the apple-trees, in order to produce a good crop. Heathen sacrifices even existed for a very long time in Scotland. The old records of the Presbytery of Dingwall show that, down to 1678, bulls were sacrificed on August 25 at the little island of Innis Maree in Loch Maree, and milk poured on the hills as a libation. The 25th day of August is the festival of St. Malrubius, now called Mourie or Maree, the patron saint of the district. As he is often called the God Mourie, the worship paid to some Celtic divinity has probably been transferred to the saint. In the County of Moray, within the last fifteen years, during a murrain of cattle, one of them was sacrificed by being buried alive as a propitiatory offering for the rest. Mr. Baring-Gould, in the appendix, makes an interesting and useful comparison between several North-country stories and the forms which the same tales have assumed in other lands. He gives two Yorkshire editions of a story found in Germany, Italy, the Tyrol, Greece, Holland, Russia, Poland, Hungary, Sweden, Denmark, Wallachia, and even in India. This is the familiar one of the poor boy, who receives, as the reward of his labor, an ass who brayed gold out of his mouth when his ears were pulled. He loses this to an innkeeper, and then gains a table which will cover itself with food. Losing this also, he gets a stick that of its own accord will beat any one that it is commanded to, as long as the owner pleases. By this the boy recovers back his former property, and even, in the ungallant West Riding version, belabors a crowd of young ladies with their laps full of money, who wish to marry him because of his riches, and portions his own true love with the gold thus won from them. The four most different versions are those of Russia, Greece, Ireland, and Languedoc. In the Irish story the first magical instrument is a bottle, out of which spring little men, who spread a table; and the second is another bottle, out of which come men who recover the first from the cheating landlord. In Irish tales the "villain" is always a landlord. In the Russian story the peasant obtains a miraculous basket from the south-wind in payment for some flour stolen by it, and afterwards a jar out of which come five men, who first beat his shrewish wife, and then the thief—here a nobleman—who steals the basket. In the Greek form the stick knocks the wife on the head and kills her, and the story says, "so the man lives in happiness ever after." The Russian story seems a parable of the powers of nature, for the fertilizing south-wind gives the fulness of bread in return for the stolen flour—perhaps sown grain. In the Languedoc version, told by the author of "Denise," the same ultimate meaning is suggested. "Azure Blue," the lovely bird, is a symbol of the love of heaven, "which fills the earth with the music of spring while it is preparing the bounty of autumn; and the grey bird with yellow eyes," which kills the cruel tyrant, "a symbol of the deadly winter blight and famine which falls on ungrateful and covetous souls."

—In the quarrel over Mr. Martineau at University College, London, a requisition was made to the council by twenty proprietors, asking for the summoning of a special court of proprietors to consider the course taken by the council in declining to appoint the candidate recommended as best qualified. The council raised a technical legal difficulty about the requisition, referred it to the law officers of the Crown, refused, by the casting vote of the chair, to wait for their decision, and meanwhile made the appointment in question. They appointed to the chair Mr. J. Croon Robertson, a young man of promise, and an adherent of the ganglionic school of Prof. Bain, for whom it is said he has acted in the capacity of sub-professor.

—The candidates for the lord-rectorship of Aberdeen University this next year are Mr. Grote, historian, and Mr. Grant Duff. In point of scholarship and literary eminence Mr. Grote is far superior to his rival, but his recent imperious leadership of the faction in University College against Mr. Martineau will injure him with a university constituency. It is a good thing to have a lord rector in the House of Commons, and there no more accomplished man than Mr. Grant Duff can be found.

—The Augsburg Gazette (Allgemeine Zeitung) has followed the example of its rival of Cologne, and is about to issue a weekly edition, containing the principal news, correspondence, and editorials of the daily issues, and an additional feuilleton for literature and criticism. In England Miss Braddon's new magazine, "Belgravia," seems a success. In appearance and contents it is about the same as "London Society" and "Temple Bar." The "Fortnightly Review," in spite of its name, will hereafter be issued monthly. Mr. G. H. Lewes is obliged to relinquish the editorship on account of continued ill health—at least, that is the reason publicly given—and will be succeeded by Mr. John Morley. The New York fortnightly magazine, the "Galaxy," has, on the contrary, been so successful that it has been enlarged and printed in clearer type. It has a new cover, printed in colors, in place of the old chocolate and gilt one, the making of which was found to injure too much the health of the workmen.

—A new book has appeared on the old subject of the verification of dates, and not only a new book, but one that says something new, at least to most readers. We find that some of our most accepted dates are only to be received after certain explanations. We are all taught that James the First came to the throne in 1603. Yet an Englishman living in England, if writing the day of James's accession, would have dated his letter March 24, 1602. Both are correct, though at first puzzling, for from the twelfth century to the end of 1751 it was the custom in England to date all documents according to the English legal year, which began on the 25th of March. Historians usually preserve a uniform system and ignore the legal dates, but some have forgotten this, and have got themselves and their readers into great confusion about this very reign of James I. Another confusing thing is the use of the old and new styles. which is a frequent cause of error, especially as different countries adopted the Gregorian calendar at different times. M. Guizot falls into some errors of this kind in his "History of Cromwell and the English Commonwealth." All these mistakes are corrected and all these difficulties explained in the "Handy-book of Rules and Tables for Verifying Dates," by John J. Bond, Assistant Keeper of the Public Records. It contains all the valuable matter of Sir Harris Nicolas's "Chronology of History," and much that is new, being also much more correct.

JAMESON ON CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS.*

THE universal adoption of written constitutions throughout the United States, the far-reaching influence of their provisions, and the difficulty of amending them, make the process by which they are framed a matter of deep interest to every American who studies either politics or law. The rival theories as to the power of the bodies which originate constitutions—it being held by some that they are supreme, while others deny to them any powers whatever—add to the importance of the subject. The appearance of Judge Jameson's treatise is therefore to be welcomed, and is peculiarly opportune at this time, when New York is about to hold a convention to revise its constitution, and when it seems likely that many States will be soon called upon to do the same.

In preparing the volume now under our consideration, Judge Jameson has very carefully examined into the origin, organization, debates, and final action of all the conventions held in the United States since 1775. He has thus succeeded in giving an amount of information upon the subject which can be found in no other one book; and this information is, with rare exceptions, extremely accurate and trustworthy. After discussing the general principles of sovereignty and the relative merits of written and unwritten constitutions, he goes very fully into the question of the proper mode of calling conventions, whether by official action or by the spontaneous decision of the people informally expressed. The Rhode Island case of course furnishes the principal text for this discussion, and the author takes decided ground against the validity of spontaneous conventions. He maintains, however, the right of a legislature to summon a convention without express authority in the constitution of the State; though he denies the validity of a convention called in a manner forbidden by the constitution. The mode of proceeding in conventions, their powers, and the necessity of submitting their action to a vote of the people, are very fully considered; and the last chapter is devoted to the subject of amendments to constitutions, made either by legislatures or conventions.

As we have already intimated, the work bears internal evidence of having been executed with great care, and after much research. It is also very well written, in a dignified but easy style; and is very far from being dry or tedious. To a lawyer, it is almost as entertaining as light reading; and no one who cares to study the theory of our government can fail to be interested as well as instructed by it.

Of course, upon questions so difficult to determine as those which relate to constitutional conventions—questions, moreover, which rarely are or can be decided by judicial authority—it is impossible that there should not be much variety of opinion. The adoption of a constitution by the people puts an end to all practical discussion of its validity, no matter how irregularly it was prepared; while the objections made to it are renewed whenever similar questions arise again.

These questions were frequently the subject of local issues between the Whig and Democratic parties, in past years; the former party generally denying the right of the people to act outside of their written constitutions, and insisting upon the superiority of law to the popular will; and the latter party generally claiming for the people a right, by means of conventions, to override all laws and limitations of their power. Peculiar circumstances nearly reversed the attitude of the two parties in New York, when the question arose here in 1845; but as a rule, their relative position was as we have stated, especially in Massachusetts, Maryland, North Carolina, and some other States.

On this issue, Judge Jameson unequivocally adopts the conservative view; and it is here that we differ most radically from him. He holds that State conventions can be called only for the purpose of framing written constitutions, and that they can have no legislative or executive powers. But in order to reach this conclusion, he is obliged to disregard a multitude of precedents, especially in the Southern States, to rely upon the action of conventions called expressly for limited purposes, and to invent a theory concerning the division of legislative power which will not bear investigation.

The people of a State cannot be under the necessity of always acting under the restraints of a written constitution. If they choose to dispense with one altogether, they surely must be able to do so; and how can they do it except by means of a convention? No other method is known to American political law. It is admitted that a convention may change the constitution in any manner that it pleases. Can it not, then, remove all checks upon the power of the legislature, and leave it supreme? Or can it not adopt a constitution making itself the sole governing power of the State? If it can do this, surely it can do less, and may assume less powers than these. That such acts would be an abuse of power is no argument against the existence of the power itself.

The moral right of revolution is admitted by our author as fully as by any reasonable American. But should not our ideas of the common law conform to our ideas of moral right? This is a question of common or unwritten law, as must be every question lying behind a written constitution. Why should not this common law recognize a peaceful mode of transcending the restrictions of a written constitution, and thus obviate, to a great extent, the necessity of falling back upon the moral justification of a violent change? It seems to us clearly wise to encourage a resort to peaceful and orderly methods for reconstructing the government, rather than to leave no method but violence within the power of the majority.

If precedents are to be regarded as settling anything, the fact that a large majority of all the conventions thus far held have been summoned without constitutional authority should be decisive. It is true that Judge Jameson, on the authority of an observation of Judge Paige in Barto v. Himrod (8 N. Y., 483), denies that the maxim expressio unius exclusio est alterius applies to constitutions, but it is certain that that maxim is commonly so applied; and Chief-Justice Ruggles's opinion, in the same cause, turns mainly upon that principle. A decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, directly in point and applying the maxim to the constitution of that State, is also cited by Judge Jameson. The extra-judicial opinion of the Supreme Court of New York, given at the request of the legislature in 1846, adopted the same view. We agree with our author in regarding the two last opinions as practically overruled in respect to the main questions involved, but we consider them to be quite unshaken upon this particular point. That which we conceive to be settled by the action of the people and the submission of the courts is that the power of the legislature to call a convention cannot be fettered by any constitution. That this should be the law seems to us clear, upon the ground that the people cannot abnegate their own sovereignty nor tie themselves up in such manner that through no possible agency can they change the form of their government; and that such is the law seems equally clear from the precedents.

Judge Jameson has failed to deal satisfactorily with the question—just now of vast importance—as to what persons are entitled to vote at the election of a convention. His attention does not seem to have been directed to the fact that in the early days of the Republic most of the States prescribed different qualifications for the electors of different branches of the legislature, and that there was thus no body of "qualified electors" embracing all who were competent to vote for any office. In New York, for example, the electors of the governor and senate, prior to 1821, were far less numerous than those who were allowed to vote for the assembly and for local officers. If the legislature was bound to confine the right of voting for delegates to a convention to the existing electoral body, it still remains to be asked, Which of these two classes is the electoral body? If it was unconstitutional to allow all male citizens to vote, why was it not equally unconstitutional not to confine the privilege to those who could vote for senators? Is not a convention at least as important a body as a State senate?

The author's statements of fact upon this point are also slightly inaccurate. We know that he has overlooked the act calling a convention in New York in 1801, which provided for its election by a much broader suffrage than that of the existing constitution; and we think he has erred in respect to one or two other States in the same way. He concedes that delegates to the New York Convention of 1821 and the Rhode Island Convention of 1842 were voted for by a larger number of persons than were entitled to vote for members of either branch of the legislature.

The author notices briefly the clauses contained in many State constitutions, declaring the right of "the people" to change their form of government, but argues that by the "people" are meant the qualified electors. Unfortunately for this argument, the same constitutions speak in several places of the "qualified electors," and would not have failed to use the same phrase wherever they meant the same thing. We discussed this subject in THE NATION of March 8, 1866, and endeavored to show that these clauses were inserted in these constitutions for the very purpose of asserting the doctrine which Judge Jameson thinks they do not assert. An article in the "Democratic Review" for July, 1842, written by David Dudley Field, maintains the same view with great ability.

We are thus obliged to consider this treatise of Judge Jameson as framed upon an erroneous theory in respect to these two questions; and as these are really the most important of any which arise out of the subject, especially in their practical application at the present time, we fear that the political tendency of his labors will be injurious. Nor can we approve of his easy disposition of the conventions called in the Southern States in 1860–61.

* "The Constitutional Convention. By John A. Jameson." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1866.

He denies their validity entirely, on the mere ground that they were intended to destroy the Union. We know of no principle of legal or political science which will avoid the acts of a legislature, externally regular and constitutional, on account of the motives of the legislators individually. We hold the "secession conventions" to have been just as valid, up to the time of their passing ordinances of secession, as any conventions that were ever held. By that act, more than by war or overt acts of treason, they destroyed their State governments, and left their States in anarchy.

While differing thus widely from Judge Jameson upon vital points of law, we take pleasure in saying that the labor which he has bestowed upon this volume, the learning and discrimination which he has brought to its preparation, and the fairness with which he has treated those who differ from him, notwithstanding his obvious bias in favor of a particular theory, make this work one of the most valuable contributions which have been made to political or legal literature within the last few years.

"VIGNETTES."*

We would gladly do whatever it may be in the power of our good word to do towards putting a copy of these "Vignettes" into the hands of every thinking and reasoning person who reads the English language. They make up a portrait-gallery of very various women, most of them apparently more remarkable than famous, all of them directly or indirectly interesting, and some of them both mentally and morally noble.

The first of these in place, and in few respects the second, is the Russian court-lady, Madame Swetchine, lovely, learned, able, hospitable, and incessantly beneficent abroad or at home, who went from Paris to St. Petersburg to plead and win with the angry Czar the cause of her aged husband, and made a winter journey back to the poor old man, though it cost her the dangerous illness of a quarter of a year.

Next—"decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor"—comes "La Sœur Rosalie, Superior of the Maison de la Rue de l'Epée-de-Bois," who, "according to her own whimsical assertion," endeavored, "up to the age of five years, to commit as many naughtinesses as possible, in order to exhaust the list of faults and be quite good when she grew up," but at the age of fifteen knelt at her mother's feet to pray for leave to join the Sisters of Charity, and adopted, in the words of St. Vincent de Paul, "for a monastery, the house of the sick; for a cloister, the streets of the town; and instead of a convent-grate, the fear of God." "She," we are informed, "took hold, one by one, of every nature which approached her sphere, and never missed an opportunity." "She told everybody the truth, and made them ashamed of themselves, and then found some excuse for not punishing them." But her pretty traits and sayings seem to have been as innumerable as her beautiful and good works and deeds, and our readers, if they will go to her biographer for more, will be well rewarded.

Next we make the acquaintance of Madame Pape-Carpantier, the zealous teacher and counsellor of infant and normal schools, and author of poems which obtained "the silver medal of the Congrès Scientifique de France," and of works on education, three of which were "crowned by the French Academy."

Next in succession, and perhaps the first of our own favorites, is Madame de Lamartine, the gracious hostess of the ministerial salon, the ministering "Madame Dumont" of the hospitals and garrets of sick and starving Paris, the artist who modelled "the beautiful bénitier of the Church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois," and out of her motherly heart surmounted it with the images of such charming little children "that the describer doubts if the 'eau sainte que l'on prends dans ce bénitier-là, peut faire peur aux démons'"—the mistress who dressed the burns of the lightning-scathed old peasant with her own tender hands, and the admiring wife who copied for her husband, within a few days, a poem of two thousand lines, and thus preserved his own sacred manuscripts to future worshippers.

Finally, we cannot forbear to call the particular attention of those who promise themselves the pleasure to which we invite them to one sketch more—that of the Signora Mojon, the high-born but indefatigable girl and woman in indolent Italy, whom Manzoni called, from her matronly exertion for the good and the happiness of the young, "the mother of her country."

Such stories as several of the above-mentioned are likely to leave upon the reader the impression that, contrary to the prevailing notion—with those who have not tried—an industrious youth and a good education may have much the same effect on a female as on a male mind—if minds really are male and female—in strengthening and widening its powers of action and enjoyment; and accordingly that, in order to a large, rich, blessed, and blessing life, girls should not, any more than boys, be idle, frivolous, or needlessly desultory. The last word, we fancy, hits the eye of the target—the very cipher of feminine nonentity.

Many of our young gentlewomen know something of the art of packing a trunk. They would laugh at their brothers for putting in practice the traditional manly method of throwing into it pell-mell whatever happens first to come to hand, and then dancing in it to tread it down. They know that thus their best things would stand a sad chance of being left out or crushed. How many of them are ever taught, by themselves or their parents, the art of packing a day? This is, however, an almost indispensable elementary lesson, if they would learn how to fill their lives with the largest possible amount and variety of services to their families, their country, and their God.

Those men and women who do the most commonly do it in the morning. "These [my] morning haunts," says Milton, "are where they should be—at home." In like manner, we remark in the book before us that Madame Swetchine "reserved the morning to herself. . . . At eight o'clock she had already been to church and had visited the poor; and the hours were her own until three in the afternoon." "In the first place," writes the young Bianca Milesi (afterwards Mojon), when she had been, during a sleepless night, planning several reforms, "I will refuse all visits . . . during my morning's occupation." And La Sœur Rosalie seems, to say the least, to have worked from morning till night.

If Christian women desired to organize themselves into an association for the diffusion of idleness, how could they devise a better modus operandi than lies ready to their hand in our present system of conventional visitations. To get some data for an estimate of the amount of time which a woman of fashion is expected to waste in this way in the course of a year, we have just called for a reckoning of the number of houses—not individuals—on the visiting-list nearest. It amounted to "nearly five hundred;" and the registrar reported it to be by no means complete. Would not many good-hearted ladies under this régime, if called on to give account of the services rendered by them to society, be obliged to answer, as the Marquis de Valdegamus feared that he should "at the judgment day, 'Lord, I have paid morning calls?'" It is considered a standing hardship to pay and to receive them; but civilized women do it, as Hindoo widows burn themselves, because "it is expected," and because, oddly enough, they take it for granted it is their duty.

Mrs. Brown sees her large children comfortably off to school; takes, like a good housekeeper, a survey in person of her whole establishment, gives the orders of the day to her servants, and seats herself to read. Presently she looks up at the clock and says, "Eleven! Oh dear! I must dress and go to see Mrs. Green. I hope she won't be at home." "Oh dear!" echoes Mrs. Green an hour later, just as her small children are ready for their walk, "I must wait and see Mrs. Brown. I hope she won't stay long." Mrs. Green continues to be caught and kept in by a succession of similar nomads. She loses her exercise and has a bad headache; the minds and manners of the little Greens go forth without her to expand and be fashioned in the society of Erse nurses and their cronies; and Mrs. Brown suffers a just, though inadequate, retribution in that her intellectual progress is at a stand-still for the day.

Now, if all the Mrs. Browns and Mrs. Greens, who very properly desire to be civil, but, being merely accidental acquaintances, very naturally do not much care how seldom they meet, could only come to an agreement to leave off incommoding themselves and one another in this manner, and to content themselves with leaving cards—which might have kind messages written upon them, upon occasion—at one another's doors, how many precious hours they might save for themselves, their families, the sick, and the poor!

At any rate, if the mode of life of our young gentlewomen is to be to dance all night, and visit or be visited through the better part of the day, what can come of it but a most plentiful crop of sickly ignoramuses and petites maîtresses? And just so far as such as these are to be partners of the manhood and guardians of the childhood and youth of the nation, alas for the nation! A sensible man may sometimes amuse himself well enough in the company of good-humored dunces and dandies of his own sex; but what dunce or dandy of them all would he choose for his own most confidential privy-counsellor, or for the most constant companion and influential guide of his young son or daughter? How much more judicious or serviceable is a she-dunce or a she-dandy likely to be? A wife's or mother's love, indeed, does a great deal; but when it is a foolish and ignorant love it sadly often does a great deal amiss—a great deal to cramp, narrow, and impoverish the lives of its objects.

GIFT BOOKS OF ACTUAL VALUE.*

THE constantly renewed demand for gift books has led to some results which it would not have been easy to foresee. Very good things have come out of foolish and ignorant buying of books for presents. The Landscape Annuals, the Annual Tours, the Annuals called by the names of Emerald and Pearl and Violet, the illustrated editions of popular poets with delicate vignettes,—these gift books of forty years ago were the means of developing and making known the powers of David Roberts, of Clarkson Stanfield, of D. O. Hill, of Stothard, and of Turner. The fancy has been different of late; wood-cut illustrations have long been in vogue and engravings almost abandoned as a means of illustrating books, and there is a long line of square octavos containing sometimes complete poetical works and sometimes collections of poems, with designs on wood, of which the Tennyson of 1859 was the first and remains the best, and of which the Jean Ingelow, noticed last week, is the latest. But another interest has appeared, and one which lends itself so easily to the production of elegant and costly books that it has naturally been welcomed by the publishers—the very modern regard for the Fine Arts as matter of history and theme of discussion. Books on the history, the principles, and the practice of art encumber the market nowadays, and of the great amount of investigation and labor employed in this direction a fair proportion has gone to the making of "books suitable for presents."

The three books before us are of that character. The "Great Works of Raphael" is a collection of thirty photographs, very carefully taken from good impressions of celebrated engravings after Raphael, accompanied by Vasari's Life, in translation, and descriptions after Passavant. Now, the value of all this is very limited and its rank very low, and that for many reasons. Thus, the engravings are, however technically interesting, generally wholly inadequate as representations of the works they pretend to introduce; the photographs lose even much of the beauty of the engravings, and have actually no value except that of being memoranda of the arrangements and characters of the pictures; the life by Vasari is wholly uncritical, and is little more than an interesting biographical sketch, and the notes after Passavant are only mere documentary matter, helping out the history of the pictures. Its value is limited and its rank low, but it has a certain value, and its rank is with biographical dictionaries.

The "Book of Rembrandt's Etchings" is very much better. In the first place, the etchings are much more easily and completely reproducible in photography than the large Raphael engravings. The photographs are exactly or nearly the same size as their originals, and the look of a Rembrandt etching is not so impossible to be rendered in the copy. The letter-press is of value, particularly the notices of the plates, each containing an account of the different state of the plate of which impressions are known to exist. There is, therefore, in this moderate-sized book, and for twenty dollars, more or less, an opportunity to learn a great deal about a great artist, his life, his works, and their character. It has a certain value even for students of art, for in this country there cannot be many Rembrandt etchings, and the rare and precious proofs from which some of these photographs are made will probably never be brought here. Such photographs from such originals are better worth possessing than prints taken from worn or retouched plates, or from transfers.

Sir Joshua's pictures of children are a good subject for a Christmas gift book, and the quarto before us, which offers photographs of them and an interesting essay, is a very good book. Mr. Ruskin has spoken of "the grace of Reynolds," and has defined his meaning to be "grace consummate, no painter having ever before [Frère] approached Reynolds in the rendering of the momentary loveliness and trembling life of childhood; the great Venetians were too great to do it: their lines were always grave and severe in their grace; and all other men but Reynolds have been too mean to do it." And, although there is no color here, and half of Reynolds's ineffable charm is gone with it, these children are such as, perhaps, no living man can draw in black and white. The selection is very good, and the photographs excellently well taken. The essay seems to be full of matter and usefulness.

CONSERVATIVE SURGERY (SO CALLED).*

WE do not like the name which Dr. Davis has seen fit to give his book. It is a bad name, and, as a rule, those who call themselves conservative surgeons are very far from being ornaments to their profession. The whole science of surgery is conservative in the highest and most noble sense of the word. Its first object is to save life. If this end can only be attained by the sacrifice of a limb, it does not hesitate a moment more than is necessary to render the fact evident. If both life and limb can be preserved, it is imperatively required of every surgeon to leave no means untried calculated to ensure their safety. Surgeons who rejoice in the designation of conservative rarely look beyond the local difficulty they are called upon to treat. If an arm is injured, all their efforts are directed towards its preservation, they being oblivious of the possible fact that the life of the sufferer is, in the meantime, slowly but surely coming to an end. Such conservative surgeons are very much like certain conservative politicians, who, in their efforts to preserve a portion of the nation, are in danger of losing the whole.

With real scientific conservatism that looks not only at the palpable local disease, but also at the effects produced upon the whole system, and is as anxious to obviate the latter as to cure the former, Dr. Davis's book is no more replete than any other acknowledged treatise upon surgery, whilst, in our opinion, it is just as free from the fictitious and charlatanic conservatism which, under false pretences, has done a great deal more harm than good to those who have been so unfortunate as to come under the charge of its professors.

With the title of the volume before us, almost all our fault-finding comes to an end. When we add that there is a little too much controversialism; that there are many errors in the writing of Latin prescriptions; and that the index is scarcely worthy of the name, we have finished all we have to say of an adverse character. The body of the book, both in its spirit and practice, is admirable, and reflects much credit on its author, who is certainly entitled to be regarded as an original thinker and practitioner in that department of surgery which especially relates to diseases of the joints and the rectification of deformities. Even if Dr. Davis had done nothing more than point out the true method of treating hip-joint disease, he would have accomplished enough to entitle him to high consideration as one of those who have added important facts to surgical science. That the credit for this great improvement upon the old practice belongs to him, and to him alone, is not a matter about which disinterested persons can disagree, and is one which the medical profession has long since settled in his favor. It was scarcely necessary, therefore, for Dr. Davis to introduce his quarrel into a work which should have been devoted solely to more important subjects.

The great advances which have been made during the last few years in the treatment of surgical diseases by mechanical means are scarcely yet appreciated, either by the mass of the medical profession or by the public. To such an extent have they reached and so complicated are many of the appliances required that it is almost out of the question for surgeons in general practice to give the requisite amount of skill or time to the subject. It is clearly, therefore, their duty to send those of their patients who are suffering under diseases requiring lengthened mechanical treatment or careful adjustment of a complicated and special form of apparatus to practitioners who have given particular attention to such affections. The medical and surgical sciences are too extensive for any one person to do them justice in their entirety. As knowledge extends, divisions and subdivisions of labor must take place in all sciences, and perhaps in no other can they be made with so much advantage both to the physician or surgeon and to the public as in the medical profession. We are glad, therefore, to see what may be regarded as mechanical surgery taking its proper place as a specialty, and practised by honorable and scientific men. Dr. Davis has written a work of which neither he nor the profession at large need be ashamed, and one which we are satisfied will do a great deal of good. It is concise, practical, and sensible, and, though not expressed in very finished diction, is written in sufficiently perspicuous language. The publishers have done their work in a manner which reflects great credit upon them. It is beginning to be understood that physicians are as fond of elegant typography and are fully as willing to pay for it as other people.

NO. X.—FORM AND ARRANGEMENT OF DICTIONARIES CONTINUED.

THE number and the size or form of the volumes of a book of reference are, to a certain extent, relative quantities, but they are not absolutely dependent on each other; for if the number be fixed, there is still great latitude of choice in regard to the length, breadth, and thickness of the volume or volumes. In other words, the large octavo, the quarto, or the folio may be preferred. But these designations are of variable meaning according to the size of the paper, and the octavo of one sheet may be equal in measurement to the folio of another. Hence, in discussing the question of the form of dictionaries, we cannot make ourselves clearly intelligible without stating actual dimensions in inches. Apart from this element, the octavo and folio are alike in shape; the length, or rather the height, of these forms, as the books stand on the shelf, being considerably greater in proportion to the breadth than that of the quarto, which does not vary much from a square figure.

* "Conservative Surgery, as exhibited in remedying some of the Mechanical Causes that operate injuriously both in Health and Disease. By Henry G. Davis, M.D." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1867. 8vo, pp. 314.

Referring again to the cardinal principle of convenience, we may lay down the rule that the volume should be of such thickness, length, breadth, and weight, that a person of ordinary strength can grasp, unshelve, hold, or carry it with one hand; and here, of course, the number of the volumes is conditioned by the size, as, reciprocally, the size is by the number. What, then, are the most convenient, or, to use a better word, handy, size and shape for this purpose reconcilable with the first rule, that the volume contain the whole alphabet, or as many letters of it as are allowable?

The weight being given, the thinner the volume, the more easily it will be handled, provided always that the expansion of the page be not carried to such a size as to require another hand, not merely to lift, but to steady it. A dictionary of the atlas quarto or the elephant folio size, for instance, however thin, would be difficult to manage with one hand, and, besides, the painful strain upon the eye in running over a very large page would be a decisive objection to such a form.

This brings us to another rule, which is, that the dimensions of the page must be such that, at the ordinary reading distance for the type employed, the whole letter-press shall be embraced in a single coup d'œil, and every word upon it be legible without moving the position of the head.

The attainment of these conditions is not matter of theoretical à priori calculation, but as purely a question of experience as the best shape and size of an axe-helve. As the result of a good deal of practice and experiment, I can affirm with some confidence, that the form and size now very generally adopted for the lexicon in Italy and France, that is, what is generally called in the United States and England the modern or small folio, with a letter-press page of from 10 to 11 by 7 to 8 inches, is greatly preferable to the square quarto so generally employed in England and the United States, and, unfortunately as I think, by both Worcester and Webster. The folio, having an appreciably greater length than breadth, is much more easily balanced in the hand than the almost cubical quarto, and it has the immense advantage of greatly reduced thickness and consequently increased facility of grasp with a given weight and a given amount of letter-press surface.

Let us compare the new edition of Webster with some French and Italian lexicons which are now lying before me. Excluding the catch-words at top, which occupy substantially the same space in both forms, Webster's quarto page measures 9·13 by 6·92 inches, which gives nearly 63·2 square inches; Fleming and Tibbins's folio, 10·04′ by 7·3′=73·3 sq. inches; Littré's, 10·3′ by 7·3′=75·2 sq. inches; Tommaséo's, 10·5′ by 7·62′=80 sq. inches. Accordingly, disregarding small fractions, eighty pages of Tommaséo, eighty-four of Littré, and eighty-six of Fleming and Tibbins, are respectively equal to one hundred of Webster. My Webster is three inches and one-tenth thick between the boards, or exclusive of the binding. The adoption of Tommaséo's form would have reduced the thickness by more than three-fifths of an inch, with the same quantity of matter, and the volume would have been handier in proportion. Including binding, my Webster is three inches and six-tenths thick; Littré, Vol. I., as I have divided it (A, B, C, D), very nearly half-an-inch thinner. The weight of the two volumes is exactly the same; but while the cubical Webster is an awkward lift for one hand, I handle the oblong and thinner Littré with perfect facility, and, at the same time, the pages of the latter are not so much larger than those of the former as sensibly to increase the labor of consultation.

I do not know whether the London Philological Society has decided upon the form of its lexicon; but the specimen pages of the Concise Dictionary I have seen are very much smaller than even those of Webster. If this size is adopted, the Concise Dictionary must fill several volumes, and the larger, a greater number than there are letters in the alphabet. I should look upon this as a grave mistake, and I trust the editors will seriously consider this point before going to press with either dictionary.

I may here observe that the objections I have urged against the division of dictionaries into an unnecessary number of volumes in strictness apply only to the regular alphabet. Between this part of a lexicon, the introduction and the appendixes, cross-references are comparatively rare, and there is no serious evil in binding this supplementary matter by itself. In Webster the alphabet occupies 1,538 pages, the introduction and appendixes about 300. The latter, bound separately, would make a thin and, as some might think, an unsightly volume; but the reduced thickness of the alphabetical volume would much more than counterbalance the disadvantage.

Connected with this point of compression are other questions, some of a purely mechanical, some of a more philosophical nature. Of the former class are the color, thickness, and texture of the paper, and the size, form, and arrangement of the type. Neither in a dictionary nor in any other book is a dazzling whiteness of paper desirable; for the sharp contrast between the intense blackness of printing-ink and a very white ground is painful to the eye. This, too, is particularly sensible in a dictionary; because in looking out words and forms the eye must scrutinize the details of orthography much more closely than in reading a volume of continuous narrative or discussion. The paper, of course, must be thin, in order not to swell the bulk and weight of the volume; but it must be so thick and so stiff that the finger can feel and catch the edges of the leaves in turning them over one by one. A dictionary printed on what is called India paper, upon single leaves of Chinese, or even upon bank-note paper, would be as good as useless, from the difficulty of turning the leaves page by page. It is probably for this reason, as much as on account of the difficulty of printing on both sides, that the leaves of Chinese books are doubled. The paper, as indeed in all other cases, must be opaque, so that the letter-press will not show through on the wrong side, and it must be as light in weight as is consistent with this and the other essential conditions.

The size, form, and spacing of the type are all matters difficult to determine, for in using a dictionary so much of the ease of reading depends on the habits of the individual and the state of his eyesight, that general rules are hard to hit upon. On this point, I shall content myself with saying that, though I find the wider spacing and larger type of Worcester considerably easier for the eye, yet I do not think that the closeness of distribution and reduction of letter in Webster are carried further than is necessary to bring the matter within the necessary limits of space. The substitution of full-faced—I have heard it called fat by printers, though Webster gives no such meaning to the word—small letter for capitals in the general alphabet is an important change for the better. To everybody but a sign-painter or a book-binder, small letter is more readily legible than capitals, and, of course, a word printed in the latter character is more easily found and recognized than if printed in the former.

Great distinctness of letter, in point of form, size, and collocation, is a condition far more important in dictionaries and other books of consultation than in ordinary literature, because in the latter the context aids us in divining a word we do not clearly make out, just as it helps us to deduce a meaning. If I were required to name the modern book of reference known to me in which the plainest rules of clear and well-discriminated visibility are most completely ignored, I should refer to the much-praised Royal Atlas of Modern Geography, by Keith Johnston. This work is very laboriously got up, and apparently constructed with conscientious accuracy, but in point of topographical delineation and facility of consultation it is one of the worst specimens of cartography that has ever fallen under my observation. Not only are the land and the water not distinguished, but the boundaries between neighboring provinces, and even kingdoms, are most obscurely marked, the lettering is confused and illegible in a high degree, and the indications of mountain surface are scarcely discernible. Let a geographical pupil be asked to point out, on the map of France, what portion of the empire is bounded by sea and what by land; to trace, on that of Belgium and the Netherlands, the boundary between the two kingdoms; or, on that of England, the line which divides the principality of Wales from the rest of the island, or to find on any of these maps the name of a town, a river, or mountain which has not been already shown to him; let him, in short, try to learn from this atlas anything he did not know before, and, in general, he will be unable to answer any of these questions without turning to another page and availing himself of the clumsy device of an index.

Of the higher problems of arrangement which have divided the opinions and practice of lexicographers, I shall mention but one or two. The most important of these is whether the words should follow each other in regular alphabetical sequence, or be disposed in groups according to etymology, all derivatives being placed under their primitive or radical. In languages where the roots are comparatively few, and the laws of derivation so simple and regular that the form of the word spontaneously suggests the radical, the etymological arrangement is both convenient and philosophical, and it has consequently been adopted extensively, not only in the Oriental languages, many of which lend themselves readily to this treatment, but in comparatively homogeneous European tongues, as German and Dutch, especially in their earlier dialects. Richardson has partially employed it even in English, to which the miscellaneous character of our vocabulary renders it very ill adapted. A person ignorant of any language but English—and many very intelligent readers, as well as many excellent English writers, are and have been in that condition—habitually thinks little of etymology, and but a small proportion of our words suggest to such a student a significant radical form from which they can be deduced by known rules of derivation. In a majority of our words, orthographical changes have disguised or affixes have smothered the radical, and besides, when stripped of its appendages and restored to its primitive spelling, it is found to belong to a foreign or a forgotten tongue, and to be wholly without significance to the mind of the mere English scholar. In an English lexicon, therefore, a strictly alphabetical arrangement is a matter not only of general convenience, but, for a large share of those for whose use it is designed, of absolute necessity.

Some languages—French, for instance—abound in what are popularly called phrases; that is, idiomatic combinations of words the signification of which is conventional and cannot be inferred from the meaning of the individual vocables which compose them. It is very important that a dictionary should contain all the authorized phrases occurring in the language, but it is by no means easy to decide how to dispose of them so that they shall be readily found by the seeker. It is sometimes difficult to determine under what word in the alphabet the phrase shall be placed, and often still more so to hit upon a clear and convenient arrangement of the many phrases which are collected under the same word. As to the first point, it is pretty clear that the word whose conventional differs most widely from its normal meaning rightfully claims the phrase as an illustration of one of its uses, and, of course, the combination should be placed under that word. In the popular expression, "to raise the wind," or, to procure the pecuniary means to effect a given purpose, the verb, to raise, is indeed employed in a figurative sense, and so it is in the more usual "to raise money;" but wind is used not in a figurative but in an absolutely conventional meaning. The phrase, therefore, should be placed under wind, not under raise; but it would be an error to say that money is one of the meanings of wind.

The collocation of phrases, as between each other, is much more embarrassing, and some lexicographers, Fleming and Tibbins for instance, seem to have given up the point in despair, and printed their exemplifications of these forms of speech just as chance brought them to the hands of the compositor, except in the cases where the phrase consists of a couple of words only, as a verb and a noun. Thus, when the verb faire is used phraseologically with a substantive, they follow the alphabet; in the numerous other combinations of this verb, no discoverable rule of arrangement is pursued. Littré relieves himself, in some measure, of the difficulty by giving to leading words a vast variety of meanings, and thus finding, or rather making, places to suit all possible phraseological combinations. But this method does not much facilitate to the student the search for a given phrase, for it is not an easy thing to find the conventional signification in so great a multitude, themselves almost arbitrarily arranged. Thus, to donner Littré assigns thirty-eight, to faire, eighty-two distinct senses, each with its definition. The latter verb occupies more than seven of the large closely printed folio pages of that dictionary, and a given phrase containing that verb is more readily found in the chaos of Fleming and Tibbins than in the apparent order of Littré. In like manner, Tommaséo ascribes to the substantive verb essere upwards of twenty principal meanings, and more than two hundred limited or conditioned senses, many of which are merely conventional uses occurring only in a single phraseological combination.

In following this method, the lexicographer is constantly tempted to divide, subdivide, subtilize, and distinguish meanings between which there is no real logical difference, to invent signification for the sake of the phrase, and to ascribe to a single word a sense which really belongs to the combination. This was one of the frequent errors of Webster in his own editions, and Littré and Tommaséo, with all their philological learning and acumen, have sometimes fallen into it.

The arrangement of the catch-words at the top of the page may seem a small matter to dwell upon, but if such helps are to be employed at all, it is important that the right principle be adopted. In all the older dictionaries the first syllable of the last word on the page or column was put at the head, and in lexicons so late as Richardson, Fleming and Tibbins, and Andrews, this method is still followed. Webster and other recent lexicographers place the first word at the top of the first column, the last word at the head of the last. This is a real, though perhaps a trifling improvement, for in opening a volume the eye falls habitually on the top of the page, and the two catch-words, disposed according to the modern rule, show you at a glance the whole range of the alphabet contained in the page, while the old method, which gave you only the end of the page or column, obliged you to take a second look to ascertain where in the alphabet the page or volume began.

As a student of the Anglo-Saxon and English languages, I take this occasion to protest against the extreme inconvenience of the English index to Bosworth's dictionary of the former tongue. The purpose of the index is to point out the A.-S. equivalent to the modern English word. The method of the index is this: The pages of the A.-S. dictionary are divided into several sections, each indicated by a microscopic letter in the margin of the column, and the seeker of a word in the index is referred not to a word in the alphabet, but to a page and letter. Thus, Rotation sends him to 97, s; Scarlet to 96, l, and so of the rest. In some cases, as, for instance, under Rough, there are more than a dozen of these references. Now, nobody wants to know what the Anglo-Saxons called rough for the sake of using the word in writing or in speaking, and in nine cases out of ten the index is consulted to know whether the modern English word is etymologically connected with the A.-S. An English scholar might possibly doubt whether rough is from an A.-S. root or from Latin rudis or Italian ruvido or rozzo. If the corresponding A.-S. words were printed in the index at length, a single glance would show whether a form probably related to rough was found among them; but in the present index the student may have to run through fifteen sections to find what he is in search of. It is true that printing the words would swell the book, but with a proper size of volume there would be abundant space for this purpose.

The use of pictorial illustrations in word-books has been much, and as I think unjustly, censured. There are material objects of which verbal description can give no clear notion, and there are other cases where an engraving will save space by substituting an image for a long definition. To me it seems a mere piece of pedantry to insist that every word shall be explained exclusively by other words, and it would be just as reasonable to object to the use of the arithmetical symbols in numbering the different meanings. To assume that the only office of a dictionary is to construct verbal equations, is to beg the question, and I have never met with anything which deserved to be called an argument against this useful improvement.

I have had no experience in the compilation of dictionaries, and these suggestions of mine are but the random thoughts of a layman. They are therefore subject to control by the professional hierophants of lexicography, to whose better judgment I submit them with due deference. G. P. M.

Nature and Art. Nos. 1 to 4, June to September, 1866. (London: Day & Son.)—This is a new monthly, published by the great lithographic establishment which does nearly all the better English work of that kind. The object of the journal is announced as being, first and principally, pictorial illustration, especially in color. Accordingly, there are five full-page chromolithographs in No. 1, with another full-page illustration and some woodcuts; and the other three numbers have each four or five of the large colored pictures and numerous other illustrations. But let no one suppose that it is an art journal which we are describing. "Nature" decidedly carries it over "art" in the making up of each number. In No. 1 there is a regular botanical plate of the Raphanus Caudatus, a new table vegetable, of which the seed-pod is the edible portion, and which looks not wholly unlike okra, although we are told that it is a "newly introduced radish, . . . and is certainly a novelty, inasmuch as the edible portion of the plant is the seed-vessel and not the root." It must be a novelty. Then we have African landscape with a herd of striped quaggas; then a plate of the ailanthus silkworm (Bombyx Cynthia), a proposed substitute for the common silkworm, which latter is dying off with an incurable disease; then a landscape illustrating the first of a series of papers on Sketching from Nature; and, finally, a bonâ fide fashion plate of young ladies' heads in "Parisian chapeaux." These plates are in full color; the two scientific ones, those of the plant and the insect, are very satisfactory, being of subjects easily rendered. The others are very feeble, and vaguely sketchy. These are the chromoliths; but the sixth full-page illustration is capital: it is a photo-lithographic copy of a drawing by R. Dudley, and is very spirited and full of character.

In general, the first number of a periodical is not to be taken as a fair example of what the periodical will be. But in this case No. 1 is the best of the four numbers, having as many plates and as good as the others, and the very good illustration we have spoken of.

The natural history illustrations are all of interesting subjects, and worthy of a careful look, though feeble enough as works of "art." No. 3 is worth its price on account of the plate and description of that most marvellous vegetable, Welwitschia Mirabilis, a plant which looks like a kind of orchid, but is of enormous size, and has, strangely enough, a long tap-root.

We have said that this is not an art journal. In each number is a feeble flash of art-criticism—"Art Notes from France" by a Mr. Yapp; "Fine Art Auctions," "Music at Home and Abroad," etc. But the matter is very small, and the manner often flippant and always trifling. The criticism is about on a par with that in the eminently uncritical "Art Journal;" and as yet there is none of the notes-and-queries style of learning which has given that monthly a sort of value. Moreover, the chromoliths must be vastly better than these to compare in interest and merit with some of the large line engravings in the older journal.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE THREE PLANS FOR REORGANIZING THE SOUTH.

LITTLE doubt remains that Mr. Johnson, powerless though he be to help his friends, is powerful enough so to mislead them by his unwise counsels as to induce the Southern soi-disant "States" to reject the Constitutional Amendment. Nor does there seem to be much reason to doubt that a large majority of Congress is fully determined to adopt some plan for the reorganization of the Southern State governments as soon as the rejection of the Amendment is definitely settled. The most conservative Republicans agree that the North can neither afford to receive the Southern States without their submission to the Amendment, nor yet to allow them to remain out of the Union in their present half anarchical condition. In some way the South must be provided with legitimate governments, and that speedily.

Three different plans have been suggested in various quarters. The first, which may be called Mr. Stevens's original plan, is the reduction of the South to the condition of territories, to be governed as such by the direct exercise of the Federal power. The second plan, newly broached, is for Congress to frame new constitutions for these States, and to reorganize their governments upon this basis, without consulting the people at all. The third plan is for Congress simply to provide for the prompt election of a convention in every disorganized State, and for the government of the States meantime, as a purely provisional measure.

One objection to both of the first two plans is the moral certainty that if the question came before the courts, and especially before the Supreme Court of the United States, they would hold the action of Congress in accordance with either of these projects to be unconstitutional. Mr. Phillips recognizes this fact, as far as the Supreme Court is concerned, and therefore wages war upon it. But in what court does he expect to fare better? We know of no tribunal before which the question would be likely to arise in which the power of Congress would be recognized as extending to such a length. Mr. Phillips would no doubt be willing to override all the courts and all legal principles which stand in the way of immediate practical justice; but here we differ essentially from him, and rejoice to believe that the mass of the American people will reject his advice. Whether the decision of a court notoriously corrupt or partial should be accepted as final or not, may admit of a doubt; but the decision of the great majority of the courts, when the integrity, learning, and impartiality of the judges are all conceded, must and will be submitted to by any sensible community, however unpalatable it may be. There is a legal way to almost every desirable end; and although it may be longer and more tedious than the short roads which are proposed by those who despise precedents, it does not open the way to usurpation and violence, as all even well-meant violations of the law do.

The legal objections to the territorial plan are that it assumes the right of Congress to govern for ever, if it chooses, and in the most absolute manner, provinces which have been States; that it assumes that these States have permanently lost all right to the protection of the Federal Constitution, or to a republican form of government; and that it raises the question in the plainest manner for the decision of the courts, since upon a collision of authority it could not be said that there were two conflicting State governments, of which Congress had recognized one, and which recognition the courts would be bound to follow.

The creation of State constitutions by the direct action of the National Government would not present quite so clear a case for judicial interference; yet it is so plainly opposed to all precedent, notwithstanding the opportunity has been frequently open to Congress to make such precedents on the admission of new States, that we think it probable that the Supreme Court would deem the question a judicial one, and certain that, if it entertained the question at all, it would deny the power of Congress to adopt such a course.

It is said, both by partisans of Mr. Johnson's policy and by those who favor the harsher methods of proceeding, that the Supreme Court would decide against the validity of Congressional action through the medium of State conventions as certainly as it would against the validity of any other method. But this is far from being the case. The court is bound by its own repeated decisions to the doctrine that, in determining between conflicting claimants to the government of a State, it must follow the decision of Congress. This may not bind the court to recognize a government appearing upon the records of Congress to have been forced by it upon a State, without the consent of any part of its people; but it does clearly preclude the court, where the only rival governments appear to have been created by conventions, both elected by only a portion of the people, and both summoned by Federal authority, from giving a preference to a convention summoned by the President, without law, over one summoned by Congress through the regular form of law. Neither can there be the least doubt that the court will interpret the clause of the Federal Constitution guaranteeing to every State a republican form of government, as imposing that duty upon Congress, and not on the President independently of Congress. And this, we are confident, covers the whole case, and secures the sanction of all the courts to any action of Congress which looks, in good faith, to the immediate reorganization of the Southern States as States, and through the voluntary action of their own people.

For although there are many different theories as to the continued existence, suspension, or total destruction of the rebel States and their governments, on one central fact all are agreed. Thus we hold that the State governments of the South were destroyed by the action of their conventions, in 1860–61, in abolishing their loyal governments, which we maintain they could do, and substituting governments avowedly independent of the United States, which we hold to have been nullities. Many able men hold that the conventions accomplished nothing, but that the act of war with the Federal Government obliterated the States engaged in it. Others hold that the States existed intact until actually conquered by the United States. Others hold that the rebel governments were perfectly valid through and after the war, and that Presidents Lincoln and Johnson were guilty of gross usurpation in ignoring those governments. But there is entire unanimity upon the facts that all these governments were obliterated in 1865; that ever since not a single officer has pretended to act under them; and that for several months all public business in these States was carried on by men appointed, directly or indirectly, by Andrew Johnson, without any regard to the forms of republican government.

Now these admitted facts show, to our mind, an indisputable ground for Congressional interference to secure to each of these States a republican government. And it being once conceded that Congress has a right to interfere, there can be no doubt that the Supreme Court will not look further into its action than to ascertain, at the most, that the people were really left to frame a government, and that the government which they were required by Congress to frame was one which could, by any definition, be called republican in form.

The other considerations which affect these questions are also, as we think, decisive in favor of a reorganization by means of State conventions. The territorial system would involve an intolerable accumulation of power in the executive department at Washington. It could never be carried out until after Mr. Johnson had been removed from office, since the appointments must be made by him or his officers. It would grievously retard the progress of the South in material prosperity, and alienate it more than ever from the Union. It would be a precedent full of danger, since upon the smallest insurrection it would justify Congress in reducing an obnoxious State to a territorial condition. The proposition that Congress should frame and impose constitutions upon the States is too completely unrepublican to be worth discussing, until at least some effort has been made to secure the adoption of republican constitutions by the people themselves. The summoning of State conventions, to be elected by the universal suffrage of loyal citizens, though not without its difficulties and dangers, especially with such a President as we have just now, is the most truly democratic method of restoring order to these disorganized communities, and promises, upon the whole, the most beneficial results; while it has the immense advantage of being perfectly constitutional, and of avoiding the possibility of conflict between the legislature and the courts.

MR. BEMIS ON GENERAL BANKS.

Mr. George Bemis, of Boston, who is well known for his discussions of questions of international law during the past four years, has just published a review of Mr. Banks's report on the neutrality laws, which formed the basis of the famous bill that the House of Representatives passed unanimously at the close of the last session.

Mr. Banks stated in the "report" that our early neutrality—that of Washington's day and of the era of the law of 1794—was the result of the defenceless condition of the country; that, in other words, it was forced upon the country by fear of Great Britain. Mr. Bemis shows that this assertion has not the smallest foundation in fact, and cites abundant proof that American neutrality was enforced with as rigid a hand against France as against England—that everything done by this Government in support of it was well calculated to excite the rage of one or other of the two greatest powers in the world; that at its inception, and for long afterwards, American relations with England were in a high degree unfriendly, and that the policy of neutrality, in short, so far from having been the result of timidity, was proof of the most extraordinary courage. We are sorry we cannot make extracts on this point from Mr. Bemis's pamphlet, but the examination of the various cases with which he supports his position will well repay perusal. Mr. Bemis, in the opening pages, endeavors to treat Mr. Banks with great respect, and although, towards the close, his honest indignation gets the better of him, he generally avoids drawing the inferences which his argument suggests. But he doubtless hardly expects his readers to display the same self-restraint, and, in the interest of public morality, we must state frankly that it is impossible for any candid person to avoid the conclusion either that Mr. Banks framed his theory of the origin of our neutrality laws in complete ignorance of the history of the time of which he was treating, or that, knowing the facts of the case, he framed his theory without any regard to them.

Says Mr. Banks, in the debate on his bill:

> "The object of the committee has been to scale the [United States] neutrality act of 1818 to the standard of the foreign-enlistment act enacted by Great Britain in 1819. The provisions of the bill which has been read are essentially the same as the provisions enacted for the same purpose in the foreign-enlistment act of Great Britain. With the exception of the section giving citizens of the United States authority to sell vessels, the material of which they are made, and munitions of war, to governments or citizens of governments with whom the United States may not be at war, there is nothing in this bill which is not contained in that act, and there is no provision in that act which is not substantially embraced in this bill."—Globe, July 30.

Says he, in his report:

> "Its restrictions [those of the British act] are nominal, compared with those of the American statute."

Says Mr. Bemis:

> "When the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives asserts that 'the restrictions of the British statute are nominal, compared with those of the American,' he hazards a statement which I shall be sorry to have meet the eye of any English jurist or statesman. So far is it from being true that we shall have to make a descent in our legislation on this head, in order to come down upon a level with that of England, that I venture to affirm that in many, if not in most, respects the English statute is decidedly the more high-toned and comprehensive of the two."

Mr. Bemis proceeds to give "ten important points" in which the British act is more stringent and comprehensive than the American act as it now is, to say nothing of what Mr. Banks would make it: (1) It is more comprehensive in its prohibition of enlistments; (2) it is more complete in its prohibition of hiring or retaining any person whatever by way of recruiting for foreign war vessels; (3) it is more comprehensive in forbidding British subjects from enlisting or engaging in warlike operations anywhere whatsoever, while the American act limits the prohibition to the territory or jurisdiction of the United States; (4) in providing for the detention of vessels having on board persons who have enlisted or engaged to enlist; (5) in forbidding the use of any transport or store-ship for belligerent use; (6) in containing the famous words, "equip, furnish, fit out, or arm," the misinterpretation of which by the Chief Baron caused the failure of the Alexandra trial, and which Mr. Banks proposes to copy, substituting and for or, and thus giving the clause the very operation which we sought to show in the Alexandra case, that it had not and ought not to have; (7) in inserting the words "or in order that" after "intent," so as to make it of no consequence what the equipper's intent was, as long as the ship was designed by somebody for belligerent use; (8) in designating, by a phrase of wider scope, the persons or powers for whom vessels of war may not be fitted out; (9) in prohibiting the increase of the armaments of foreign ships of war in harbors which they have entered already armed; (10) in prescribing severer penalties for violations of the law.

Mr. Bemis then goes on to show that the present troubles with Great Britain arise not out of the insufficiency of her statutes, but out of failure to enforce them. He deals very tenderly with Mr. Banks and his committee on this portion of the case; but again broadly suggest the very disagreeable inference, that when Mr. Banks drew his report and made his speech, he had either never read the British act, to which he proposed to "scale down" the American act, or he had read it, and grossly misrepresented its provisions, trusting to the ignorance of the public to escape exposure.

Mr. Banks's report closes with a few paragraphs about Ireland which are a fine specimen of buncombe, in which he tries to show by a muddled and thoroughly incomprehensible process that, because Ireland has been grossly misgoverned for six hundred years, the United States ought either to have no neutrality laws or have such as could not be enforced, making it, in fact, as plain as a pikestaff that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives of the United States was desirous of altering the laws of the country, and in such a way as to change its relations to the rest of the civilized world, for the purpose of obliging a band of ignorant foreigners who were at that time engaged in organizing piratical expeditions. Fancy Washington or Hamilton reading the "report" and "the bill" and Mr. Banks's "great speech"!

Says Mr. Bemis:

> "For would General Banks contend, on his responsibility as an American lawyer and legislator, that it is lawful for any set of native born—or, if he prefers, naturalized—Irish-American citizens to make the United States a basis of hostile operations, whence to carry on war against a friendly power, because the parents or ancestors of those citizens—or, if he prefers, because those citizens themselves—have suffered political grievances when residing at a former period in Ireland? If they have quitted that country and cast their lot here, what right have they to stir up strife in their new domicile, and embroil the hospitable republic which has so kindly received and sheltered them? If they are not naturalized or domiciled American citizens, but are merely emigrant British subjects, transiently resident with us, à fortiori, what right have they to be carrying on war from our territory?"

We call attention to this matter once more at the risk of confirming the suspicion of some very acute people that we have some deep-seated private grudge against General Banks, not because we think there is any danger that the bill will pass. We look on his performances during the last session as important mainly because of the illustration they afford of the defects and dangers of the existing mode of legislation—that is, legislation by secret committees. We have said a good deal on this topic, for too much cannot be said. With a committee to draw "bills" up, and a reckless majority to force them through without debate under the "previous question," the restraints usually imposed by public opinion on dishonest or ignorant legislation are completely destroyed, and the character, and it may be the happiness and peace, of the community are placed, every time Congress meets, at the mercy of any unscrupulous body who has an "axe to grind," and is ready to do it with such recklessness as Mr. Bemis shows to have marked the course of General Banks on this occasion. If "President" Roberts of the Irish Republic did not heartily despise Mr. Banks and his helpmates when they were uproariously legislating for his benefit, he must differ greatly from all other foreign potentates who have succeeded in getting the government of a free country to make laws to suit their convenience.

THE DWIGHT ACCIDENT ON THE JERSEY RAILROAD.

Our readers doubtless remember the accident on the Jersey Railroad last October, by which Mr. Theodore Dwight was killed. The accident was a peculiarly painful one. Mr. Dwight was nearly seventy years old; his daughter, Mrs. Kennedy, had two children with her, one of them a baby, and was on her way to the South, and her father accompanied her to the cars to see her off. On taking leave of her, he found the door of the car locked, and the train started before he could alight. On attempting to do so while the cars were in motion, he fell on the track and was fatally injured. The coroner's jury acquitted the employees of the company of all blame, but recommended some change of arrangement as to the locking of the doors. On the 18th of October, an official "card" was published by the company in the New York Evening Post, giving a version of the accident, in substance very much like the above, but adding that the conductor of the train was not present when it occurred and knew nothing of it till after it was over. On the following day, the 19th, Mrs. Kennedy, Mr. Dwight's daughter, furnished, we believe, through her husband, to the Evening Post, October 19th, the following account of the accident:

> "We waited for a long time; father rapped on the glass and spoke to those near—especially to one man who seemed to be an official—stating that there were persons locked in who did not wish to go. At last we saw the passengers from the last boat coming; and when a lady and gentleman entered who could not find seats, I said to them: 'You shall have these as soon as we can get out.' The gentleman said: 'It is time you were going—I will have the door opened.' The door of another car was opened, and we went in. I had just taken my seat when I said, 'Father, are not the cars moving?' Some one said, 'They are. If you want to get out, you must do so at once.' Father did not even wait to say 'Good-by.' A girl that was with him went out first, then he.
> "I called, 'Father, don't go!' At that moment I heard a succession of awful shrieks, and some one said, 'The lady is hurt.' The car partly stopped and I sprang to the door. Instantly a group stepped in, crying out, 'She must not see it!' A man then came in, saying, 'The old gentleman is killed—they are both dead.' I found that we were moving on, and besought them to let me out in vain, until a kind gentleman pulled the check and the train stopped. Another gentleman insisted that they must back down.
> "A man came in who seemed to be a conductor, and in the roughest manner asked who checked the engineer. He turned to me and said, 'D—n you! do you mean to get off? I'll go on if you don't step quick.' I asked what I could do if put off in the road. He went on cursing and ordering me off, and many voices were urging him to take me back. In the midst of all, I found myself in the road, with my son of twelve years, and a baby in my arms. I complain that there was no signal given before starting; or, if any, one that gave us no warning, for I was listening attentively so as to get father off in full time."

So far as we have been able to learn, no notice of this statement was taken by the company or any one connected with it, although the Post or its correspondent enquired, as it seemed to us with unnecessary violence, whether the company was "not censurable in employing as conductor on their most important train a creature so devoid of human instincts as to leave a woman under such circumstances, with an oath on his lips, by the side of the road, to grope her way back," etc. On the 25th of October, a week later, THE NATION noticed the affair in the following terms, taking Mrs. Kennedy's statement in the Post as the basis of its comments:

> "Mr. Dwight and Mrs. Kennedy get to the station some time before the hour for departure, and try to find some one to ask for information. They wander up and down and at last find a lantern-man, who tells them they are to stand on the platform and wait till the cars come. They do so, and, when the cars are run in, go with the rush to find a seat. After great difficulty Mr. Dwight gets his daughter into a car, but before he gets in himself, or can get his daughter's children in, the car door is locked. The man in the car, being told by Mrs. Kennedy that she is separated from her baby, pays no heed; but at last some one who, perhaps, has his own private key with him, runs to get off, and Mr. Dwight is thrown down and fatally injured. When Mrs. Kennedy hears a man say, 'The old gentleman is killed—they are both dead,' of course she wants to go back. A gentleman pulls the check-line and stops the train. This brings in an enraged conductor, who, being asked to run the train back, says, 'D—n you, are you going to get off? Step quick, or I'll go on;' and the lady, with her baby in her arms, is set down beside the road to get to her father, or her father's body, as she best can. The whole affair, from first to last, was perfectly disgraceful. No warning at the starting of the train; passengers locked into cars, and the cars kept locked, so that, if they wished to get out, they cannot do so in time; the extreme of insolence on the part of conductors and other servants; nobody in the depot to answer a question."

On the 7th of December, six weeks afterwards, we were made aware for the first time that all this was considered libellous by somebody, by the service of a writ at the suit of a Mr. Rostine Parker, whom we discovered, on enquiry, to be a conductor on the Jersey Railroad, and to have been the one in charge of the train on which the accident occurred. We have since been assured by Mr. Parker's lawyer that he (Mr. Parker) was not present when the accident took place, and did not see Mrs. Kennedy and had no conversation with her. The comments of THE NATION have, however, we learn from the same authority, been not unnaturally applied to Mr. Parker, and have damaged him to the extent of $10,000. Why he should have suffered so seriously from our mild reproduction of Mrs. Kennedy's statement and not have suffered from the statement itself, and from the comments of the Evening Post thereupon, particularly as the Post is read by perhaps ten Jersey Railroad passengers for the one who reads THE NATION, we have not yet ascertained.

But our duty is none the less clear, action or no action. In so far as our comments have helped to fasten on Mr. Parker the responsibility of acts or words of which he was not guilty, we regret them exceedingly. If he was not present when the accident occurred, and never saw Mrs. Kennedy, as his lawyer assures us he did not, of course our remarks ought not to apply to him, and we very cheerfully do all that is in our power to relieve him from the odium which they may have helped to cast upon him. We take the greatest possible care to avoid such misunderstandings as have doubtless occurred in this case. It would be impossible to avoid them always without confining ourselves exclusively to the discussion of the natural sciences. Conductors are public characters, and their conduct on the trains is proper matter for newspaper criticism. In this case somebody on a particular train, and doubtless in the employment of the company—perhaps a brakeman—behaved to Mrs. Kennedy like an inhuman ruffian. It was not, it appears, Mr. Rostine Parker. Had Mr. Parker sent us a note informing us of this when our paragraph appeared, or had he even communicated with us at all, we should have done everything in our power to set him right with the public. We do it now, we beg to inform him, from a simple desire to do justice, and to preserve our own character and that of the paper, and without any regard to his suit, which he will continue or drop, just as he pleases. We have no arrangement with him on the subject.

THE "CONDITION OF WORKMEN"—PRIZES AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

THE position of the working-man in America is the great boast and glory of the United States. Even those who concede American superiority in nothing else concede it in this, though those in Europe who know anything of what has been done here to promote harmony between laborers and capitalists are very few in number. An opportunity is afforded now, as will be seen by the subjoined extract from a letter written by one of the jury, Mr. Perkins, to a friend in this country, to give Europe an idea of what has been accomplished in this field here, and we trust both manufacturers and workmen will try to avail themselves of it:

> "I want you to stir up people at home to put some materials into my hands which will do us credit, and, whether they gain prizes or not, will give us an honorable position in the eyes of foreign nations.
> "The new order of recompenses consists of ten prizes of 10,000 francs each, and one of 100,000, to be competed for by 'persons, establishments, or localities which have developed in a remarkable manner good order and harmony among operatives or workmen, and promoted their moral, intellectual, and physical well-being in an eminent degree.' As these terms are somewhat vague, the jury has appointed a committee to draw up a more precise formula of conditions, which I will send you, but, as time is precious, I thought it better to write now and explain, so far as I can, what is wanted. The documents which have been offered contain statements made by heads of factories and large manufacturing establishments of all kinds as to their organization, number of workmen, means employed to render the workmen happy and comfortable, special modes of education, intellectual development, and recreation. The term first fixed for sending in such documents was the 1st of December; this is to be prolonged, probably till the 1st of February, or even later, to enable members of the jury to obtain information. Mr. Beckwith drew the attention of our Government to it last summer, but they, as yet, have paid little or no heed to it, and it is probable that the amount of prizes offered and the object in view are as yet little known in America.
> "I am, therefore, empty-handed; but trust that I may not continue so, as Mr. Beckwith has taken energetic measures, and I have written to various friends. I hope you will be able to draw the attention of our manufacturing bodies to it. Demands are to be sent in to Mr. Beckwith, U. S. Commissioner General for the Great Exhibition, care of the U. S. Legation, Paris. The more explicit they are, the better; but, at the same time, they must be concise. The jury is presided over by the Minister of State and the Minister of Public Works, who, with the Maréchal Vaillant and M. de Ploy, Counsellor of State, represent France; Lord Cowley appears in place of an English commissioner hereafter to be appointed; the Chevalier Minghetti for Italy. The jurors are twenty-five in number, and these gentlemen are most courteous and polite. The spirit of the trades' representation seems to be most fair and liberal; they act like men who really wish to give foreigners as good a chance as Frenchmen. Fortunately for us, other foreign countries are as much behindhand as we are in sending in demands. Austria, for good reasons, is backward. Sweden, Denmark, and Norway have as yet done little; Italy and England ditto; so I hope that the final term will be fixed as late as possible. I see that the jury expect something from America which shall justify her reputation in the matter; and I have a pride, as an American, to see the United States take her rightful place. There are not many things in which we can compete with foreign countries; but my conviction is, that this is a ground on which we can meet them with a certainty of shining, and I hope to aid in that result."

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, December 14, 1866.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY having been cold and clear, the lovers of skating, remembering the proverb, are indulging in sanguine hopes of a winter that shall permit them to exercise the skill so generally thrown away upon this longitude. The last series of guests are preparing to leave Compiègne, which scene of hospitable splendor will be deserted in turn by the Imperial hosts, who are to return to the Tuileries on the 20th inst. The famous but scarcely edifying midnight balls at the Opera began last Saturday; short, fat, gesticulative Father Hyacinth, with his fitful voice—the fashionable preacher of this decade—whose Advent sermons at Notre Dame created so great a sensation a year ago, has commenced a similar series in the same fine old fane, the topic, which last year was "Morality in its Application to One's Self," being this year "Morality in its Application to the Family Relation," and to be completed next year by a similar consideration of "Morality in its Application to Society." A fashionable authority of high standing has announced that the paletot has had its day, and that cloaks will, during the coming winter, be "the correct thing" among dandies of the capital. The head of Cardinal Richelieu is about to be solemnly reinterred, in the presence of the Archbishop of Paris, whose very sensible note in regard to a pretended miracle, which the Monde has been imprudently patronizing, has been followed by an equally sensible mandement to the vicars of his diocese on the subject of Rome and Italy, and of M. Duruy, Minister of Public Instruction, who has just issued a circular advising the teachers of the public schools not to torment their pupils by cramming their youthful heads with grammatical rules, learned by rote, but to inculcate the principles of correct and elegant diction by the less arid methods of dictation and the analysis of interesting reading lessons, thus indoctrinating them gradually and practically into the intricacies of grammatical law, without the infliction of the headaches, pensums, and weariness of the flesh to which the learned and genial minister alludes with an evident commiseration that makes one suspect he must have suffered many things in his boyhood under the rule of pedagogues.

The last fortnight has witnessed a good many mishaps among the theatres of the metropolis. Victorien Sardou's new piece, Maison Neuve, despite two fine acts, and many telling hits in the other three, is a failure, brought about, no doubt, by the fact that he is writing too fast and too much. A fire broke out one evening at the Grand Opera, destroying some of the beautiful scenery of the new fairy pantomime, La Source, but happily extinguished without causing very serious damage. The pretty little theatre of the Nouveautés, that has been got up by a band of young playwrights and actors who had clubbed their limited means together for the purpose, and which was going on swimmingly with a fairy ballet that all Paris was running to see, has been burned down, losing all its scenery, dresses, and other properties. The Emperor has sent them three thousand francs, but the unfortunate company was only partially insured, and is pretty nearly ruined by the accident. And the other evening handsome Mademoiselle Thèse, who is creating such a sensation as "Duchesse de Puylaurens," in the successful new play of Cadet la Perle, at the Gaîté, when sweeping across the stage in all the glory of an immensely long train, got the said train caught upon a nail in the floor, and torn all across. As she was in the midst of one of the most exciting passages of the play, it was absolutely impossible for her to leave the stage; and she was therefore forced to go on, rendering a highly impassioned and tragic "situation" with the damaged draperies dragging about a yard and a half behind her. At the end of the scene, the Duchess exclaims, as she strides indignantly over the boards, "At length I quit this place, where I have been dying of shame and confusion!" and makes her exit through one of the gilded doors of the palace. The exclamation on the occasion in question was so whimsically appropriate that the spectators, who had been watching with ill-repressed merriment the ludicrous effect of the tattered train, burst into a roar of laughter, intensified by an uncharitable clapping of hands, as the unlucky heroine disappeared from the stage, drawing her tattered finery after her.

The new star of the musical world, Joachim, has just left Paris for Germany, taking with him the acclamations of the areopagus of the "capital of Europe," which has proclaimed him the first violinist of the day. He is said to be a man of good education, amiable temper, excellent manners, and ready wit. Before he left, a select group of his admirers, composed of the crême de la crême of the aristocratic, artistic, and literary world, gave him, in the renowned "onyx parlor" of the Café Riche, one of those wonderful suppers—elegant, luxurious, brilliant, and jovial—of which Paris considers itself to have the monopoly. Joachim has shown himself just enough to conquer the suffrages and sympathies of the judges. During the forthcoming exhibition he will be one of the innumerable candidates by whom the admiration of "all the world and his wife" will be so hotly disputed.

Another notable supper, on a vastly grander scale, but probably a good deal less amusing, is the one which wound up the last grand ball at the Russian court. This repast, extremely copious, and made up of the most consummate dainties of French culinary art, with young asparagus and the most exquisite fresh fruit, washed down with Château-Lafitte and Clicquot's champagne, was served in the splendid saloon known as the White Gallery. Two thousand guests sat down to this splendid banquet, each one with a plate of solid silver before him, serving to hold the yet more costly plates of Sèvres porcelain which received the viands. Among other indications that gastronomic science is successfully cultivated at the court of the Great Bear, is the announcement that the famous establishment of M. Tivolier, of Toulouse, the great rival of the Strasbourg houses in the manufacture of the world-renowned pâtés de foies gras, has just sent off, for the Imperial hunting lunches of his Majesty the Czar, two enormous terrines, measuring eighty centimetres in circumference, and each containing thirty-eight fat duck livers, highly truffled. At the Imperial ball in question, besides the innumerable gaslights in the halls and staircases, and countless lamps, the ball-rooms of the magnificent Winter Palace were lit up with fifteen thousand seven hundred wax candles. The toilettes at this splendid fête were worthy of the rest of the splendors. The Empress wore a white robe with a trimming of tulip-petals across the middle of the skirt, and a diadem and necklace of enormous pearls, mixed with magnificent diamonds. The bride, now the Grand Duchess Maria Federowna, wore a white dress covered with strips of narrow blue satin ribbon that crossed one another, forming lozenges all over it. At each point of intersection, these ribbons were held down by a small bouquet of flowers, the effect of which is said to have been equally "elegant and picturesque." All the heirs of crowns sent to represent "the old folks" at Dagmar's wedding had remained for this culminating fête; the Prince of Wales, true to his reputation, dancing incessantly and with unflagging animation all night.

One's thoughts involuntarily turn from the brilliance of that festive scene, reflected from the endless rows of enormous windows upon the steel-like ice of the Neva, to the returning bands of young Poles, driven into exile for their share in the recent upheaving of their country, and recalled to their homes by the amnesty granted by the Czar in honor of his son's marriage, who were slowly making their way back to Poland while those myriads of lights were burning. But they who were thus travelling homewards across the snowy expanse of Northern Russia numbered scarcely more than one-third of those who had been driven into exile; all the others were dead before the amnesty reached its destination, having succumbed, far from home and friends, to hardships, overwork, and heart-break, in the mines of Siberia.

A M. Croll has just been edifying the Academy of Sciences with some very complicated computations tending to show that the moon is constantly approaching the earth, and will infallibly, some of these days, fall upon it with a shock that will possibly be the death of our planet and of all its inhabitants; and really, when one reflects on the monstrous horrors and follies perpetrated by the latter, one can hardly refrain from bidding the moon "God-speed;" especially as a laborious compiler of statistics has just triumphantly demonstrated the fact that the number of masses for the dead already said by the Catholic Church being sufficient to ransom, four times over, the whole of the human souls that have quitted this earth since Adam, and that purgatory being therefore, as he expresses it, "to let," our race may await the predicted cataclysm with the comfortable assurance of finding "scope and verge enough" in the very quarters best fitted for its reception!

While the festivities of Compiègne are drawing to a close, a few of the more prominent members of the fashionable world have opened their salons without waiting for the return of the court. At a ball given by one of these personages a few nights ago, one of your fair country women who carried off the palm of beauty was equally remarked for the elegance and originality of her toilette. Her dress, of pink taffeta, was trimmed with two magnificent flounces of Alençon lace, the pattern of which represented a garland of roses and asters. These flounces were put on in festoons, the festoons being held up with bouquets of roses and asters alternately. The same trimming was continued on the corsage and in the head-dress. Lastly, from the waist depended a sort of tunic, of white brocatelle, embroidered with bouquets of the same flowers. This tunic, short in front and rounded at the corners, lengthened out behind so as to form a train, and would have been very graceful and charming in a picture, or in a large room containing no other lady. In a crowded ball-room, though much admired, the long and elegant train was necessarily walked upon by every pair of feet that came within a yard or two of its wearer.

The rejoicings in which so many of the enemies of crinoline have lately been indulging, in view of its approaching downfall, have been somewhat premature. Several leading sommités of the aristocratic world have shown themselves without wires; but the gay world, though its "cages" are now very greatly diminished in circumference, shows no signs of giving it up altogether. The new shape is "gored" to fit the figure, and only widens out just before it reaches the ankles. Its four hoops are all below the knees, and just serve to "throw out" the bottom of the dress, leaving the upper part as "slim" as the figure it drapes. To this new style of crinoline, designed for day wear, is adapted, for evening wear, what may be most graphically described as the watercart-prolongation, viz., a sort of supplementary train, or extra crinoline, consisting of four hoops, forming a long projecting train, which is hooked on to the bottom of the day crinoline, and serves to extend the absurd lengths of silk and satin which it is now the delight of Paris belles to display behind them, notwithstanding the perpetual trampling to which these streaming cascades and rivers of drapery are inevitably subjected in a crowded drawing-room.

Baron Brisse, whose daily bill of fare has contributed so largely to the popularity of Emile de Girardin's new paper, has just published, in a pretty little volume, the three hundred and sixty-five dinners that have already appeared in the Liberté. Madame Michelet has published a charming novel entitled "The Child," and dedicated to her husband. M. and Mme. Paul Taglioni have married their daughter to his Serene Highness Prince Joseph Von Windishgratz; and immense merriment seems to have been created at Compiègne by the exhibition of a group of "Marionettes," got up by one of the wittiest of the guests, and composed of all the prettiest women under the Imperial roof, of whom one was a "Speaking Doll;" another, a "Dancer;" a third, "Cinderella;" a fourth, "The Fair Rosamond;" a fifth, a "Ballad Singer;" a sixth, "Cleopatra;" a seventh, a "Flower-girl," and so on. The imitation by these ladies of the abrupt and jerking movements and stolidity of countenance of their wooden prototypes, is described as "perfect," and the whole display as "excruciatingly comic."

VOYAGES AND TRAVELS.

MR. JOHN FOSTER, the most uncomfortable person of the last two or three centuries, a man who delighted himself by elaborating doleful essays on "Decision of Character," "Popular Ignorance," and similar depressing subjects, not content with making himself as wretched as possible by sad consideration of the past history of the human race, the present unhappy estate of himself and every other human being, and the melancholy condition to which we are all to be reduced hereafter, used to torment himself, as the readers of his works may see, by reflecting despondently on the griefs and woes of posterity. In more than one place he has expressed in his habitual style—a style, by the way, which is the vehicle of thoughts so gloomy, and withal so dead, that one is reminded of an ornamented hearse—his painful sense of the hardships and labors to be endured by the people of the twentieth century. Prominent among these prospective miseries he placed the growth—and, of course, he expected their increase to be in a geometrical ratio—of books of travels. He said that a man going from one capital to another, by ordinary means of conveyance, is able to see for about a gunshot on each side of the road. The people and their manners the wayfarer observes in the stages and at the taverns where he sleeps. Then he writes a book. But, says Foster, still borrowing trouble, suppose the section of country which the tourist has seen to be represented on a map of the world, and it will be represented fairly by a light pencil-mark. Now consider, he goes on, the small part of the world which is covered by these pencil-marks; consider the nature of the tourist, and how necessary it is to him to produce these volumes; and, again, consider the enormous number of such volumes already printed, and the likelihood of improvement in the means of locomotion, and the imagination begins to faint under the idea of the task to be performed by posterity when the whole round world is just newly pencilled over.

In fact, however, we who are the posterity in question seem to be not staggering under our anticipated burden. Heads of families, we should say, have ceased to advise the young to "peruse voyages and travels," and shun novels, and probably the last uncle has presented the last nephew with the last copy of "Travels in the Interior Districts of Africa, by Mungo Park," which once every Young Man's Guide recommended, as combining instruction with entertainment. The army of old-time tourists who, when they went abroad, took blank books with them, and made them blanker, and then put them into print, does not now exist in anything like its old force. Mr. Hepworth Dixon, to be sure, occasionally "does" a country, and among us there is Mr. Bayard Taylor, who may be described as a sort of commercial traveller, and J. Ross Browne and G. Augustus Sala pretty continually go to and fro in the earth, and wander up and down in it. And of course the Englishman travelling in the United States regards the custom of old days as being still so much in force as to warrant him in writing an unreadable book of observations upon the Yankee, his cataract of Niagara, his Mammoth Cave, his manners, his beasts of chase, and the really astonishing growth of his towns. The Agassiz of these specimens of literature might construct one of them complete from such a sample bit of them as this, for instance, which we suppose to have been written in 1837, or thereabouts. We quote from memory: "Niles is a thriving town, on the St. Joseph River, on the borders of the Potawatamie territory. Churches, a printing-press, and a theatre are now in operation where but ten years ago the ring of the woodman's axe was rarely heard. We observed a mounted Indian riding down the bluff and looking toward the town, pondering, perhaps, on the fate of his race doomed to cruel extinction, and in the streets we saw several squaws wearing nose-rings and other barbaric ornaments. Of course, having arrived late at the hotel, it was impossible to procure supper after the regular feeding-time, and we had to content ourselves by 'liquoring up' in the bar-room and eating a dry 'cracker.'" The Frenchman, too, occasionally puts forth a work of philosophy and feeling, exposes the want of insight of his British brother, felicitates his country, France, ever generous and magnanimous, on having created this wonderful state, so strong, so new, so fresh, which lays the foundations of the future, while Europe is engaged in patching and sweeping clean its ruins of the past, and marvels at the respect of Americans for women; he shows how this is accounted for by the free institutions which Jefferson, profoundly impressed by the ideas of France, planted here, and how—alas! one must confess it—this respect for those beings so beautiful but so fragile, so destitute of thought, so without the care of the mother, loved by men immersed in business, whom the stranger can see to be adored but without influence, unsatisfied and full of vague longing—in fine, so unhappy—this respect is apparent rather than real.

But, on the whole, the readers, and consequently the writers, of books of travel have vastly decreased in numbers within twenty-five or thirty years. Volumes upon the grand tour are altogether out of date. Almost no Americans even inform us, nowadays, of the condition of Shakespeare's tomb, or make reflections on the evils of monarchies and dine with the aristocracy of England, or ramble with us through the galleries of continental cities, or describe the bay of Naples and the picturesque Italian peasant. The "English Reader," if it were now to be prepared for the use of schools, would no more contain its account of the Grotto of Antiparos than it would contain those extracts from Cicero against Verres, or its "How long, O Catiline! wilt thou abuse our patience?" There is no boy who now reads those tales of shipwreck in the polar seas or captivity among the Moors which once were bought for every Young Men's Library. We doubt if, among all the readers of the Boston Investigator, any one now buys M. Volney's evil-intentioned "Travels through Egypt and Syria in the years 1783, 1784, and 1785." M. Volney, by the way, after telling us that a small sum of money fell to him by inheritance, and that his thirst for knowledge disposed him to spend it in improving travel rather than otherwise, and that he decided upon going to the countries where arose those religious customs and ideas that have had so much influence on mankind, states that he was confirmed in his resolution to publish "by the difficulties attending travelling in those countries which have therefore but seldom been visited, and are but imperfectly known."

Doubtless this remark of his suggests a good part of the reason why this once most popular of all branches of literature has so much fallen into decay. Mr. Seward telegraphed the other day to a United States Consul residing not far from the pyramids. The revolt in Crete is detailed by the Hoe presses of Athens. A man can count the days required for journeying by rail and steamship from London, through the Pillars of Hercules and the Red Sea, to the East Indies and Far Kathay. What country or countries remain in which there are "difficulties attending travelling;" and, now that young English persons of both sexes "leave their copies of Tennyson on the top of Mont Blanc," what places are there which "have but seldom been visited, and are, therefore, but imperfectly known?" Exceedingly few. Palgrave was able to make a fine book about Arabia a while ago; and the interior districts of Africa since Mungo Park was there, if nobody knows how many stupid books they have furnished material for, have also been the subject of four or five excellent works. The springs of the Nile are now discovered though. Vámbéry's remarkable book is not to be forgotten either. And no doubt Turkestan and Thibet and Japan and Siberia, if all its story could be told, might fill some volumes which would be entertaining enough and would satisfy a good deal of curiosity. Besides, even half civilized and savage mankind are worth studying, for man is a problem that cannot well be looked at from too many points of view. But universal trade and railroads and telegraphs have made it so easy to see strange countries that there are hardly any strange countries left to see, and as the age of travel begins the age of books of travel disappears.

But this facility of locomotion and the excess to which the writing of travels was once pushed cannot be held the sole cause of the result we see. A fanciful man might speculate curiously whether the introspective tendencies of the modern mind may not have had much to do with diminishing a sort of literature essentially objective. And a historian of travel-writing, adopting this theory, might show the gradual descent from such writing as that of Herodotus in the first age of literature, or of Benjamin of Tudela or Sir John Mandeville in the Middle Ages, through the writings of those tourists who record for us their bills of fare and no sooner get from home than they think themselves of importance enough to have their indigestions chronicled, down to travellers like Sterne, whose journeys are sentimental and records of their whims, or like Chateaubriand, whose journeys are sentimentalistic and full of gushing eloquence. Possibly it may be that the study of the microcosm has interfered with the study of the macrocosm, and a century of which Hamlet is said to be the type, should hardly be much inclined to go far and wide seeking other men, or women either, under foreign foul collections of vapors.

It is the periodical press which has driven the labored volume of travels out of the field. The newspaper sends out a correspondent if there is war in Wallachia, and another to the Tyrol when war comes there, and others to India or Tennessee or the Crimea, or to Japan with the embassy, and another to Jamaica when the results of emancipation are to be studied, and to Bermuda to see how coolies work, and to the land of claret and olives when information is wanted as to the French system of division of land among heirs. No reader of the Herald need be ignorant that the Russians embrace and kiss their male friend though he should hold an official position of dignity, or that they drink lemon-juice in their tea. What country, from Sable Island to the Black Sea, has not been put into papers for "Harper's Monthly?" The Tribune has resident correspondents in all quarters of the globe. No book on England contains the tenth part of what one may read in the regular London correspondence of Cincinnati Gazettes and Chicago Tribunes; even from countries dead and gone one reads letters, as, for example, the dismal screeds that somebody sends to the Times from the late Confederacy, to say nothing of the Toledo Blade, with its correspondent at Confedrit Cross Roads; and, till newspapers that must be filled each day, and magazines that must be filled each month, shall be abolished, and until the people cease to thirst for immediate news from every point, where anything that can be called news is happening, we shall still see the world in the journals, and keep our Hakluyts on our newspaper files and in our cyclopædias.

ODONTALGIA.

A DRAMATIC POEM, BY PORCUSARDENS.

(The pain.) A FIERY shuttle weaves the nerves,
In hundred hissing rocket curves;
The white frost gnaws the inmost bones,
With stings of forty thousand drones.

(Looks in the Glass.) O fair round cheek! O screwed-up mouth!
O wild eye gazing to the South!
O saffron hair in serried knots!
O skin so white, so red in spots.

(Makes up his mind to endure it.) O timid blood that pales and palls,
It is thy love, 'tis pleasure calls.
Her eyes are bleared with cruel wine,
Her dropsied limbs with throbbing shine,
Her Gorgon locks inviting hiss,
She pouts her leprous lips to kiss.
Though men deride and shun and curse,
She is my boundless universe.
I rush and fall in her embrace,
I breathe the poison of her face,
Her burning arms are round me thrown.
Bound in that sweeter tropic zone,
I pant and faint, O friend of youth!
I die while kissing, tooth to tooth.

(Easy for a minute.) Now in delight
The spirit grows white,
Sprinkled with prayer
From sins of despair,
From dungeons of madness,
From tortures of groans,
Up into gladness
And fan-flowing tones.
Never to hide again
Under a sorrow,
Joy in the future ken,
Peace for the morrow.

(Aches again.) Ah! the red flame shoots, gleaming, athwart me;
The gray brain is surging;
She is my own love; she only taught me
Passionate twinging.

(Goes to the dentist's.) My forehead parts the rushing airs,
Orion climbs the starry stairs,
The boding planets stand in pairs.

(Sits in the chair and thinks about it.) I see the gleaming altar knives,
Her pleading struggle now revives,
In vain wild Odontalgia strives.

(Out.) The priest above the bloody cup
Stern frowns upon appealing hope,
And crushes down, harsh scrouges up.

(The last pangs.) Then, gasping pestilential sighs,
And turning up her hateful eyes,

NOTES ON REVIEWS OF ODONTALGIA.

The task is unpleasant of coming down from the grand, aristocratic Fifth Avenue, where Apollo is street commissioner and chief of police, and where one is associated with none so vulgar or so vile as newspaper contributors, but meets only the muses and gods of the first families, and mixing on the common path of literature with the crowd, where one's elbow is joggled by every scurrilous scandal-monger of the press. Yet I have decided to make the descent. My chief reason is, that my publisher has signified his unwillingness to have any further connection with me unless I defend my course. My friends also complain that some of my expressions are not so clear as they should be. But these I cannot attempt to elucidate. What my poem is about I shall endeavor to explain. I make these interpretations, be it understood, with an infinite contempt for all such as need them.

All nature's noblest works are composed of insignificant atoms. It is becoming, sometimes, to play the analytical chemist or the microscopist. Such is my present purpose; but let it be remembered that I regard whatever I may choose to examine as beneath disdain, to be cast out when my curiosity is satisfied. I deal with the infusoria, the animalcula, the animalculissima of literature—the editors and reviewers.

If I understand rightly the charge against me (and I have no certain means of determining that I do), I am condemned for having described scenes which well-behaved people are not in the habit of permitting in mixed society. Kissing is a bad habit. No well-brought-up young man will countenance it. But I do not commit myself to an approval of it—and he is a dolt who supposes I did, by saying in poetry that I kissed—any more than Snout the Weaver was a wall when he stood for it, or Bottom a lion when he "roared gently as a sucking dove." It is well known that Byron and Shelley were extraordinarily moral men (although I am not quite sure what the word moral means), and yet they wrote many verses about kissing, and some of them much plainer than those I have written.

My poem, which I have called "Odontalgia," is modelled on one Sappho thought of writing. The subject is ancient. The dragon which Cadmus killed affords the first classical instance of its power. It then inspired somebody to imagine men springing from teeth which had ceased to ache; and am not I justified in attempting, though in a feeble language and with a more modest genius, to picture a dental agony as a bacchanalian female?

My poem is entirely dramatic. Those for whom it was written—and I write only to please myself—appreciate this; and those to whom I have not addressed myself are simply beneath anathema. I designed to portray in the first stanza the exquisite torture of a culminated toothache "which hardens into rage and deepens into despair." In the second, the sufferer is represented as contemplating himself in a mirror. In the next three he gives way to the wild hopelessness of pain. Then comes a period of relief, beautifully expressed by the smoothly flowing verse. Suddenly the pang returns more excruciating than before. The victim-patient rushes for a dentist. In the first triplet he is represented as on his way. It is well to call special attention to the poetical character of these three lines. They contain more true feeling than many lyrical twaddlers have compressed into volumes. The first line tells the swiftness of the motion, and implies the pleasant cooling of the hot brow; the second indicates the time as early in the evening, and hints at the hurry in which the anxious man mounted the dentist's steps; the third refers to a mysterious conjunction of the stars, which none but the adepts in astrology can care to study or are able to know. The next two stanzas relate the extraction of the tooth; the last, the farewell pains and the relief.

It is humiliating to thus give all the points in detail. Foot-notes or marginal notes, of course, ought never to be allowed in a work of this kind. Coleridge, to be sure, added them to his "Ancient Mariner;" but this was probably to please a servile publisher and create a sale. If he followed his nobler nature and wrote for himself alone, he would not have descended to marginal instructions, fit only for the unrefined.

I cannot conclude without calling attention to one delicate beauty in my poem, which the spectacle-eyed Argus of the press would never spy. The fourth line reads:

> "With stings of forty thousand drones."

This is an exquisite imitation of classical humor. It is worthy to be catalogued with the sublime joke about the Greek calends. It is a well-known fact in natural history—known also to Pliny the Younger, I believe—that drones have no stings. I also mention, lest the infinitesimal nonentities called critics should pass it over, the elegant onomatopoetic language in which the extraction of the tooth is depicted:

> "And crushes down, harsh scrouges up."

And now I will ask how far off is the time when, as they do in France, a man can write what he chooses and publish what will pay? How long before a harmless person can print his own works for his own amusement, and not be made amenable to the foul-mouthed ignorance of an unsavory and corrupt censorship? When will other issues besides those of the American Tract Society and the New York Herald be received in profound public silence? In that happy day the swords shall be ploughshares, or the pruning-hooks spears, according to the wishes of their proprietors; the leopard may lie down with the kid if he desires, or the kid may eat up the leopard if he fancies him. Then all knowledge shall be a fenceless pasture for intellect, and art, divorced from conscience and taste, shall take full possession of the boundless regions of the illimitable perspective.

Fine Arts.

MR. CARPENTER'S PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN.

This engraving has suddenly appeared, without so much trumpet-flourish of anticipatory triumph as is usual in such cases. Yesterday we knew of it by vague rumor only; to-day we find it exists, having taken the world by surprise not by its appearance, which might have been expected, but by its extraordinary merit. The artist had very unusual opportunities to become familiar with his subject. It is seldom that a portrait painter has so good a chance as Mr. Carpenter had to observe and study the man he was to portray. He was brought as near to Mr. Lincoln as if he had been one of his immediate family, and, as is plainly to be seen in his interesting book, learned to love the man as truly as he admired the President; and the admiration and love acted together to make him a diligent student. This, which is plainly to be read in "Six Months at the White House," is said here to justify the numerous testimonials of those who pronounce this picture an admirable likeness. On this point, indeed, there can be but little doubt. Those who knew Mr. Lincoln the best are well satisfied with it; the testimony of photographs is strongly in its favor; and such testimony as that of Mr. Whittier, given in favor of another picture and quoted in The Nation four weeks ago, might, with vastly more truth, be given for this. The face is full of profound and true feeling; full of the gentle strength of the man, and the painter's knowledge of this and love of it; full of the "wise simplicity, the tender humanity, the pathetic sadness" of which Mr. Whittier speaks. There has not been truly given us before, what we possess in this, "the face of the speaker at Gettysburg, and the writer of the second inaugural."

The mechanical execution of the engraving is extraordinarily fine. Nothing at all approaching it in excellence has appeared in this country. In the case of Mr. Marshall's portrait, we had to call attention to the fact that the somewhat coarse and inaccurate engraving seriously injured the expressional value of the picture. In the plate before us, the engraver has done exactly his duty; the painter and he have worked together to produce a faithful and spirited and truly refined engraved head. It will take rank with the few engravings in which the very high merit has been attained of absolute accuracy of reproduction.

The engraving seems to be a fac-simile of a chalk-drawing. It is probable that Mr. Carpenter made, from his original life-size painted portrait of Mr. Lincoln, which was exhibited here at the time of the Great Funeral, and from memory, a drawing in crayon, which Mr. Halpin has exactly followed. We cannot be too grateful to the skilful engraver for his faithful performance of his task.

This work is of importance enough to warrant a rather minute criticism, and demands it as being the most important of American engravings. We go on, therefore, to speak of technical qualities of the work; and first of the hair, which is very successfully rendered. Its stiffness and springiness are faithful to nature, and the rendering of it by means of line engraving is very clever and complete. It is remarkably characteristic. The little, stiff fringe behind the right ear is delightful. It is not a "generalized" head of hair at all, but one of unmistakable individuality. That which is generally called the expression of the eyes, but which is to be found elsewhere than in the eye itself, the patient sadness which the muscles around the eye and mouth express, is so delicate and subtle that first inspection scarcely shows it. The under lip we believe to be too thin and straight for truth of portraiture. The hollow cheeks are almost perfectly rendered. We are sorry to see a disregard of local color, arguing, though it does not prove, a lack of love for color in the painter, whose original handiwork we have never seen. It is a great mistake and an injurious one to give so dark shadows on the shirt-bosom, under the cravat, and on the collar behind the whiskers. It is always wrong if the shadows on a white surface are made to vie in darkness with the lights on a black surface, as is the case here. The treatment of this picture as a vignette has been the partial cause of that mistake, which is made more injurious by that very treatment. It is impossible to wish this picture other than a vignette, for it is quite satisfactory as it is, but one would be glad to see the same head engraved with half-length figure and full background.

The prices at which the engraving is published are very low indeed. It is from two India proofs that we have gained our knowledge of the picture, and those are wonderfully cheap. It is very fortunate that this excellent portrait of our latest great man, which, moreover, is far superior as a work of art to all others that have appeared, should be offered at so low a price as to be within the reach of all.

ENGLISH PICTURES IN THE TENTH STREET EXHIBITION.

But few English pictures reach this country, and those few are seldom or never of the best or most notable. The work of the leading painters is seldom vouchsafed us. When we get it, it is their juvenile, their hasty, or even their slighted work. The "Millais" in the Gambart collection is an instance in point. It pretends to represent a very powerful and original painter; but it represents neither his power nor originality, except in the invention of the subject; it has nothing of Millais except the naturalness and freedom of action which he never misses, and the harshness of tone with which he has sometimes spoiled otherwise admirable pictures. This harshness, however, is not truly characteristic of the artist. We have not seen the large picture of "The Order of Release," for which this is a study, but the "Huguenot Lover" and the "Proscribed Royalist" were painted about the same time, and the "Black Brunswicker" some years later, and in none of these is there such terribly crude color as in this unfortunate study. It is actually no better than learner's work—the limbs that look as if pinched and bruised, the little red lumps which answer for baby's heels, the hectic flush in the triumphant wife's cheeks, the red-stained purple stockings that pass, unaccountably, into shoes. For the skilful disposition of the figures and the spirited action of each and every creature of the five, we have only admiration and gratitude. But it would have been better for those who do not love English art as much as they ought if this picture had never come.

Mr. G. E. Hicks is a young painter recently elected an associate of the Royal Academy. His large picture, "Before the Magistrate," is the first of his works that we have seen. It tells its own story with quite sufficient plainness; but it requires familiarity with English life and people to fully appreciate the subtle and skilfully made-out differences of character. The grave country baronet; the gentleman near, more familiar with town than his neighbor, M. P., perhaps; the attorneys, the clerk of the court, the reporter of the local paper; the scolding and threatening woman, and the ducks who help in the noise; the Irish youth who heartily enjoys the row, and the frightened girl beside him; the stately policeman and the grave and quiet workman who sits a silent spectator, in unruffled contemplation; all these and all the rest of the figures are unmistakable portraits. The drawing is very skilful and thorough, and without affectation. The color is fresh and bright, the local color of objects carefully studied and carried far into detail, rather over brilliant in some places, but generally not inharmonious. The whole picture contrasts strangely with some of the French pictures in the same room, a contrast worth observing and studying out.

Mr. W. C. T. Dobson is one of the very few living English painters of naturalistic tendencies who are indifferent to color. His very delightful pictures, delightful in sentiment and expression, are injured by grievous coldness of color. The little engraving, "Fairy Tales," so well known in our print shops, is really pleasanter to look at than the picture by Mr. Dobson from which it was made. The picture here, No. 25, the "Mushroom Gatherer," is not one of his best; indeed, has more of his bad color than of his good invention and sympathy.

Correspondence.

BAKER'S LEGGE'S "CHINESE CLASSICS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Among the "Literary Notes" in your paper of April 12, 1866, is a short review of Dr. Legge's "Chinese Classics," a work which you very justly characterize as entitled, by its deep and toilsome research, "to rank among the masterpieces of German scholars on the Greek and Latin poets." Your notice concludes by the announcement "that an American edition of it is in preparation under the editorial care of Mr. Baker, of the Public Library, Worcester, Mass.," the text followed being, "of course, that of Dr. Legge."

The first volume of this American edition fell into my hands yesterday, and I find it so gross an instance of literary piracy that I think so consistent an advocate of international copyright as yourself will thank me for exposing it. Mr. Baker's "editorial care" seems to have been exercised within the narrow compass of about seven pages of introduction, half of which is an extract from a popular cyclopædia! "The reader will enquire who was Confucius, and where did he live?" So says Mr. Baker. So he probably asked himself, for the first time, when Dr. Legge's work came to his notice, and he found his question answered by a "brief and clear account" in "Chambers's Encyclopædia," which he thereupon reprints for the benefit of the American public. The remainder of the introduction consists of a discussion of the doctrines of Confucius, which Mr. Baker argues have been depreciated by Dr. Legge. Now, considering that we can almost number on the fingers of one hand the men who are entitled, by their studies or experience, to measure swords with such a giant among sinologues as the Rev. Dr. Legge, it is rather startling to see this panoplied critic spring from the Worcester Public Library like a Minerva from the brain of Jove! Equally startling is Mr. Baker's mode of reconciling his theory of Confucius' deism with the absence of any mention of Deity in his writings, on the principle that

> "it will be found the rule rather than the exception, that the frequent use in worship or religions of the title of the Supreme Being comes from those who grew up in ignorance and profanity, and who can only date their interest in these things* to late periods of their life, or after sin has blighted or stained the character."

Again, Dr. Legge, whose life has been spent in missionary labors among the Chinese, and in studying the books of their sages, charges that people with a general want of truth. But Mr. Baker, who seems to have evolved an ideal Chinaman from the depths of his own moral consciousness, much as the Dutch philosopher evolved an ideal camel, retorts as follows:

> "Whether they (the Chinese) are greater liars than Dr. Legge's own nation, may not be left entirely for him to decide; but his case is doubtful with Confucius, to say the least."

Mr. Baker's ignorance of China and the Chinese is amply proved, if proof were otherwise wanting, by this sentence. One is almost tempted on reading it to wish for a literary tribunal, where the author of so ungenerous a sneer could be arraigned on a similar indictment to that which brings many of his idealized Chinamen before the Hong Kong police courts—I mean "piracy and stabbing."

If I have trespassed too much on your patience, it is because I deem this so-called editing of foreign publications a disgrace to our literary character, and a fraud on our reading public which deserves exposure and reprobation. In conclusion, I would say that if our great men of letters are destined to succeed in their struggle for an international copyright law, none will be more rejoiced than

Your obedient servant,

AN AMERICAN.

CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOK, 1866.

NOW READY, IN ONE HANDSOME VOLUME,

THE HUDSON,

FROM THE WILDERNESS TO THE SEA.

BY BENSON J. LOSSING.

ILLUSTRATED BY THREE HUNDRED AND SIX ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD, FROM DRAWINGS BY THE AUTHOR, AND A FRONTISPIECE ON STEEL.

In this work the publishers trust that they have placed before the public the best and most extensive series of illustrations of America's finest river ever collected in a single volume. Upward of three hundred original drawings from the pencil of BENSON J. LOSSING, and all specially engraved for the HUDSON, must give this book a claim upon the regard of all who dwell upon its banks, or who have at any time visited its broad waters; the more especially when the pictorial effect is enhanced by an accompanying text so amusing and at the same time so instructive as that of our artist-author.

Combining, as they have endeavored to do in the present instance, faithful though minute pictures of all that is remarkable in the entire course of the river, whether for its historical associations or its landscape beauty, with brief though accurate records of incidents which have rendered its waters memorable in American history, and its banks, in many places, treasures of natural beauty, it may be said that the attractions of the HUDSON are now brought into the library of every one whose education or taste has fitted them for their appreciation.

Having thus far spoken of the literary and artistic merits of their volume, the publishers hope that in giving necessary publicity to the work they may be permitted to call attention to those minor merits of paper and printing which do so much toward constituting the difference between a "book" and a "treasure of art;" they have chosen toned paper of the hue which they think best calculated to give a delicacy to their engravings; they have employed the most careful printers, and have engaged the services of binders who have essayed to make the external appearance of THE HUDSON alike worthy of its pages and of the noble stream whose course it professes to delineate; and on the whole they have essayed to produce a book alike worthy of the shelves of the library, the drawing room table of the lady, or the valise of the traveler who has determined to make himself familiar in part or in the whole with the

December 15, 1866.

THE NATION newspaper, now entering upon its Fourth Volume, was established as an essay towards creating a higher standard of public discussion and literary criticism than had been common, especially in the daily press, and while maintaining the fundamental principles of our republicanism, to be independent of parties and sects of whatever name. That it has been successful in this design is proved by the abundant and almost enthusiastic testimony of the most competent judges, and by the rank which it assumed and has held nearly from the start.

If the aim of its proprietors were self-gratulation, they might be content with this; but they desire to exercise a wider influence not only on the people at large, but especially upon the young, and, as auxiliary in both cases, upon those whose profession is teaching—in the school-house, the pulpit, at the bar, in the legislature. They have accordingly determined to offer an inducement to these classes especially, but not exclusively, to read THE NATION themselves and to procure subscribers for it.

One week after the first day of July, 1867, they will pay a premium of

to the person who shall, between the present time and the date above mentioned, have forwarded to this office the largest number of new subscriptions exceeding one hundred;

Provided, that each subscription shall be for a full year (beginning with any number); and that there shall be at least TWENTY competitors for the premium.

If there be fewer than twenty competitors, but at least ten,

FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS

will be awarded to the most successful.

In case of a tie, the order of time of receipt shall decide; and nothing sent after June 30, 1867, or received after July 7, will be allowed in the decision.

☞ A commission of fifty cents, on account, will be allowed for each subscriber as forwarded, to be retained by the person sending the name and subscription price; and the first ten subscribers will entitle the canvasser to a copy of THE NATION for one year, besides.

The attention of law, medical, and theological students in particular is called to this opportunity, which adds to positive reward for exertion the chance of a very considerable accession to their resources.

INSTRUCTIONS.

Every competitor should announce his intention with the first subscription forwarded, and should number each subsequent sending.

For $4 50, a receipt in full ($5) will be sent from this office directly to the person indicated.

Write legibly all parts of the address.

The address of the person awarded the premium will be promptly forwarded to each competitor.

Terms: Five dollars per annum, in advance.

The Week.

THE President has vetoed the District of Columbia Suffrage Bill, in a long and temperate message. His theory is, that although Congress has the exclusive power of legislation in the District, it is nevertheless bound by considerations, partly moral and partly political, to refrain from pushing the exercise of this power to its extreme limits, and that it ought not to make against the will of the citizens of the District changes in their political system which it could not make in the States, inasmuch as the District is not represented in the Legislature. One of the rights of the whites of the District he considers to be a monopoly of political power. The blacks are not represented either, but he does not think black claims for representation worth consideration. He says that the number of colored people in the District has increased from 14,000 in 1860 to 30,000 in 1867; and declares that if they get the suffrage there will be a greater influx than ever, and they will overwhelm the white residents by their numbers. But he says also the white population has increased from 60,000 to 100,000 in the same period, so that the residents of 1860 are overwhelmed by strangers already. For our own part we do not anticipate a great rush of colored gentlemen to the District in order to enjoy the privilege of voting. People vote only once a year, and in the interval between election days they are closely occupied with the quest of beefsteak and potatoes, and are guided in the choice of a residence mainly by their anxiety with regard to those commodities. It is almost a waste of space to discuss the message. The sum and substance of it is, that it is undemocratic to legislate for unrepresented whites but not for unrepresented blacks; that though Congress may not rule whites against their will, whites may rule blacks against their will; and that it is a monstrous outrage to force men to surrender a monopoly of power. Color in Mr. Johnson's mind is evidently an essential political distinction and not an incidental or artificial one, and he talks of whiteness with as much reverence as Froissart talks of "gentle blood." His sophistry is of the half-simple kind, and reads very much like the speeches delivered by the smart young men who sharpen their wits at debating clubs by standing up for the worst side.

WE are very glad, as every one should be who has the least respect for the United States Government, to hear that Senator Howard has offered a series of amendments to the bill regulating the selection of grand and petit jurors in Utah, which, if made law and executed, will destroy polygamy and make the life of an American citizen safe in that Territory, even though he should be in the displeasure of Brigham Young. Mr. J. S. Mill, in arguing for toleration for the Mormon system of polygamy, appears to fall into the mistake of supposing them to be residents in some wild country of their own and not citizens of a regular Territory of the United States, living among "Gentile" citizens, and therefore not disconnected, but closely connected, with the communities constituting the American Republic. In fact, Congress, which holds the only law-making power for Territories, has been for many years responsible for this practice, which every civilized nation condemns. But leaving out of view the question whether or not a Christian nation may so far interfere with individual liberty as to forbid polygamy, there cannot be the shadow of a doubt that Congress does only its bare duty when it protects American citizens in their rights of buying and selling goods, or preëmpting portions of the national domain, in Utah, without being murdered by a "saint." This, we hold, it ought to have done long ago; and if it had not been shamefully remiss, we should not now be bearing the disgrace of seeing the representatives of the United States in Salt Lake City afraid to venture out of their houses after nightfall for fear of assassination. But late is better than never, and Senator Howard's amendments strike at the root of the trouble, though no doubt a military force will be necessary to carry them into effect. The proposed law sets the penalty for pretending to have more than one lawfully married wife at a fine of not more than $10,000, nor less than $500, or imprisonment at hard labor for a term varying from four years to three months. It is made lawful for a "sealed" wife to sue for wages during the time when she lived with her spiritual husband. The person who performs the marriage rite according to the Mormon ceremonial is to be imprisoned at hard labor for a year or more, and fined one thousand dollars or a greater sum, at the discretion of the judge. Trials Mr. Howard would have without jury before a judge of the United States District Court. What moved him to incorporate into his bill a provision which so flagrantly violates the fundamental law of the land, we do not know. Mr. Howard, if he will pardon us the supposition, may some day do something as bad as be spiritually married to one more wife than he ought to have. We are forced to suppose that he would make no complaint if he were thereupon sent to the penitentiary for five years without trial. But for ourselves—we also may become such a criminal as we have supposed Mr. Howard—we prefer trial by a jury of our peers, as the Constitution provides; and in the interest of ourselves and those like us, we protest against this rage for removing the ancient landmarks which seems to possess certain Congressmen, as well as too many out of Congress.

MR. ASHLEY's resolution for an enquiry into the President's conduct, with a view to his impeachment, has been referred to the Judiciary Committee. The question of impeachment, as we have said more than once, is a question of expediency. We are opposed to it, because we think his trial, even if he were convicted, would bring more evil on the country than his continuance in his office can possibly work. With anybody who thinks our affairs are not already sufficiently complicated, there would be no use in arguing; but no candid man, no man who has "no axe to grind," or can see two sides of a question, can help seeing that an impeachment of the President in our present political and financial condition would cause terrible confusion. There is always some little thing which, in the eyes of ardent men, will, if left undone, ruin the country. Just now it is the impeachment of Mr. Johnson, but the country is not easily ruined, and he is not a formidable enemy. The world moves in spite of his struggles, and justice will reign yet, no matter who sits in the White House.

When the war broke out the Executive assumed the right of suspending the habeas corpus, that is, of exercising perhaps the highest and gravest act of government, without consulting the legislature, and Congress submitted to the usurpation for two years, during which there is no question the power of arbitrary arrest was greatly abused. In March, 1863, an act was passed ordering lists of all persons in custody under military orders to be furnished to the district courts, and directing that these persons should be either indicted and tried in regular form or discharged from custody. This act was utterly disregarded. Lists were not furnished regularly to the courts, and prisoners against whom grand juries found no bills were not only not discharged, but were tried in defiance of the law by military commissions for all sorts of offences. One of these cases has now come before the Supreme Court, and all military commissions organized in the teeth of the act of March, 1863, have been pronounced wholly illegal, which they were, including that by which Mr. Lincoln's assassins were convicted. The executive at that time seemed to revel in the breach of acts of Congress, and did so with the approval of a large portion of the public. And now, mark the consequences. Mr. Johnson entered on the office in the midst of this general and strange indifference to the authority of the legislature, and, not unnaturally, being a very narrow-minded person, concluded that he was the government, and that the sole business of Congress was to vote money, and began to act accordingly, and we know with what result. The Supreme Court then reasserts solemnly the jurisdiction of Congress over personal liberty, and denies the right of the Executive to touch it arbitrarily, and forthwith some of the very men who were most frantic last summer in exalting the legislature and denouncing the President's usurpation begin to talk of "impeaching" the judges for doing what they were bound to do, before God and man, come what might. We have commented elsewhere on the conduct of the court in embarking in a discussion on points which came in no way before it. But we hope this whole matter, grave and important as it is, will open the eyes of the public to the great danger there is that the breaches of law and of propriety into which over-zeal on behalf of the right now carries us may be one day used against us in defence of the wrong. It is not very long since there was a majority in the United States on the side of wickedness, and we may all live to see it again; if we should, we may have sore need for our own protection of all the forms and traditions of the law and the Constitution.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens and Mr. Spaulding engaged on Monday in a passage of arms which a portion of the House found simply funny, but which no decent man can read without shame and confusion. For humor of that kind a very low pot-house is the proper place, and the age of the leading actors in the farce rendered the performance double revolting.

It is confidently stated in private circles, indeed an inkling of the matter has already got into the newspapers, that some "spicy revelations" have recently been made in the examination upon oath, by a Congressional committee, of a gentleman who holds an exceedingly lucrative office under the United States Government in this city. Twenty thousand dollars, it is said, were given away in two very opportune presents, to two ladies supposed to be of very great influence in Washington official society, just at the moment when the greatest exertions were making in behalf of the various candidates for the office referred to—just at the time, in fact, so the story goes, when the papers that would have given the office to another applicant than the present incumbent were already made out, and awaited only the signature which for reasons interposing, was never given. Presents of twenty thousand dollars are not bestowed by sagacious merchants without expectation of return. And, it may be added, rumors to the contrary notwithstanding, sagacious merchants do not, by obliging and easy resignation, give up what their money has purchased, but fight hard for it at whatever risk of seriously incommoding statesmen, politicians, and veteran lobbyists. We have little doubt that the whole affair will yet see the light in the report of the Judiciary Committee, if not, in that of the committee which made the enquiry above mentioned.

The New York Tribune argues strongly against the impeachment of the President; but says, if he is impeached, "his interference in the Fenian troubles last summer, whereby the honor of America was sacrificed to please England, ought to be enquired into." We may infer from this sage proposition what a melée the trial would be. The Chicago Republican also wants to impeach the judges of the Supreme Court; and if the rage for this form of procedure continues to spread, there will hardly be one judicial or legislative officer in the country who will not soon be on his trial. General Grant is trying very hard, and has hitherto been very successful in keeping out of the fray, but both parties seem to long to get at him, and his opinions as commander-in-chief on the various political questions of the day are discussed and guessed at with a gravity which a stranger might fairly take to be an indication for our readiness for a military dictatorship. Wendell Phillips wants him to do justice sword in hand, which we fervently hope he will not, as when soldiers in a republic begin this sort of thing they are apt to keep at it, and do not only justice but a great deal more. If Mr. Phillips finds himself before he dies carried off the platform by a corporal's guard, of which there is, of course, no probability, he will not be the first over-eager reformer who got an over-dose of his own medicine.

The Chicago Republican announces solemnly that "there is a number of military officers in the House who are ready to take the strongest ground against judicial usurpation," that is, who are ready to impeach the Supreme Court judges for deciding that an act of Congress is law; buts adds that "in the Senate there are no soldiers, and any movement towards impeachment would be hopeless in the present Senate." It is, of course, impossible to say where this folly will end, but the public, we feel satisfied, will have had enough of it before the winter is over.

There is a story afloat that some of the artists are agitating for a tolerably heavy tax on all pictures imported from Europe, by way of protection to their own works. We doubt the truth of the story, but we, nevertheless, are surprised that gentlemen who find their pictures unsalable have not hit upon this method of "working them" off long ago. From the standpoint of a bad painter, which, without ever having had a brush in our hands, we conscientiously endeavor to take, our only objection to this scheme is that it does not go far enough. The bill ought to contain a provision forcing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase all pictures of native artists that nobody else will purchase, for the formation of a "grand gallery." Our opinion—still from this standpoint—has always been that all bad painters and bad writers ought to be supported by the country, though we have always been willing to leave the paltry details of the arrangement to Congress. If a man writes or paints as well as he can, and he still cannot get a living, who is to blame but the rascally public? We need hardly say we are in favor also, on our own account, of the exclusion of all foreign publications. We think, for example, that The Nation and "North American Review" ought to be protected against the English weeklies and quarterlies, and also against Every Saturday and Littell's Living Age. The Japanese and Chinese are much decried in these days, but they at least know how to foster native art and literature.

Mr. Rostine Parker, the conductor on the Jersey Railroad, has thought proper to clear himself of the charge of abusive and insulting language to Mrs. Kennedy by bringing a libel suit against this journal. We obtained from his lawyer a denial that he (Parker) was the person who had the interview with Mrs. Kennedy, and we gave him last week the full benefit of that denial. On enquiring of the manager of the road what he supposed was Parker's object in attempting to clear his character by bringing an action instead of offering an explanation, we were informed that his course was probably due to the feeling prevalent amongst the employees of the road that if one newspaper were heavily mulcted in damages, it would make others more careful how they commented on the sayings and doings of these gentlemen. An action per se has, however, no terrors for us. We are afraid of doing people injustice, but we are not afraid of being sued. So we shall now ask whether Mr. Rostine Parker knows who the employee was, be he brakeman, conductor, or baggage-master, who saw Mrs. Kennedy on the day of the accident, and who swore at her, reviled her, and put her off on the track with her baby in her arms to look for her father's body. If he does not know, has he ever tried to find out? If he does know, has he ever reported the ruffian to the manager? Has the manager instituted any investigation into the matter? Has he discovered the culprit, or, if he has, does he still retain him in the employment of the company? We may add that it is inconceivable that there should be any difficulty in discovering who he was; and if known and not punished, we have no hesitation in saying that his superiors are accomplices in his ruffianism. We shall continue these enquiries in the interest of decency, humanity, and civilization until the public gets a little more light on the subject than it has at present.

THE Pope has shown himself wise enough to resist the counsels of the Jesuits, who wanted him to quit Italy along with the departing French troops, and docile enough in coming to an understanding with Victor Emanuel to render the proposed and much-debated visit of the Empress Eugénie to Rome quite superfluous. He is evidently out of humor with Napoleon, and his farewell address to his foreign defenders was scarcely less malicious towards that sovereign than his expressed regret, half a year ago, for the loss of Orsini to the Church. He had heard, he said, that the Emperor was in great bodily pain, and he prayed for his relief; disturbed, also, in mind, and he prayed for the repose of his conscience; and he intimated that, as the French were a Christian people, they richly deserved a Christian ruler. Such a message, which may fairly be called ungrateful, is a proof that the Pope as well as Italy has done with France, and enables us to confine our attention to the Peninsula in forecasting the probable settlement between the kingdom and the Papacy. The mission of Signor Tonello, who was armed with the most liberal concessions, to Rome appears to be accomplishing just what Ricasoli meant it should—the exoneration of the government even in the eyes of the Pope. But it leaves untouched the bottom of the Roman question, and the absolute unity of Italy is yet a great way off. The execution of the convention of the 15th of September simply converted an international into a domestic controversy.

THE spirit of revolution in Candia dies hard, if indeed it is doomed to be crushed out. Except for considerations of high state policy, otherwise known as the balance of power, the Christian powers would undoubtedly long since have interfered in behalf of the heroic victims of Turkish despotism. But France already stands well with the Porte, and England is anxious to stand better, and both dread the Byzantine mania of Russia. The dismemberment of the Turkish empire, however desirable for the homogeneousness of Europe, and however inevitable, is not to be hastened by Powers which need not dread the shock. Hence the interference of Greece in the Cretan conflict is regarded very jealously, France half threatening the none too stable kingdom, and England wrapping herself in her customary neutrality. Nevertheless, a Greek steamer makes its regular trips between the main and the island, and the American consul at Canea has refused to recognize so ineffective a blockade as this fact implies. The fighting is still maintained with varying success, but unvarying ferocity on the part of the Turks. As a sort of back-fire, an insurrection of Greeks in Thessaly is reported, and the Servians are clamorous in demanding that the Turks shall withdraw from the fortress of Belgrade, which, though it menaces the country, would seem to be too remote and too dilapidated to be held in case of war. Austria is involved in this phase of the "Eastern question," for the Servians, having not unreasonable apprehensions of being absorbed by her, shrink from her with a corresponding aversion.

THE FREEDMEN.

AMONGST the laws of North Carolina is a statute disfranchising all persons who have been guilty of larceny and similar offences, and have been punished therefor by whipping. In order to "head off," as is said, any action of Congress tending to enfranchise the negroes, the whites of that State are taking every opportunity of arresting them, convicting them of various petty crimes, and sentencing them to be publicly whipped. This is occurring in all parts of the State, and an army officer asserts that the subject is freely discussed amongst the members of the Senate and House of Commons, one of them remarking on one occasion: "We are licking them in our part of the State, and if we keep on we can lick them all by next year, and none of them can vote." Says the officer mentioned above:

> "I cannot resist the conviction that there is a deliberate and general purpose to seize negroes, procure convictions for petty offences punishable at the whipping-post, and thus disqualify them for ever from voting in North Carolina, whatever may be the future action of the nation."

—In a letter to Secretary Stanton, Gen. Howard presents some estimates of the number of blacks in the South at the present time, which are compared as follows with the census of 1860:

	1860.	Dec., 1866.
North Carolina	361,522	361,522
Louisiana	350,373	350,373
Florida	62,677	62,677
Virginia	548,907	500,000
South Carolina	412,320	375,000
Mississippi	437,404	420,000
Arkansas	111,259	100,000
Georgia	465,698	400,000
Missouri	118,563	100,000
Texas	182,921	200,000
Tennessee	283,019	300,000

The colored population of Mississippi, as printed in the letter, is 320,000; but as General Howard speaks of only a "slight" decrease in this State, there is evidently a mistake which needs correction. From the foregoing figures it appears that there has been a good deal of shifting and much presumable loss among the blacks. The Gulf States have contributed to fill up Texas and Tennessee, where an urgent demand for labor, on the one hand, and a loyal government, on the other, offered a refuge from idleness, precarious pay, persecution, and wicked laws. Kansas and Iowa have drained Missouri and Arkansas; Maryland and the District of Columbia, and indirectly the entire North, have lightened Virginia. Louisiana may have parted with some of her blacks, but must also have received many, acting, perhaps, as a sieve to Texas. The emigration to Florida will be more apparent hereafter. Altogether, about 225,000 blacks are unaccounted for in the States enumerated. The natural increase in the past six years would have been about 350,000, and allowing that 100,000 will represent the number who have removed to, and still inhabit, States not included in the list above, we have a deficit of nearly half a million of colored people, whom war, want, anarchy, and a fictitious peace under liberty have repressed or destroyed. And this figure would undoubtedly be swelled from the statistics of Alabama and Kentucky.

—The colored people of Delaware are taxed to support schools to which they are not admitted. A public meeting was held at Wilmington, December 27, to organize an association like that in Baltimore, which has accomplished so much for the education of the colored people of Maryland. Judge Bond made a capital speech, in the course of which he said that the opponents of negro education must be treated like skittish horses—brought up to the school-house and made to rub their noses against it. It will take something more than this to convert Gov. Saulsbury, whose message to the Delaware Legislature opposes the Constitutional Amendment, questions the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act, recommends prohibiting the immigration of negroes, and eulogizes the practice of selling blacks into slavery as a punishment for crime.

—The old Emigrant Aid Company, of Boston, has sent a trustworthy agent to Florida, to report upon the attractions offered by that State to emigrants. It depends upon the voluntary subscriptions of its friends for the means thus to continue the good work which it began in the case of Kansas twelve years and more ago.. Mr. T. B. Forbush, 23 Chauncey Street, Boston, is the secretary of the company.

The lately published volume of Mr. Bancroft's "History of the United States" has excited sharper criticism and closer investigation than any of the previous ones. The actions of prominent generals of the Revolution are here related, and their descendants are naturally anxious to have that record as honorable as possible. The families of Gen. Greene, Gen. Wayne, and Gen. Schuyler are particularly indignant at what they consider the unworthy treatment that Mr. Bancroft has accorded to their ancestors. Mr. George Washington Greene has published, through Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, an elaborate vindication of Gen. Greene from the charges, or rather from the slurs and innuendoes, of Mr. Bancroft. He prints various unpublished letters of Gen. Greene and others, which Mr. Bancroft has had access to, but which he seems to have read carelessly and to have misused. Mr. Bancroft is, of course, at perfect liberty to have his own opinion of the merits of Greene as a soldier, but no preconceived bias or even honestly formed judgment will warrant him in inserting in one letter a passage written in another to a different person, or in altering words and phrases so as to convey a different meaning. That Mr. Bancroft has misrepresented Gen. Greene seems conclusively shown in the pamphlet we have mentioned, though such misrepresentation may not be so great as Mr. Greene thinks. We understand that Mr. Henry B. Dawson will publish in the "Historical Magazine" a vindication of Gen. Wayne, particularly in relation to the Paoli affair. Mr. Dawson has had the use of all the Wayne papers, which are all carefully preserved, and drew from them the materials for his valuable monograph on Stony Point. Similar controversial arguments are being prepared with reference to Gen. Schuyler's management of the campaign in Northern New York. In the number of the "Galaxy" for January 1, Mr. William L. Stone has a valuable and interesting paper on the death of Jane McCrea, which shows that all the best authorities are against Mr. Bancroft's version of that matter. Mr. Bancroft has retained the traditional story of the murder of Miss McCrea by two Indians sent to bring her to her lover, which is so familiar to all children from the wood-cuts of the scene given in all the cheap histories of the Revolutionary War. Mr. Thomas C. Amory, of Boston, will print in the next number of the "Historical Magazine" a vindication of his grand-uncle, Gen. Sullivan, as a patriot and a soldier. Mr. Wm. B. Reed, of Philadelphia, has also in press a pamphlet of about 160 pages refuting Mr. Bancroft's strictures on his grandfather, President and Adjutant-General Reed.

—The first number of Northern Lights, the new weekly magazine, edited by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe and Edmund Kirke, has appeared. It consists of thirty-six pages, clearly but cheaply printed in double columns, with an outside sheet, similar in appearance to Every Saturday, though the pages are a trifle wider. In this number Mrs. Julia Ward Howe has a poem which, with bad enough taste, she styles "The Two Rs," it being about Ristori and Rachel. The effect is quite funny when she calls Rachel "the slim Judean." Also, we get a sketch by Petroleum V. Nasby, and Fitz Hugh Ludlow, Frederick W. Shelton, Edmund Kirke, and others, write articles, one of them a continued story of New England life.

—An imitator of Mr. Carlyle in his historical style has sprung up in the person of Mr. Francis Espinasse, who has just published the first volume of the "Life and Times of François-Marie Arouet, calling himself Voltaire." Not having any of Mr. Carlyle's genius, nor any of his own, he has copied the faults and eccentricities of his master, and successfully imitated no one of his excellences. In the six hundred pages which he devotes to the account of Voltaire, from his birth to his arrival in England, from 1694 to 1726, he has given all the facts that could be raked together with regard to Voltaire's life, many of which are new and interesting. But by far the greater portion of that space is taken up with a description of the state of the world at that time, and photographs of every person and thing that were in any way connected with or could possibly have had any influence on his hero. They are, for the most part, very blurred, and show blotches and patches instead of clear-cut outlines.

—One of the best Anglo-Saxon scholars of England, Mr. Oswald Cockayne, is preparing for publication an Anglo-Saxon dictionary, which will contain views of Anglo-Saxon philology essentially different from those of Dr. Bosworth, his great opponent. A new edition of Dr. Bosworth's dictionary is in press as one of the Clarendon Press series. It is to be hoped that the faults in the English index, which were pointed out by Mr. Marsh in last week's Nation, will be there corrected. Mr. Short is to add such a list of English words, with their Gothic equivalents, to the Gothic Glossary he is preparing for the Philological Society. Mr. Cockayne is about to publish another number of "The Shrine," his occasional periodical that he prints when he has an opponent to demolish or some valuable relic of Anglo-Saxon literature to preserve.

—Mr. Robert Buchanan has recently published a volume of translations of Danish ballads, with the title, "Ballad Stories of the Affections from the Scandinavian." It is Mr. Buchanan's highest praise that they do not read like translations. Being a collection of both ancient and modern ballads, the book shows well their distinctive difference in spirit. The old ballad is the product of childhood in literature and in art; a good modern ballad can be produced only when the poet tries to enter into "the freshness of the early world," and has children or the heart of child-like persons in his thoughts. A true modern ballad concerns either children or peasants. Nearly all others are pinchbeck imitations of the antique, easily distinguishable by their ring. The freshness and simplicity of any modern ballad, as of some of the pieces of Oehlenschläger in this volume, are that of art looking back to a simple subject, not the naïveté and unconsciousness of a half-awakened and still stammering national speech. "Sir Ebbe Skamelson," "Signelil, the Serving-Maiden," and "Cloister-Robbing," are three of the best of the old ballads in this beautiful Christmas book, which Messrs. Routledge & Sons have published, with some good illustrative wood-cuts.

—A valuable and very necessary book to students of zoölogy has been begun by Dr. Albert C. L. G. Günther. It is "The Record of Zoölogical Literature," of which the first two volumes, for the years 1864 and 1865, have recently been published by John Van Voorst, London. The mass of zöological literature has lately become so great, so many societies are in active operation that publish "proceedings" and "journals," that naturalists have long felt the need of some digest or index. There are in London twenty periodical publications which contain contributions and notices on every department of zoölogy. In Scotland and Ireland there are as many more, and on the continent of Europe they are more yet. In America, both North and South, Asia, and Africa, there are numbers of societies of natural history. Without some such work as this of Dr. Günther's, it is very hard for the enquirer to ascertain whether his discoveries have not been previously made and noted in some remote part of the world. The only previous work of reference of this character has been the reports on zoölogy attached to Wiegman's "Archiv für Naturgeschichte," now edited by Professor Trostel. Each department of the "Record," mammals, birds, etc., is commenced with a list of the various publications which have appeared relating to its special subject during the preceding year. To the title of each work are usually appended some general remarks on its nature and scope, forming a more or less complete analysis of it. A second special part of the "Record," as it is termed, follows, in which the new species and new genera described during the year, together with all other novel information concerning each form, are arranged systematically. The mammals, reptiles, and fishes are treated of by Dr. Günther himself; the birds, by Professor Alfred Newton, of Cambridge; the mollusca, by Dr. Eduard Von Martens, of the Museum of Berlin; the molluscoidea and crustacea, by Mr. Greene, of Cork, Dr. Perceval Wright, of Dublin, and Mr. Spencer Bate. The section relating to insects, myriapods, and arachnidans is the compilation of Mr. W. S. Dallas. His work in the "Record" for 1865 extends over nearly three hundred and fifty closely printed pages, and embraces notices of upwards of four hundred and fifty different publications relating to this subject issued during the year.

—In consequence of the hints given in the Reader and other papers last summer, subscriptions have flowed in to the Sanskrit Text Society to over £1,200. Much of it has been subscribed by Indian princes and merchants. The society secured for its first text the "Mimansa," of which Professor Goldstücker, its director, has long had many sheets printed, so that two parts were immediately issued, and the remainder will be published soon. With the last part will appear an introduction to the book, and a discussion as to its place in Hindu philosophy.

SCIENTIFIC.

Influence of Water on the Production of Milk.—In a communication to the French Academy of Sciences, Dr. Dancel discusses the influence of liquid food and of water upon the quantity of milk secreted by herbivorous animals. It is found that by inciting cows to drink large quantities of water, the quantity of milk yielded by them can be increased several quarts per day without materially injuring its quality; the amount of milk obtained is approximately proportional to the quantity of water drunk. Cows which, when stall-fed with dry fodder, gave only from nine to twelve quarts of milk per day, at once produced from twelve to fourteen quarts daily when their food was moistened by mixing with it from eighteen to twenty-three quarts of water per day. Besides this water taken with the food, the animals were allowed to drink at the same intervals as before, and their thirst was excited by adding to the fodder a small quantity of salt. The milk produced under the water regimen, after having been carefully analyzed and examined as to its chemical and physical properties, was adjudged to be of good quality; excellent butter was obtained from it.

The precise proportion of water which can thus be given to cows with advantage is a point not readily determinable, since the appetite for drink differs very considerably in different individuals. But by observing the degree of the appetite for drink in a number of cows, by taking note of the quantity of water habitually consumed by each of the animals in the course of twenty-four hours, and contrasting this quantity with that of the milk produced, Dancel asserts that any one can see that the yield of milk is directly proportional to the quantity of water absorbed. He asserts, moreover, in as many words, that a cow which does not habitually drink as much as twenty-seven quarts of water per day, and he has met with such, is actually and necessarily a poor milker; she will give only from five and a half to seven quarts of milk per day. But all the cows he has seen which drank as much as fifty quarts of water daily were excellent milkers, yielding from nineteen to twenty-three quarts, or more, of milk. In his opinion, the quantity of drink consumed by a cow is a valuable test of her worth as a milk-producer.

In the main, these experiments do but illustrate with greater precision facts which have long been familiar to practical men. The nurse, when suckling the human infant, does not naturally consume much more solid food than before, but of liquids she drinks much larger quantities. After a cow has begun to give milk she drinks far more water than before; the quantity of water consumed increasing, according to Dancel, from between eleven and eighteen quarts per day, or even less, to twenty-seven, thirty-six, or forty-five quarts, or more—at least for the breed of cattle upon which he has experimented.

As far as practical information goes, we have gained very little on Virgil (Georgics, III. 394):

> "At cui lactis amor, cytisum lotosque frequentes
> Ipse manu salsasque ferat præsepibus herbas.
> Hinc et amant fluvios magis, et magis ubera tendunt,
> Et salis occultum referunt in lacte saporem."

We are only able to state, somewhat more precisely than Virgil did, the effect of following these excellent directions.

As Dancel justly urges, however, the principle here laid down has hitherto not been sufficiently recognized by men of science in many of the experiments which have been undertaken for the purpose of comparing the value of different kinds of fodder, and of determining the influence which they severally exert upon the production of milk.

Though presented as a physiological disquisition, and by no means without value from the physiologist's point of view, Dancel's paper will be more likely to attract general attention from its bearing upon the vexed subject of adulteration. If the accuracy of the proposition be admitted, that by inducing a cow to drink every day twenty-odd quarts of water more than her accustomed ration, several additional quarts of milk can be obtained from her, and if the practicability of the operation be accepted as proved, then the question at once arises as to whether or no the method now under discussion will be in any way preferable to the time-honored custom of adding a certain amount of water to the milk after it has left the cow. The customary method, at first sight, certainly seems to be simpler than the plan now hinted at, of pouring six times the needful quantity of water down the cow's throat; but it is well-nigh certain that the milk thus indirectly "extended," à la Dancel, will be superior in quality to milk watered to the same extent after the milk has been taken from the cow. Not only will analysis be likely to exhibit a far closer approximation to the composition of ordinary normal milk in the former case than in the latter, but we may be sure that milk diluted within the animal will receive a certain share, at least, of that elaboration and commingling of its ingredients which is as yet inimitable by man, and which so widely distinguishes organized matter from that which is unorganized. The milk of the water-soaked cows must still be regarded as milk—not as adulterated milk. Milk of quality somewhat inferior to the ordinary it may be, in spite of M. Dancel's opinion to the contrary, but it is still the animal secretion, milk, and not a mere mixture of milk and water. Here, as in a host of other cases of so-called adulteration, it would be well if dealers would only adopt some system of just adaptation of price to quality; just as in the Russian markets one may choose between first, second, and third quality eggs, according to the length of his purse and the delicacy of his taste.

THREE VOLUMES OF WAR POETRY.[*]

It is instructive, or it would be if the lesson had not been long ago read and long ago known by all men, to read together these books of Northern and Southern war poetry, and observe the contrasted spirit breathed by each. As poetry, not much is to be said for any one of the three. Mr. Cutler's book is of the order of the best college magazine or class-day "Poems;" as smooth all of it, and nearly all of it quite as imitative, as this, for example:

> "A great hot plain from sea to mountain spread;
> Through it a level river slowly drawn,
> He moved with a vast crowd, and at its head
> Streamed banners like the dawn."

But the little volume contains not a thought or a sentiment of which a good man of enlightened mind need ever be ashamed. Of half the Southern poems it may be said that they might have been produced by boys who had begun to drink whiskey and had not done declaiming Albert Pike's "Seminole's Reply." They are very often nothing more than a semi-articulate, bloodthirsty screech, and represent as well the sentiment of the section whose muse stands responsible for them as Mr. Cutler's verses express what undoubtedly was the average Northern sentiment, which was never in the whole course of the war, and since the Southern defeat never has been, ferocious or vindictive. Those pieces in Miss Mason's volume or Mr. Simms's for which this description would be too harsh are still mostly below the ordinary standard of worthless newspaper poetry, and with not many exceptions when they are not execrable for their savagery are laughable for many reasons.

Taking up Mr. Simms's book and turning over the pages we are first struck by the amusing variety of opprobrious titles for Northerners. Shimei himself, a secessionist of old times, and bringing all his Hebrew intensity of spirit to bear upon the art of cursing, might have taken one of our secessionists as a master. "The dastard foe" is a common form of address and description, and besides this we find "the vandal foe," "the haughty foe," as Simms says, "with his aggregated powers, hell's hate and venom working in his heart," "the modern Huns," "the Vandal bands," "the Northern Thugs," "the demon Goths," "the bastard slaves"—which hints very strongly at a way slaves had in the South as well as the North—"the myrmidons of hell," "the fiend and slave," "the foul enemy," "the usurper," "the despot's hireling," "the brutal corsairs," "the ruffian types of might," "the foul serpent," "the north-wolf," "the braggart foe," "the dastard spoilers," "the vile invading horde," "the mad fanatic," "the savage Hun and merciless Dane," "the Sodom-hearted butchers," "the foul and coward hangmen;" and all in one alliterative line the unfortunate Yankee is entitled "pest, pilferer, puppy, pretender, poltroon"—why not polecat and pusillanimous pig it is hard to see, the more that Southern bards are apt to give metre rather cavalier treatment. There is no end to the list; we take leave of the subject in this stanza, written by a Kentuckian and addressed to citizens of the border States:

[*] "War Poems. Elbridge Jefferson Cutler." Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1867.

"The Southern Poems of the War. Collected and arranged by Miss Emily V. Mason." Baltimore: John Murphy & Co. 1867.

"War Poetry of the South. Edited by W. Gilmore Simms." New York: Richardson & Co. 1867.

"The bastard and the traitor,
The wolf-cub and the snake,
The robber, swindler, hater,
Are in your homes—Awake."

It must, one would think, bring a blush to the cheek of a man like W. G. Simms, for instance, or Paul H. Hayne, to look now at the record of their conqueror's action since the subjugation of the rebels and then to look back a little further and read over the rabid foolishness which they and others like them used to pour on the Yankee head in every Southern newspaper. It would be the best criticism on such stuff as Simms's "ode" entitled "Do ye Quail?" to set side by side with it the sections of the pending constitutional amendment, or the yearly reports of rations issued to destitute refugees and freedmen by the United States Government—

"Did ye think the mere show of your guns on the wall,
And your shouts, would the souls of the heathen appall?
That his lusts and his appetites, greedy as hell,
Led by Mammon and Moloch, would sink at a spell;
Nor strive with a tiger's own thirst lest the flesh
Should be torn from his jaws while yet bleeding afresh?"

And, his heart not being sufficiently unpacked, Mr. Simms, who was born in South Carolina and expects to be taken for a gentleman, and who has written a good deal, and lays claim to the titles of scholar and author, goes on in still crazier disregard of taste, truth, decency, and sense—of everything but Campbell:

"Your grey beards with necks in the halter,
Your virgins defiled at the altar,
In the loathsome embrace of the felon and slave,
Touch loathsomer far than the worm of the grave.
Ah, God! if you fail in this moment of gloom,
How base were the weakness, how horrid the doom!
With the fiends in your streets howling pæans,
And the Beast o'er another Orleans.

Upon them, O sons of the mighty of yore!
And fatten the sands with their Sodomite gore."

As we have said, it is true, what Mr. Simms himself remarks in his preface, that these poems "will be found truthfully to exhibit the sentiment and opinion prevailing more or less generally throughout the whole" of the late Confederacy. The puzzle is to see why a Southerner should have been the man to expose the folly of his countrymen, and laboriously put upon record a full confession of all the charges of barbarity and want of cultivation which the enemies of the South—friends of truth, we may say—have always brought against it. The editor's reason, that the North, having conquered the South, had as good a right to the songs which inspired the rebels as to their captured cannon, is of course nonsensical. Mr. Simms can attach no meaning to his own words. We should be unspeakably sorry if the only right of property either section can have in such a collection could be in any way transferred to the North. No; it can properly be said to belong only to the social and political system, the civilization, which produced it, and that civilization every Northern man may well thank heaven is not his. Look at this gem:

"Furl the red banner—'scribe its tale,
And shroud with regal pall!
Thrill the requiem-surging wail
While ye sound our thrall.
A dauntless race has owned its sway,
That cross baptized in flame,
That shone on Jackson's deathless way,
The Valley-march of fame."

And this, too, which we the more willingly copy because as a chivalric person's account of the Southron it may profitably be read in connection and contrast with the previously quoted Southern description of "the Northern scum:"

"You have no such blood as theirs
  For the shedding;
In the veins of cavaliers
  Was its heading.
You have no such stately men
  In your abolition den,
Marching on through foe and fen,
  Nothing dreading."

Now, when the acknowledged leader among Northern men of letters, a man of education and breeding, one whom his countrymen accept as being a representative of their best, an old man withal, can deliberately and with evident complacency offer the world such stuff as this, and pronounce it a truthful expression of the sentiment and opinion of his fellow-citizens, the North will have gone backwards in civilization to a point two hundred years behind the place it holds to-day. Further back than that. We wrong the founders when we imply that the men of 1667 could have been guilty of such words, or had in their bosoms hearts such as these are, out of whose abundance words like these are spoken. Yet before it can be said that the North, in any proper sense of the words, owns this war poetry of the South, we must suppose, magnos componere parvis, that Bryant and Emerson could have written and applauded what we see has been written and gloried in by Simms and Hayne.

Miss Mason's collection and the other one contain nearly the same pieces. Hers is not, however, quite so melancholy a monument of the Confederacy's disgrace as Mr. Simms's, and his, therefore, as the most characteristically Southern, we recommend to such readers as want one volume of Southern war poetry, and want but one. Both contain "Stonewall Jackson's Way," the best of all the Confederate poems, and really fine, although it is sometimes marked, as in the line by the prevailing vice of its class—a force and intensity of expression quite disproportioned to the needs of the occasion, and rather ridiculous. "Maryland, My Maryland," is also in both books, and both have the poem whose authorship is claimed for the North, "All Quiet along the Potomac To-night." But certainly the seeker of poetry would have very little to regret if every piece here published were utterly lost, and, for the rest, though the future historian may be glad of the collection, the statesman and lover of his country may well enough be sorry that so much has been done to keep alive a spirit of antagonism between the two sections, which at the best, and in one of the two, at any rate, will not die too soon.

"Strangle the fool who dares to scoff,"

THE BOOK OF THE SONNET.[*]

The Turk, we are told, has a custom of picking up and saving every scrap of waste paper that is thrown in his way, and will suffer none of it to be trodden under foot. The name of Allah, he says, can be written on it. It is a comprehensive reason, which authors would like to see in force among enlightened nations, but is proof positive that the Turks, though they may be pious, certainly have no publishers. Dr. Johnson, too, we are frequently reminded, used to say that he had never in his life read any book so poor that he learned nothing from reading it. And, furthermore, it is true that very poor books being left to themselves, do sooner or later go to oblivion. But after all that the good-for-nothing writer can plead in justification of his fault, and all that the critic, too merciful, can offer in extenuation of it, the fact remains that every year many men, for one reason and another, are each year made to pay money, honestly earned, for books that are by-and-by found to be worthless. And this consideration, if there were no others, should and no doubt will keep critics true to their duty of condemning what is condemnable.

So we say it is unfortunate that any one who professes to have a poetical department in his library (and a library without poetry is only a library by misuse of language), and who, therefore, will feel bound, and will properly feel bound, to put this work on his shelves, should be obliged to buy two volumes of it instead of one. For the weak essay of the American editor, and by far the greater number of the American sonnets, the judicious reader very well could have, and very gladly would have, dispensed with, and then the work would have been half as large, half as expensive, and several times as satisfactory.

His part of the work Mr. Lee dedicates to Mr. George H. Boker, of Philadelphia, whom with perfect seriousness he pronounces the author of tragedies "far better, we think, than any other tragedies of modern times;" a statement equally untrue if not equally ridiculous, whether by "modern times" he means times since Sophocles, or since Shakespeare, or since Congreve and Rowe, or since Schiller and Coleridge and Byron died, or since Taylor and Browning began to write. That a man should have passed a literary judgment so utterly absurd, is of itself enough to destroy his claims to a hearing on any subject related to criticism. But pretty much all of his essay is quite in keeping with it. Quoting the rest of the paragraph from which we have taken this dictum, what, we would ask, can a man be thinking of who deliberately writes down this sort of thing as something fresh and new, worth saying and printing and paying for and reading? He is speaking still of those "magnificent efforts," "Francesca da Rimini" and "Leonor de Guzman." In them the author shows "his profound knowledge of the human heart, with its sentiments and passions, its love, rage, jealousy, ambition, despair. In them, too, he charms us with the beauty and harmony of poetic diction, or rouses us with eloquence of the highest order." Put into copperplate, all this might serve, so far as utter triteness goes, to be cut up in convenient lengths and put into boys' copy-books. Country papers, we imagine, keep such criticisms always in type to be ready for the column which acknowledges "Books Received" from "the enterprising publishing house of so-and-so," and the others. We suppose—it would be very hard to suppose otherwise—that it is Mr. Lee also and not Leigh Hunt who is responsible for this sort of note:

[*] "The Book of the Sonnet. Edited by Leigh Hunt and S. Adams Lee." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 2 vols. 12mo.

> "'I have found it!'—the famous exclamation of Archimedes when he discovered the quantum of alloy in the crown of Hiero, King of Sicily."

As might have been expected from the dedication and the essay, the author looks upon Mr. Boker as the best of all American sonneteers, and in his praise of his favorite he collects and comments upon some "of the beauties of thought and diction scattered all over them." We seldom find ourselves able to agree with him. What need, for instance, of italicized admiration of poetry like these lines, which are written "of the affectation of a backward and somewhat cold mistress":

"Alas! alas! that reason only proves
A fact your cautious action never tells,
That I must reach my joy by slow removes,
And guess at love as at the oracles."

There is nothing in particular to be said against such verses, but there is nothing either to be said for them, except that they run smoothly enough and contain nothing that is displeasing. Even so much as this cannot be said for all the dozen which Mr. Lee has selected from the seventy or eighty which Mr. Boker has written. Take the first one, and notice the excessively unpleasant idea suggested of a kiss drawing out something from the object kissed:

"I do assure thee, love, each kiss of thine
Adds to my stature, makes me more a man,
Lightens my care, and draws the bitter wine
That I was drugged with while my nature ran
Its slavish course."

And it proceeds with worse confusion of imagery, though with no single image so disagreeable in itself. Number two we say nothing about, in order that we may afford space for number three in full. It is "The Awaking of the Poetic Faculty," and we take leave to say that it describes the awaking of a very common and very cheap variety of the faculty in question. It is the awaking of what there is of the poetic faculty in an imitative nature. It is the glow produced in an ordinary mind (and by the ordinary mind mistaken for self-originated heat) by the friction of contact with the superior mind of others, and is just as much like the fire of real genius and power as sparks got from a cat's back by rubbing it are like the lightnings of heaven. Hundreds of thousands of men could—and we are glad to say that many of them would not—write just such sonnets as this of Mr. Boker's:

"All day I heard a humming in my ears,
A buzz of many voices, and a throng
Of swarming numbers passing with a song
Measured and stately as the rolling spheres.
I saw the sudden light of lifted spears
Slanted at once against some monster wrong,
And then a fluttering scarf which might belong
To some sweet maiden in her morn of years.
I felt the chilling damp of sunless glades,
Horrid with gloom; anon the breath of May
Was blown around me, and the lulling play
Of dripping fountains. Yet the lights and shades,
The waving scarfs, the battle's grand parades,
Seemed but faint shadows of that wondrous lay."

The truth is that Mr. Boker constructs with care and elaboration the legitimate sonnet with its two rhymes in the octave and its three rhymes in the sestette, and he chooses such language as to him seems good, and puts into it such thought as he has, and does, beyond the shadow of a doubt, produce sonnets. But Mr. Lee is not to think that the sonnet-writer, any more than the odist or song-writer, can—no matter how strictly he conforms to rules—be released from the obligation to prove himself a true poet, and seventy or eighty sonnets like those of Mr. Boker's do not outweigh one such sonnet as one or two of Longfellow's "On Translating the Divina Commedia," or that of Lowell's beginning

"I ask not for those thoughts that sudden leap

or those of half a dozen other men and women who have written within the last ten years.

Leigh Hunt's essay "On the Cultivation, History, and Varieties of the Species of Poem called The Sonnet," is excellent reading. It is written in the airy, conversational style which was natural to him, or which he so often chose to write in, and which, we confess, is not always altogether agreeable to us, there being, now and then, or to us seeming to be, a little of conscious archness and prettiness in it, a slight inclination to be "gushing," which is hardly manly. But, in Leigh Hunt's hands, it is generally well managed, and it is a style which, well managed, is apt to be very taking, and may be very good. And this essay conveys much information on all the topics of which it professes to treat, and contains much good criticism, if none very acute or profound. This, for example, about Milton as a sonneteer, is worth having. Milton, by the way, though of course admired by Hunt, was yet not a man, any more than Dante was, to be a favorite of his and so get the benefit of the ingenious defending which Hunt could on occasion do for his friends:

> "If a complete specimen of the legitimate sonnet in all its demands, both of uniformity and variety, could have been expected of any English poet, Milton was the man; for he was a poet willing to show his learning; he was a musician; and he could write sonnets, as we have seen, in their native language. Yet it is remarkable that, although all the sonnets of Milton, English as well as Italian, are of the legitimate order, and though he was an honored guest in Italy at the time when the reaction was beginning to take place in favor of its purest and best writers, he has hardly left us one in which the received rules respecting the division of quatrain and terzettes are not broken, and the music of the whole fourteen lines merged into a strain of his own. The strains, except in one particular, are good; most of the sonnets good; some of them noble and beautiful; one of them rejoices in the recollection of 'Tuscan airs,' and it might be supposed that the writer would have modulated his notes accordingly, and shown what variations he could make of his own, after the Tuscan manner.
> "Not so. The sonnets are entirely such as I have described, with this unmusical and therefore remarkable deterioration, that they are unhappy and monotonous in their rhymes. Few of them, either English or Italian, are exempt from this fault. The two most affecting sonnets—the one on the Massacre of Piedmont and that on his Deceased Wife—are so full of them that a writer of Spanish asonantes would say that they had but two rhymes throughout. The two quatrains of the latter sonnet give us no rhymes but in a, and the terzettes none but in i. (Saint, grave, gave, faint, taint, save, have, restraint, mind, sight, shined, delight, inclined, might.) Criticisms on rhymes appear trifling and hypercritical, and in the case of long poems would be so; but they are otherwise in respect to compositions that are at once so brief and so full of musical requirement as sonnets.
> "Most affecting, nevertheless, are those two sonnets; noble the one on the Assault Intended to the City; charming the Invitation to Lawrence; and masterly in passage all the rest.
> 'Soul-animating strains—alas! too few.'
> Why did not Milton write a sonnet on every cheerful, mournful, and exalting event in his life? Why do not all poets do so? I mean when they are not too happy or too unhappy to speak. What new and enchanting volumes of biography we should possess."

We repeat that, with all its faults, we recommend the book for purchase and perusal. If there is a good deal in it, both of prose and verse, which swells its size and detracts from its worth, there is still much poetry of the very best strain. It is easy to see how the collection might have been made better. We have already pointed out one particular in respect to which improvement might have been made. It might have been well, if the book was not to be called "The Book of the English Sonnet," to have made it truer to its title by giving us translations of the greatest writings of this kind in other languages. But, undoubtedly, we have here the best collection of sonnets in English that has ever been made, or that soon will be made; and we have them all together, and in a not unworthy setting of prose. Of course tastes will differ as to what sonnets should have been selected and what rejected; but as to the writers, except Cowper, we think no one will miss a favorite from Surrey and Sidney down to Tennyson. Mr. Lee, we suppose, is responsible for the omission of specimens from some of the latest of the English minor poets, as, for instance, Dobell and Matthew Arnold. The writer last named might, we dare say, hail with joy the appearance of a work so likely to be useful, as he conceives of usefulness, to the rising poets. He would, perhaps, anticipate for them much benefit from the careful study and severe practice of a sort of composition in which, at whatever sacrifice of detached beauties, the effect to be produced by the whole poem is what the artist, with labor and self-restraint, must seek. For ourselves, we expect, at any rate, a great number of harmless little sonnets, and perhaps a weakly revival of Spenserian and Sidneian English.

MANSEL'S REPLY TO MILL.[*]

That the two great schools of philosophy will never be able to make much impression on one another by way of criticism seems pretty evident from the history of the long debate the last words of which reach us in Mr. Mansel's restatement and defence of Sir William Hamilton's philosophy.[†]

Alexander Strahan, publisher, London and New York. 1866. Pp. vii. and 189. Reprinted, with additions, from the "Contemporary Review."

[†] The view of the controversy taken in this article differs somewhat from that taken in the article on the same subject in Vol. I. The modification is the result of further reflection on the part of the writer.

The only real strength of either school appears to be in its ability to hold and fill the minds of its disciples to the exclusion of the other, not by logical refutations but by competitive rivalry in meeting the intellectual demands of the thinker. Few minds could be tempted, even were they competent to do so, to stand in fair judgment between these contestants, and the only feasible course of this sort ever recommended was that of Pyrrho, who advised his disciples to stand aside rather and to attend only to the practical questions of life. For, after all, the intellectual demands which these philosophies are calculated to meet are creations of the philosophies themselves, and once created they find their food only in the parent thought. Thus, the main summary objection which the metaphysical spirit makes to the theories of the sceptical school is, that they fail to answer the questions which the metaphysical school has started. And the main objection of the sceptical spirit to metaphysics is, that these questions are gratuitous, idle, and foolish.

A compromise between the two schools was nevertheless attempted by Sir William Hamilton in his "Philosophy of the Conditioned." This philosophy allows the validity of metaphysical problems; allows that the terms and positions of the orthodox philosophy mean something possibly real; but maintains at the same time that these refer to unattainable objects, and that the questions are unanswerable so far as human powers of comprehension can render the facts evident or even intelligible as such. This philosophy is in strict accordance with the teachings of Catholic theology from the earliest times, and it gives great prominence to an essential position of this theology—to the antithesis of reason and faith, or the doctrine of a difference in kind between knowledge and belief. The kind of entertainment which, according to the "Philosophy of the Conditioned," it is possible for the mind to have of the ideas of metaphysics, far from being a conviction from direct or intuitive evidence, is not even a conception of the facts as possibly true. A conception of the terms and of the propositions as such is, of course, not only allowed, but is an essential position of this philosophy. That which is regarded as inconceivable is the union of the terms of these propositions in reality as well as in form—in the facts which are supposed to be stated in the propositions. That such a fact can be entertained or assented to is the common ground of this philosophy and orthodox theology. "Faith" or "simple belief" is the name of this assent. But inasmuch as this assent is entirely independent of knowledge or probable evidence, an independent ground for it is required among the native powers of the mind, and this is also called "faith" or "belief." Knowledge and partial evidence may aid in fashioning our ideas of metaphysical facts, but such are not regarded as the grounds of our assent to them.

To this extent the "Philosophy of the Conditioned" is nothing more than the doctrine of orthodox theology. But its essential feature is this: The faith which is ultimate and independent of knowledge is not in this philosophy a sentiment, the issue of the heart, or a conviction having its ground in aspiration, love, and devotion, but it subsists in the cold light of the intellect itself, where alone intellectual philosophy could profess to find it. It subsists as a logical necessity of thinking something to exist which is unthinkable—not merely something which we have not yet thought of—not the unknown simply, but the unknowable. Sir William Hamilton professes to demonstrate this necessity in the passage so often quoted from his review of Cousin.

"The conditioned is the mean between two extremes—two inconditionates, exclusive of each other, neither of which can be conceived as possible, but of which, on the principles of contradiction and excluded middle, one must be admitted as necessary," etc. This application of the logical laws of contradiction and excluded middle is the gist of the philosophy of the conditioned; and to this Mr. Mill, in his "Examination" of Hamilton's doctrines, has distinctly replied to the following effect: What is the evidence of the impossibility of a middle ground between contradictory propositions? Simply this: that in all that we know, and in all which we can conceive as possible, there is no such middle ground. What, then, is the evidence in regard to that which we cannot know and cannot conceive as possible? It is clear that on their proper evidence the laws of excluded middle and contradiction cannot be extended to such cases, and that such an extension of them is purely gratuitous. What hinders, either in the laws of thought or in our knowledge of things, that there should be an inconceivable middle ground between inconceivable contradictories? What hinders that both of them or that neither of them should be true, or that truth should be wholly included in what can be understood as true?

To this refutation of the main position of the philosophy of the conditioned, Mr. Mansel makes no reference in his reply, except in a very remote manner, in a passage in which he sneers at Mr. Mill's apparent ignorance of Hamilton's doctrine of the reality of space. A favorite illustration with Hamilton of his laws of the conditioned is the equal inconceivability, as he asserts, of infinite space and space absolutely bounded, one of which, on the ground of their mutual repugnance, must be admitted as real. The fitness of this illustration, to say nothing of its truth, depends on its not being confined to space as we know it, but on its extension to the really existent space, or space independent of our knowledge, if any such space exists. If no such space exists, then the illustration is wholly inapt. Mr. Mill, therefore, very naturally attributes to Hamilton the only meaning which could fit his illustration to its use, and he supposes Hamilton to refer to a "noumenon space." Mr. Mill says: "It is not merely space as cognizable by our sense, but space as it is in itself, which he [Hamilton] affirms must be either of unlimited or of limited extent." "At this sentence," exclaims Mr. Mansel, "we fairly stand aghast." "Space as it is in itself! The noumenon space! Has Mr. Mill been all this while 'examining' Sir William Hamilton's philosophy in utter ignorance that the object of that philosophy is the 'conditioned in time and space;' that he accepts Kant's analysis of time and space as formal necessities of thought, but pronounces no opinion whatever as to whether time and space can exist as noumena or not?" (p. 138). And so Mr. Mansel runs off on an irrelevant issue from the nearest approach he makes to the gist of the matter.

The first sixty pages of Mr. Mansel's review are devoted to a positive exposition of the metaphysical doctrine of the "unconditioned," that "highest link in the chain of thought," that "absolutely first link in a chain of phenomena" about which metaphysicians have gratuitously confused themselves for so many ages. Mr. Mansel endeavors to clear up the matter by discussing the terms employed in the doctrine, and especially the meanings attached to them by Hamilton. He then comes to the trial of Mr. Mill's "Examination," and this is his indictment: "Not only is Mr. Mill's attack on Hamilton's philosophy, with the exception of some minor details, unsuccessful; but we are compelled to add that, with regard to the three fundamental doctrines of that philosophy—the relativity of knowledge, the incognizability of the absolute and infinite, and the distinction between reason and faith—Mr. Mill has, throughout his criticism, altogether missed the meaning of the theories he is attempting to assail" (p. 63). More specifically he charges Mr. Mill with ignorance of the history of the questions discussed; with frequent perversions and even inversions of the meanings of the terms employed by Hamilton and other metaphysicians, and with an unpardonable want of familiarity with Plato and with the antiquity of the doctrines which he discovers as absurdities in Hamilton and our author.

A scholastic display of subtle learning was probably not Mr. Mill's object in entering into this debate with the metaphysicians. If metaphysical philosophy had been content to remain a purely theoretical philosophy, shut up in its own technicalities, and in the original Greek; if it had disdained to descend into the arena of practical life and to influence men's conduct, no really earnest critic, like Mr. Mill, would have opposed its pretensions. If it had not translated itself into the vernacular and wrested words of a familiar and practical application from their familiar and practical use, and thereby sought to enslave the souls of men to a scholastic and ecclesiastical authority, no criticisms like Mr. Mill's would have disturbed its self-complacency.

That Pyrrho was wrong in his advice to abstain from such disputations, is sufficiently evinced by the influence upon practical life which the doctrines of Hamilton and Mansel were calculated to exert. "That a true psychology is the indispensable basis of morals, of politics, of the science and art of education; that the difficulties of metaphysics lie at the root of all science; that these difficulties can only be quieted by being resolved, and that until they are resolved—positively, if possible, but at any rate negatively—we are never assured that any human knowledge, even physical, stands on solid foundations;" these are reasons enough for examining the pretensions of the metaphysical philosophy; these are the sufficient grounds of the practical critic's interest in those formidable words, the infinite and the absolute, the chevaux de bataille of metaphysics. For these words are also common and familiar ones, and are commonly and familiarly used, as Mr. Mansel himself admits, in senses different from those assigned them by the metaphysicians; but the conclusions drawn from their definitions in metaphysics are inevitably interpreted into a practical accordance with the common-sense meanings of the words, and hence lead to false judgments concerning the character of the evidences of religious and moral truths.

Mr. Mill's real end was, therefore, a practical one—to show that in the recognized common meanings of these words the doctrines of metaphysics make arrant nonsense, and that these words have a valid, useful, and intelligible application to the most serious practical relations of life, without any reference to their use in metaphysics. Mr. Mansel uses the word "absolute" in a sense different even from Hamilton's, and complains that Mr.

Mill has not given him the benefit of his philosophically clearer and correcter definition. But we imagine that Mr. Mill was more concerned to do justice to the common-sense meaning of the word than to Mr. Mansel.

That the words "infinite" and "absolute," as defined in metaphysics, involve contradictions in their definitions, and not in the attempt to conceive the reality of the things defined, is the position which Mr. Mill maintains against the philosophy of the conditioned. "The contradictions which Mr. Mansel asserts to be involved in the notions do not follow," says Mr. Mill, "from an imperfect mode of apprehending the infinite and the absolute, but lie in the definitions of them, in the meanings of the words themselves." This position Mr. Mansel flatly denies. He holds that these meanings are perfectly intelligible, and are exactly what are expressed by the definitions of the words. To test this, let us take an example. "If we could realize in thought infinite space," says an anonymous writer (a diligent student of Sir William Hamilton's writings, whom Mr. Mansel quotes with approbation), "that conception would be a perfectly definite one." The infinite, then, is not the indefinite. It is a unit, a whole. But it is without limits. It is, then, a whole without limits. But a whole implies limits. We know of no whole which has not limits. We can conceive of no whole which has not limits. Limits, in fact, belong to the essence of every whole of which we speak intelligibly. Does not the metaphysical idea or definition of infinity involve, therefore, a contradiction?

Of the common idea of the infinite, as involved in the concrete example, "infinite space," Mr. Mill says: "The negative part of this conception is the absence of bounds. The positive is the idea of space and of space greater than any finite space." "This definition of infinite space is," says Mr. Mansel, "exactly that which Descartes gives us of indefinite extension." But an indefinite extension, according to Descartes, is that which is capable of unlimited increase, and we fail to see the identity of this with Mr. Mill's definition. Moreover, according to the metaphysicians, the infinite and the finite, being contradictories, include all there is, and as the indefinite is not the infinite it must be some finite. But Mr. Mill says that his infinite is greater than any finite. How, then, can it be the same as the indefinite? "Greater than any finite" excludes the finite as effectually as an absolute negation of it, but it has this positive peculiarity, that it excludes the finite in an essential and characteristic manner. "Greater than" is a much more specific form of denial than the "is [illegible]" by which the metaphysicians are content to distinguish the infinite [illegible] the finite. It is this specific and characteristic mode of exclusion [illegible] constitutes the positive part of the abstract conception of the inf[illegible], and, according to Mr. Mansel, a positive conception, or the positive [illegible] a conception, is that of which we can conceive the manner of its re[illegible]ion. It cannot be supposed that Mr. Mansel means by this that only [illegible] conceptions are positive of which we can have examples in intuition, for this would be to identify positive conceptions with adequate ones. No one asserts that the infinite can be adequately conceived except the "rationalists," to whom Mr. Mill is as much opposed as Hamilton or Mansel; but, as Mr. Mill observes, "between a conception which, though inadequate, is real and correct as far as it goes, and the impossibility of any conception, there is a wide difference."

The common notion of infinity is not, then, a mere negation. It refers to and is related to positive experience, and to valid operations of the mind in drawing conclusions from experience. It is not the same as the indefinite; it is not that to which an unlimited addition is possible, since it is defined as the greatest possible, greater than any quantities which can be measured or compared by their differences.* The metaphysical idea or definition of infinity, on the contrary, in so far as it is not merely negative, involves a contradiction, since it is asserted to be a definite whole, and, at the same time, to[illegible] without limits.

M[illegible]nsel quotes Locke against Mr. Mill's position, to the effect that the [illegible]sition of an actual idea of the infinite realized in the mind involves a [illegible]diction. But Mr. Mill does not suppose the notion to be fully realized or to be capable of complete realization. It is important only that the notion be true as far as it goes, or that it should accord with the facts and the evidences which the mind is capable of comprehending.

We must pass over other special points of criticism, and hasten to the chief practical ground of difference, which we conceive to have furnished the real motive of Mr. Mill's "Examination" of Hamilton's and Mansel's doctrines. Our readers will remember the paragraph in the "Examination," p. 103:

> "If, instead of the 'glad tidings' that there exists a Being in whom all the excellences which the highest human mind can conceive exist in a degree inconceivable to us, I am informed that the world is ruled by a being whose attributes are infinite; but what they are we cannot learn, nor what are the principles of his government, except that 'the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving' does not sanction them; convince me of it, and I will bear my fate as I may. But when I am told that I must believe this, and, at the same time, call this being by the names which express and affirm the highest human morality, I say, in plain terms, that I will not. Whatever power such a being may have over me, there is one thing which he shall not do: he shall not compel me to worship him. I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures; and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell I will go."

To this Mr. Mansel replies by discussing the meaning of the word "good." He asks "whether Mr. Mill really supposes the word good to lose all community of meaning when it is applied, as it constantly is, to different persons among our 'fellow-creatures,' with express reference to their different duties and different qualifications for performing them?" and he proposes to "test Mr. Mill's declamation by a parallel case":

> "A wise and experienced father addresses a young and inexperienced son. 'My son,' he says, 'there may be some of my actions which do not seem to you to be wise or good, or such as you would do in my place. Remember, however, that your duties are different from mine, that your knowledge of my duties is very imperfect, and that there may be things which you cannot see to be wise and good, but which you may hereafter discover to be so.' 'Father,' says the son, 'your principles of action are not the same as mine; the highest morality which I can conceive at present does not sanction them; and as for believing that you are good in anything of which I do not plainly see the goodness'—— We will not repeat Mr. Mill's alternative; we will only ask whether it is not just possible that there may be as much difference between man and God as there is between a child and his father?"

This "parallel case" is, in an important respect, a very happy one. It suggests the real practical issue of the debate, unencumbered by theological and metaphysical obscurities; but to make it perfect, the parallel should be more exact. The real question is as to the child's obligation to respect his father's wisdom and goodness independently of any experience of them, and solely on the ground of that parent's word for them. If, from the wisdom and the goodness which the child has seen and understood, he infers uncomprehended higher degrees of these qualities, reasoning from the known to the unknown, just as he does in all other relations of life, and just as we all do, then the child bases his faith on the sure and only ground of knowledge; and his deference to the father's judgment in all cases of doubt or conflict is the natural and direct consequence of a faith so grounded. But if, bewildered and oppressed by a metaphysical difficulty in trying to comprehend the peculiar duties of a father, he should base his faith on his ignorance of them, and believe in the goodness which he cannot comprehend, believing because of his ignorance and not on account of the little knowledge he does possess; and if, in his blind devotion, he should abdicate his own intelligence, reject his own clear judgments of right, when they are brought into apparent conflict with the parent's selfishness, or with that of servants claiming to speak by authority, then the child's devotion would not be that of an ingenuous, filial piety; it would rather be an abject slavish submission. Such we conceive to be the really parallel case, involving the real practical issue between the two philosophies. Faith is, in one, founded on knowledge by experience; in the other, it is independent of knowledge.

The Child's Book of Religion. For Sunday-schools and Homes. By O. B. Frothingham. (Walker, Wise & Co., Boston.)—The substance of the manuals used in our Sunday-schools may or may not be true and beautiful according as opinions vary with the various sects, but that their form in almost every case has been unfortunate, that their method for the most part has been hopelessly inadequate, will be agreed by all except the persons implicated in their manufacture. But however much this "Child's Book of Religion" may be improved on in the future, it is a long step in the right direction, an immense improvement on any of its predecessors. If it does not teach everything that such a book should teach, what it does teach is taught in a most satisfactory and charming manner, and the thanks of every earnest teacher are due to Mr. Frothingham for what he has achieved in a field heretofore so barren of results.

[illegible]t such quantities may still be compared by their ratios when, as in the higher m[illegible]natics, they are "the greatest possible" under certain conditions which do not, [illegible]er, determine or limit their values as numbers, or as definite sums of units.

[illegible]a foot-note (p. 115), Mr. Mansel breaks a lance with Professor De Morgan, "one [illegible]e ablest mathematicians and the most persevering Hamiltono-mastix of the day." De Morgan maintains the applicability of a valid notion of infinity to mathematical magnitudes; but unfortunately assumes besides, or appears to assume, that such phrases as "points at an infinite distance," "the extremities of infinite lines," etc., are literally valid in mathematics. This assumption Mr. Mansel easily refutes. But the main position remains untouched. With the mathematician such phrases are really technical abbreviated expressions of a complex conception. Having shown validly and consistently that lines of unlimited length tend to approach continually to a given state of things, or to a given relation to one another, but in a manner which makes it impossible for them as lines, continuously drawn, ever to reach this state of things, the mathematician then changes the object of his contemplation. He dismisses the infinite line, and turns his attention to the state of things (the point of tangency, for example) to which his infinite lines, though always approaching, could never attain. Instead of spanning the infinite in his thought, he simply abbreviates in his language that substitution of one object for another which conducts him to the end of his research.

POLITICAL QUESTIONS IN THE SUPREME COURT.

THE Supreme Court of the United States is just now the subject of lively popular interest and discussion. It has recently been, and will soon be again, called upon to decide questions which have been made political issues between hostile parties; and concerning which few men are able to think impartially. All the issues of the war, and of the era of reconstruction succeeding the war, will be submitted to the judgment of this court; and a strenuous effort will be made to secure from it decisions which will nullify the will of the people, and vindicate the rejected policy of Mr. Johnson. There is great danger that, whatever may be the decision of the court, its action may fail to command public confidence; that if the decision is against the views of the majority, it will be ascribed to partisanship, and that if it is with them, it will be thought to have been influenced by fear.

It is exceedingly desirable that no such impression should be left upon the minds of the people after a decision has been made, but that the fairness and wisdom of the court should be manifest to every one. For our own part, we most earnestly deprecate any weakening of popular confidence in this eminent court, as equivalent to an undermining of the people's faith in law itself; a faith which needs strengthening and upbuilding in a special manner at this time. We shall, therefore, after explaining the reasons for doubting the impartiality of the court, offer some suggestions as to the mode in which the apprehended dangers may probably be avoided.

The Supreme Court consists at present of nine judges, five of them appointed by a Republican President and four by his Democratic predecessors. Unfortunately, it cannot be doubted that at least four of the judges have so thoroughly made up their minds upon all the issues of reconstruction as to make argument before them a mere form. Chief-Justice Chase could not be persuaded by Moses and the prophets that the present State governments at the South are legitimate; while Judges Nelson, Grier, and Clifford could not be persuaded of the contrary even by one who should rise from the dead. We are strongly inclined to believe that Judge Field, who was appointed as a Republican, but whose sympathies, never very heartily with the party, except in support of the war, are now quite alienated from it, is also too well convinced in his own mind to be really open to argument. Assuming our suspicions to be correct (and they are universally entertained among lawyers and politicians at Washington), Judge Wayne, of Georgia, would hold the casting vote. The natural presumption is that he would side with his Democratic associates, and such is our expectation; yet so patriotic has been the course of Judge Wayne during the last six years, and so sincere has appeared to be his desire to do his duty rather than to gratify his prejudices, that we shall have at least as much confidence in his impartiality as in that of the best of his associates. The other judges, Swayne, Davis, and Miller, have never been known as politicians, and will no doubt consider the important questions before them in a truly judicial spirit.

We feel bound to express our regret that the distinguished Chief-Justice of the court has not, since taking his place upon the bench, more strictly abstained from taking part in political discussions. It is not easy for one of such decided convictions and energetic spirit to sit quietly by while great battles are being fought in which his sympathies are strongly enlisted; yet such was the duty of his position, and he has greatly weakened his influence over the court and his hold as a jurist upon the public confidence by pursuing a course which, in any executive or legislative officer or private citizen, would have been eminently honorable, but which was unsuited to the office of a judge. And his repeated declarations in favor of universal suffrage have irritated some of his associates into counter-declarations of hostility to it, which must greatly embarrass their action when political questions come before them for judicial solution.

The particular case which it is reported will be made the means of bringing the subject of reconstruction before the court is one arising in the United States District Court of Alabama, in which, it is said, a motion will be made to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the State has ceased to exist, and that the court has lapsed with it. The decision of this motion need not and ought not to have the least bearing upon the question of the validity of Mr. Johnson's Southern governments. A State may, perhaps, exist without any government for a time, and a Federal court created for a State may not, and we think does not, expire with the State government, or even with the State itself. An appeal from the State tribunal in one of the reconstructed States would present the real issue more clearly, though even that would not necessarily turn upon the issue of reconstruction.

The chief duty of the court, as we conceive, in dealing with the tremendous questions which will be brought before it, is to confine itself strictly to the matter in hand, to decide the precise points before it, and to abstain rigidly from the slightest discussion of political questions not necessarily involved. Expressions of opinion on points not clearly presented by the facts of each particular case will not only amount to nothing as precedents of law, but will break down the reliance of the country on the court. Even if counsel on both sides agree in submitting the case upon political issues, the court ought, if possible, to determine it upon other grounds; remembering that counsel may be seeking some ulterior purpose at the expense of the public good. The same reasons which induce the courts to throw out collusive actions should induce them to disregard collusive arguments. The questions involved in reconstruction may be looked at from twenty different standpoints, and it is intolerable that they should be decided upon a hearing of three or four counsel, representing only two private individuals, whose real interests may be united, and who may have trumped up a case for the express purpose of accomplishing a common political end.

The opinion of the court in the Indiana conspiracy cases, although perfectly sound upon the real questions at issue, and perhaps equally correct upon all points, is nevertheless deserving of criticism in the respect just mentioned. There was not a particle of pretense that Congress had authorized the sitting of the Indiana military commission, yet a majority of the judges undertook to declare that Congress could not create such a tribunal. It is quite possible that their opinion upon this point is right, but it is no more law or authority than one of the Chief-Justice's speeches to the colored people in Charleston. Such an opinion is calculated to arouse a suspicion that the court is anxious to express its views upon these great questions before they are legitimately presented to it.

The Supreme Court was always, prior to 1857, wisely anxious to leave political questions to be determined by the legislature, and repeatedly declined to interfere in cases which afforded quite as much ground for interference as any that are now likely to arise. The judges foresaw that any attempt to control such controversies by judicial decisions would only peril the existence of the court, while settling nothing for the country, and they rightly decided to avoid such uncompensated risks. In the case of Dred Scott, the court departed from this line of duty, and sought to fasten a certain political policy upon the nation. The effort failed, and only brought the court into disrepute. We cannot believe that the attempt will be repeated. If it should be, the people will have to meet it not merely with contempt but with punishment. But we will not dwell upon this point, as we hope for a wiser course on the part of the court. Until we are compelled to admit ourselves mistaken, we shall advocate its claims to respect and confidence, believing that it will maintain its early reputation as a just and wise tribunal.

MR. WELLS'S REPORT ON THE REVENUE.

MR. WELLS's report, like the report of the Revenue Commission of last year, has been awaited with a good deal of anxiety, as well as curiosity, owing to the widespread, though as we believe unfounded, belief of the public that it would in a great degree affect Congressional legislation. We may, doubtless, be mistaken, and shall be very glad to find that we have been, and to confess it; but our present opinion is, that these reports on the industrial condition of the country in its relation to taxation, which Mr. McCulloch has so wisely procured, are likely to prove more valuable in forming public opinion than in determining the action of the present Congress. There are very few men in Congress who have devoted much attention to questions of political economy and taxation. Subjects of this kind are dry and uninviting, and it is now a long while since they played an important part in our party politics; in fact, they may be said, in spite of the old tariff controversy, never to have played a really important part in them at all, for the expenses of the Government before the war were too trifling for the mode of raising the revenue ever to have become a subject of serious popular interest. The race of statesmen and politicians who have grown up within the last thirty years, and are now in Congress and the State legislatures, have been bred in the anti-slavery agitation, and have occupied themselves through the whole period of their political education with moral rather than material questions. The effect of the discussion of moral questions is, in general, to cultivate the conscience very highly; but an exclusive devotion to it is apt to beget a slipshod habit of mind, an impatience of details, a fondness for hasty generalization, and a contempt for the material forces of the world, which, though they may not disqualify a man for making a very good figure at popular meetings, are apt to prove a serious drawback on his usefulness as a legislator when complicated systems of taxation and currency have to be adjusted. We doubt if there are half-a-dozen men in Congress who have given any patient or minute attention to the question of revenue, or have about it any but the vaguest and most elementary notions. The life led by a successful politician—a life of conversation in hotel parlors, of letter-writing, hand-shaking, and flowery declamation on popular themes—is one which affords little opportunity for close and connected investigation even to those who have a turn for it. Consequently we find that most speeches on the tariff consist of commonplaces about the necessity of protecting American industry, dreadful pictures of the misery that would result from the policy of opponents, ornate disquisitions upon the prospects of the country, and appeals to British precedents, made, however, in such a confused way as to leave it in doubt whether the orator holds British policy up as a warning or as an example. The reference of the revenue questions to a committee does not help matters much, owing to the way in which committees are appointed and the small amount of responsibility which they feel. It is impossible to say what the Committee of Ways and Means will do after a larger experience. We should have no doubt whatever that it would before long do its work in the best manner if the same men, or a majority of the same men, were allowed to return to it each year. But the system pursued by Northern constituencies of changing their representatives every session or two, deprives Congress of all the benefits of experience, and makes a fixed policy on questions like the tariff all but impossible. This is a question which, of all others, most needs special knowledge.

The manner in which the committee proceeds is very characteristic. To attempt to frame a system of taxation without having under one's eye every interest in the country, without constant attention to and intimate knowledge of the relations of all branches of industry to each other, the effect on production and on morals and on revenue of every species of tax, is, of course, to rush on failure. A committee of Congress ought, therefore, not to enter on any such duty without a thorough and active investigation of the whole field of national industry. If it cannot do this itself, it ought to employ others in whom it has confidence to do it, and pay heed to their report. What the committee now does is to open what we may call a court of oyer in Washington, and listen to what anybody chooses to say, no matter how long he takes to say it. Deputations accordingly rush on from special "interests," probably from twenty or thirty of the hundreds which are engaged in the work of production, and take up the whole time of the committee with statements of the difficulties encountered in making profits in particular branches of industry. What may be said on the other side—whether any other explanation of failure than the one assigned by the parties may be given—there is nobody to say, and the committee never finds out. The usual demand of these gentlemen is for a higher tariff, and that immediately—the wool-growers just now say they cannot wait over sixty days—and after months of precious time have been squandered, a bill is brought in which claps on thirty per cent. on this, forty per cent. on that, pell-mell, without much distinction, discrimination, or definition, and the result is a system which few can understand and nobody administer, and which brings no relief.

We have not commented thus far on the contents of Mr. Wells's report. We shall endeavor next week to speak more fully of it than we can do now. But, as we have already said, we doubt very much whether it will seriously influence the legislation of the present session, and we despair of seeing such men as he ever exercise their proper influence on legislation until the public is thoroughly convinced of the mischief of the present mode of doing business in Congress, of the sham investigations pursued in the secret sittings of the committees, and the headlong passage of undebated bills in the House. The war has been the means of introducing greater thoroughness and accuracy in most departments of the public service. It has rendered inestimable service to our politics in introducing the practice which has been found so useful in foreign countries of appointing commissions, like this Revenue Commission, composed of experts, to prosecute careful enquiries in particular fields of social science; and if the practice be kept up, Congress will have before very long what it has never had before—a real and substantial basis for legislation, a storehouse of facts carefully accumulated and inferences accurately drawn. There is no country in the world in which such enquiries so prosecuted are more necessary than in this, because in none is the progress of society marked by such variety and rapidity, in none are the conditions of life subject to such constant modification, and the ordinary economical calculations exposed to so many disturbing influences.

Mr. Wells has made a very thorough examination of the industrial condition of the country, and he finds that there has been great industrial or speculative activity during the past year; that there has been unprecedented progress in the invention of machinery; that there appears a spirit of enterprise which seems to double its energy with every additional burden placed upon it, and a continued and increasing foreign immigration. Nevertheless, he finds that certain disturbing elements growing out of the war—political differences, financial disturbances, onerous and duplicated taxes, and ill-adjusted and unstable tariffs—while not sufficient to arrest the national progress, have been sufficient to reduce it below the normal rate of speed, "to seriously diminish production and consumption" (this is apparently a contradiction of a previous statement), "to arrest the growth of foreign commerce, and expose home industry most unfairly to foreign competition."

One effect, and the most important, of these "disturbing" elements has been to create an unparalleled advance in prices—about an average of 81 per cent. in gold and 172 in currency. Mr. Wells supports his conclusions on this point by a good deal of evidence, and the effect of this rise of prices he declares to be a positive diminution of consumption and production, the exposure of American industry to unfair competition, and so on. This statement of causes is, however, anything but clear. Mr. Wells's position would seem to be that, whatever may have brought about the rise in prices, this and this only is the proximate cause of all that is unfavorable in the condition of American industry—on his own showing the political condition of the country affects industry very little, except in so far as it prevents a reduction of prices. When he says that the effect of "these disturbing elements, acting concurrently," has been to "create and maintain an unparalleled advance in the prices of every description of labor and of commodities, to decrease the purchasing power of wages and of the lawful money of the nation," he makes a distinction without a difference. To say that a thing has caused "an advance of prices of every description of labor and of commodities," is the same thing as saying that "it has decreased the purchasing power of wages and of the lawful money of the nation." If a man takes his wages to the market and finds that every description of commodity is dearer than it used to be, he may report the fact either by saying that commodities have risen or the purchasing power of his wages has declined.

Mr. Wells subsequently, however, gives three distinct and well-defined causes of the rise in prices, viz.: scarcity of labor, especially of skilled labor—from 500,000 to 750,000 men having been drawn off from the Northern States to the war, the great body of whom have never returned; the issue of irredeemable paper currency by the Government; and the weight of taxation. We propose to say something about these and the remedies proposed for them by Mr. Wells next week.

THE CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

It is to be hoped that the holidays have been used by members of Congress and by their constituents for the consideration of some practical measures of legislation. The civil service bill of Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, submitted at the last session and renewed at this, is a matter that specially deserves earnest study and careful discussion. Here we have a bill that meets the evil which is at the bottom of our political Pandora's box. Any statute that does away with the auction of offices that accompanies every election ought to be welcomed. Members of Congress and heads of departments and any man that deserves to be President—every President except an "accidental"—must feel that we have arrived at that point in the business of government which requires skill and knowledge and attention. Mr. Jenckes's bill proposes obtaining these qualities by prescribing an examination for every officer who may, after its passage, be appointed to a civil office under Government, and for every promotion, with certain exceptions. The most obvious benefits are these: That a large number of utterly incompetent persons would cease any longer to be applicants for office, while, on the other hand, a large number of persons who are really fitted for places that are now secured only by scandalous means would be able to submit themselves honorably and decorously to the required examination. Office would cease to be a badge of ignorance in everything but political trickery, and would become a mark of a certain standard of excellence. Thus politicians who are honest in their desire to serve their country, and the number of these is larger than the country gets credit for, would not be embarrassed by the pressure and application of incompetent supporters for office, a request for their examination by the proposed board of examiners being answer enough to men whose only service is in stuffing ballot-boxes or colonizing voters.

The good old-fashioned faith in a special Providence that cared for these United States has been somewhat rudely shaken by our experiences of the last few years. The enormous taxation imposed in consequence of the rebellion has been borne bravely by the country; but the manner in which that taxation has been levied, the utter incompetence of a large proportion of the army of tax-gatherers in the revenue service, the destruction of some branches of industry by the mischances of legislation, the apparent hopelessness (under the present system) of anything like a decent return from the excise duties, the frequent clashing of internal and tariff duties—these are the sources of well-grounded complaints. Members of Congress, revenue commissioners, and some officers of the Government even, have confessed the faults of the present state of affairs, and hope to do better. But legislation must be imperfect so long as it gropes in the dark, and light can be had only from experience, and experience is the one thing which our officials are never allowed to get. How many generations of men have sat in the revenue department of the Government, and how many of the changes made in it have been made on any other than purely political, partisan grounds? Suppose that at the outset of the new system of taxation officers had been appointed to administer it upon merit, as tested in an examination; that those officers had been retained up to this time; and that promotions among them had been made on merit, as tested by their services. What a world of difference there would be in our knowledge of the right and the wrong way of imposing and levying taxes, and what a fund of advice there would be to guide Congress in legislation, the courts in interpretation, and the Government in administration. As it is, we are in a worse sea and in a more dangerous and shifting storm of uncertainties than we were at the outset of this great experiment.

The success of "civil service" examinations has been pretty thoroughly tested abroad, and the good results can easily be transplanted into our own system, while the bad effects (and it can grow them, too) are as easily avoided. The plan, too, is not so old a one in any part of Europe as to make us despair, with our forcing-house atmosphere, of soon domesticating it here. In Germany, the close of the great French wars saw a condition of affairs that was a thousand times worse than anything that we have to complain of. The "hereditary" race of office-holders, the curse of venality, the almost public sale of offices, the total exclusion of the citizens from any participation in office, and the close communion of the noble families to whom office was the only livelihood—these were evils worse than any that we have to encounter. Now, Germany—or, perhaps, to speak more correctly, Prussian Germany—is, as far as its administration of laws is concerned, the best governed country in the world. If proof were wanted of the fact, look at the ease with which the recent war was waged, the ease with which business has returned to its natural channels, and the rapidity with which its system was extended over the outlying statelets now swallowed up in Prussia. The evils of Beamtenthum—of office as a special business apart from the ordinary duties of citizenship—are not likely to have many fears for us. It is almost beyond possibility that the mercurial activity of the American mind will ever content itself with office as the last best resort for a livelihood, or that the outside world will suffer the men who make office their business to arrogate to themselves any special claim or privilege. The man in America who can content himself to settle down at the outset of his life to a public office, and look forward patiently to spending his existence in the slow promotion and slender rewards of life in the public service, is and always will be the exception; but the more numerous such exceptions to the rule, the better for the public.

The arguments that were advanced in Germany, in France, and in England, each in turn as this reform in the civil service was discussed and finally adopted, are the same that address themselves to us to-day. Why should West Point and Annapolis be prescribed to officers or those who desire to become such in the army or navy? What greater importance is there in the duties assigned to a captain of a company of infantry over those entrusted to a collector of internal revenue, the chief of a bureau in the Treasury, or an auditor in the War Department? and why should these be appointed on the recommendation of Mr. A. who represents Hull, or Mr. B. who comes from Utah, while the captain of Co. A. of the 99th Infantry must pass a rigid examination? The "political sciences" are no longer hidden or uncertain mysteries. A fair knowledge of the science of taxation is the indispensable necessity of a good revenue assessor; no excise officer can do his duty without some scientific acquaintance with alcoholic preparations. The same rule applies to a thousand other cases. That rule can be made a law by the passage of Mr. Jenckes's bill; its provisions are clear, straightforward, and to the point. To effect its adoption by Congress, there ought to be at once prompt action and agitation by merchants, manufacturers, tradesmen, capitalists, railroad and other corporations—by all, in short, who feel where the shoe pinches, who know the mischief of our present system of appointing to and removing from office. This bill to reform the civil service comes home to every individual of these classes. If, by individual or combined action, they can by letter, petition, association, or in any other way, in turn bring home to Congress their anxiety to have this law enacted, we may be sure that Congressmen and the Executive will not be backward in forwarding the real interests of the country, while they are ridding themselves of a growing pest, that of office-seeking, with its intolerable annoyances and inevitable mischiefs.

POPULARIZING SCIENCE.

These are the days of popular lectures and familiar treatises on scientific subjects. Let a discussion arise among scientific men on any subject not narrowly technical, and there is immediately an effort to throw the weight of the popular applause into this scale or that. If a scholar has any large project at heart—a great book to publish, a museum or an observatory to found—he must appeal, not to some one Mæcenas, but to masses of people; he must fascinate two or three hundred average American legislators; he must deal skilfully with reporters and editors; he must exhibit his disinterestedness, enthusiasm, and learning before large audiences; he must be constantly before the public in newspapers, periodicals, and popular books. For the noble patron we have substituted the long subscription list. We read with an agreeable feeling of superiority the obsequious dedications to fools of high-born patrons which great scholars of other generations put in the front of their works. Is it quite sure that the processes by which some of our scholars propitiate their patron, the public, are any more consistent with self-respect, independence, and mental uprightness? It must be admitted that the process by which science is popularized nowadays is one fraught with distinct dangers both to the speakers or writers themselves and to the public whom they address ; to the speakers, because when a retiring, single-minded, unworldly student, who is really capable of successfully investigating the hidden things of nature, is converted into an eloquent orator on scientific topics, a ready debater, or a plausible advocate of his own opinions, the change is not for the advantage of the individual ; to the public, because they are too apt to be fed with loose and inaccurate statements, with sweeping generalizations, with false facts and false logic, with appeals to their prejudices and preconceptions rather than to their reason.

We find some good illustrations of the temptations to which even genuine scientific men are in these days exposed in the printed reports of a course of lectures lately delivered before a popular audience in Boston by the eminent naturalist, Agassiz. To persuade his hearers of the absurdity of the theory of progressive development was the main purpose of the lecturer, although the lectures were largely made up of descriptions of the physical characteristics and natural history of Brazil. It is not our present intention to question the fairness of presenting to a large popular audience only one side of a controversy like that upon the theory of Darwin, although it seems clear that a just disputant would state his adversaries' argument with precision, if only to refute it ; neither do we desire to call attention to the not infrequent inconsistencies of the lecturer's own arguments ; the climax of Prof. Agassiz's argument, contained in the concluding sentence of the last lecture, will best illustrate what we feel to be the dangerous tendencies of the present methods of popularizing science—" We are the children of God, and not the children of monkeys." In the first place, this argument is grossly unjust to that decided majority of living naturalists who have accepted and extended Darwin's views ; for it implies that they deny the Fatherhood of God. It is precisely this implication which wins the applause of an indiscriminating audience, but no aspersion could be more unwarrantable. The belief that the whole animate creation was developed from a single germ is no more inconsistent with a firm faith in the universal and incessant action, through all nature, of an intelligent will, than our knowledge that every human being grows to adult stature out of an egg in which no trace of organization is perceptible is inconsistent with the literal acceptance of the beautiful faith that in God " we live and move and have our being." To assert, or imply, that the development hypothesis is atheistic, is to assert that growth goes on without God, than which there can hardly be a more impious idea. A little four-year-old was told that God made him. Measuring off a few inches on his arm, he wrathfully replied, " No, he did n't ! God made me a little mite of a thing so long, and I growed the rest myself !" This is just the opinion of the theologians and naturalists who would recognize God in spasmodic creations, but admit him to no share in regular growth ; this is precisely the wisdom of those who teach that man is less the child of God if his body was the natural outgrowth of less perfect organisms than if it was a detached and abrupt creation out of earth, water, and fire after the Promethean fashion. No scientific lecturer has a right to use, before a popular audience, an argument which could not be addressed to an assemblage of his peers in science. The mischief of misrepresenting the views of sincere opponents is graver in proportion to the incompetency of the audience to allow for, or correct, the misrepresentation.

But the argument, " We are the children of God, and not the children of monkeys," admirably illustrates another temptation which besets popular lecturers ; it is an appeal to a popular prejudice by a man who has no such prejudice himself. It is an unwelcome idea to an ignorant man that there is any natural connection between monkeys and himself. That man is an improved monkey is a repugnant thought to the common mind, just as it would be disagreeable for a New York Democrat to believe that a white man is a bleached negro. Indeed, considered as an argument against the Darwinian hypothesis, Prof. Agassiz's appeal to the monkey prejudice can only be compared, for irrelevancy and inconclusiveness, to the well-known Democratic clincher, " Do you want your daughter to marry a nigger ?" We are the more astonished at such an argument against Darwinism from Prof. Agassiz, because no one has stated more distinctly and positively than Prof. Agassiz himself that man's physical nature connects him directly with the animals, and that the debasement of which man is capable is due to the fact that he is thus descended from the beasts that perish. Four or five years ago, Prof. Agassiz delivered a course of lectures at the Lowell Institute, in Boston. These lectures were then printed in the " Atlantic Monthly," and finally they were collected in a volume which has had a wide circulation under the title of " Methods of Study in Natural History." On the 71st page of this book we read : " Man is the crowning work of God on earth ; but though so nobly endowed we must not forget that we are the lofty children of a race [the vertebrates] whose lowest forms lie prostrate within the water, having no higher aspiration than the desire of food ; and we cannot understand the possible degradation and moral wretchedness of man without knowing that his physical nature is rooted in all the material characteristics that belong to his type, and link him even with the fish." Truly, if the discussion concerning the Darwinian theory is to be reduced to a question of man's ancestry, it may turn out that the popular majority will prefer the monkey to the fish ; between the baboon on the one hand and the sculpin or hornpout on the other, many would think that the baboon was the most desirable ancestor, both on the score of intelligence and of personal appearance. Prof. Agassiz has already got so far as to think he can see a resemblance between the head of an adult skate and that of a human embyro ; on page 317 of the book already quoted he says : " The resemblance of an adult skate, especially in the configuration of the face, the form of the mouth, the position of the nostrils, the arrangement of the gills, to some of the earlier conditions in the growth of the young mammal, not excepting the human family, is equally striking."

The popular lecturer on science is exposed to still a third temptation : speaking usually on subjects with which his audiences have but very slight acquaintance, he is checked by no fear of competent criticism of his method, or of any immediate reply to loose or incorrect statements. Like the clergyman, the lecturer suffers from his very exemption from the incessant, viva voce, face-to-face discussions and debates which are the everyday lot of most men. Accustomed to assume that his audiences know little or nothing of subjects with which he has been long familiar, he finally comes to underrate the intelligence and attainments of his auditors ; his lectures become more and more diluted ; the hour's dish of discourse contains but a spoonful of meat ; next he becomes careless in stating facts ; and finally a fatal contempt for his hearers betrays him into using methods of reasoning, argument, and illustration which are plausible but not sound, taking but not true. Who can blame him if, when he has made a misstatement twenty or thirty times without contradiction, or has repeatedly won applause with some fanciful guesswork or specious fallacy, he at last begins to flatter himself that his misstatements are true, his guesswork what ought to be true, and his fallacies good logic. Every man who has followed college or medical school courses of lectures has seen abundant illustrations of all these points among lecturers on science. We may again refer to Prof. Agassiz's former Lowell lectures, the " Methods of Study in Natural History " above mentioned, because, as there can be no question as to real knowledge, the careless confidence bred of long impunity is the only explanation of the frequent occurrence of most curious misstatements, even after the lectures have been twice revised for the press. Thus we are told (p. 69) that every vertebrate has four locomotive appendages, whereas whales, dugongs, manatees, and porpoises have only two. On page 74 it is stated that in " the insects there are three nervous centres, the largest in the head, a smaller one in the chest, and the smallest in the hind body." The fact is that there is one principal centre in the head, three in the chest, which are sometimes blended into two or even one, and ordinarily from nine to four centres in the abdomen, which are sometimes fused together to a less number of centres, and very exceptionally to one centre. On page 114 it is positively asserted that the seal " has no power of bending the wrist or the fingers," whereas every boy who has seen a trained seal at an aquarium knows that a seal can grind a hand-organ with an easy flexible motion of the wrist. A popular book on science is worse than useless if it be not accurate ; no amount of rhetoric can atone for heedless errors in matters of fact. The lately published " Geological Sketches," the second book in which Prof. Agassiz has endeavored to exhibit to unscientific readers the futility of the Darwinian hypothesis, is liable to the same criticism as the " Methods of Study in Natural History." The scientific journals which have noticed this later work have given long lists of the errors in matters of fact which abound upon its pages.

But graver dangers remain to be considered. Popular lectures and popular treatises on scientific topics have, since the days of the Bridgewater Treatises, done an infinite mischief in fostering two amazing conceits, originally invented by theologians, but strengthened and confirmed in the popular mind by teachers of natural science. The first of these conceits is the notion that the boundless universe was made and is maintained for man's sole use and benefit ; that its raison d'être is man's education, development, and happiness ; that its laws are specially adapted for the training of the human intellect through the study of them ; and that all its wonders and beauties are expressly provided for the enjoyment of the little creature which for a few of God's minutes has been pottering about on a small fraction of the outside crust of one little speck of a planet. The universe made for man indeed ! As much as the ocean is made for the barnacles that stick to some little rock it washes. The universe suits man's wants and the ocean the barnacle's, and the barnacle, in its unconsciousness of the presence of higher beings, has precisely the same reason for thinking itself the prime cause of the existence of the ocean that man has for declaring himself to be the "culminating glory" of the universe. We are inclined to laugh at the argument urged against the Copernican system by the religious authorities of those days—that, as man is the central and ultimate object of creation, it must be that man's dwelling-place is the centre around which all other spheres revolve. But this generation is less logical than the monks who persecuted Copernicus: we cling to the superstition that the heavens and the earth were created for man's sole behoof, although we know that the species lives in an obscure corner of a limitless universe, of which man can see and understand and use only an infinitesimal fraction. The popular scientific books of the day are full of the monstrous conceit that man is the summit of creation and the ultimate object of the Creator in contriving and directing the material universe.

The second false idea, pregnant with curious danger, which popular treatises on science have done much to foster, is the notion that men are capable of appreciating and explaining the designs and purposes of God in making things as they are. We are constantly called upon by scientific lecturers and writers to admire the exquisite adaptation of this thing or that thing to what they imagine to be its use and object, to worship the goodness and love which made the infinite beauties and glories of light and music, of ocean and air, of flowers and forests, of mountains and the great heavens, to exercise and delight the created senses and mind of man, as if this were their sole or chief function. But is it not a harmless and even a profitable exercise of the human faculties, this wondering study of God's designs? No! for it leads men to think that they can enter into God's thoughts and understand the scope of his designs. If men get into the habit of thinking they can fathom God's intentions in the gentle and kindly things of nature, when they meet a terrible and, to human eyes, injurious exhibition of natural forces, the confidence they have acquired in their own judgment concerning the final causes of things leads them to say, This is not the work of a benevolent being at all, for it is a cruel work; these are a devil's doings, or the fruit of man's sin. A shipwreck, for example, must be a "judgment," for was not the ocean made expressly to be the pathway for man's ships? Professor Cooke, in his Graham lectures on "Religion and Chemistry," declares that it is not true that the material universe manifests a God of unmixed beneficence, and he bases this frightful conclusion on the fact that "lightning and tempest, plague, pestilence, and famine, with all their awful accompaniments, are no less facts of nature than the golden sunset, the summer's breeze, and the ripening harvest." The argument is this: Man is the object for which all things are made; man comprehends God's purposes in creation; the glories of the sunset were made to delight man's eyes, the gentle breeze to fan his cheek, the abundant harvest to satisfy his hunger; these things are good for man; they comfort and bless him; God is good—but earthquakes and volcanoes, storms and pestilences, crush and destroy man; man is the ultimate object of creation; man appreciates God's designs, and the design of these terrors is cruel; God is malevolent. If popular science had not insidiously taught people to believe that they can essentially comprehend the benevolence of the seeming good in nature, they would not be so prone to think that they can decide upon the malevolence of the seeming evil. The fact is that natural science should have nothing whatever to do with the discussion concerning final causes. It is the province of science to investigate patiently and record accurately the natural sequence of events; and there is work enough to be done in this legitimate sphere without intruding upon the rightful province of another philosophy. It is best to find out the real facts of nature before we write poetry or sermons about them. At least, it will be well to really find out how things are made before we enter upon any deep speculation as to why they have been so made. How many long chapters have been written about the mathematical instinct of the honey-bee, and the wonderful precision with which it builds perfect hexagonal cells. But it turns out, after all, that the bee does not build with any precision, and that it is constantly making pentagonal cells and crooked cells of irregular shape, so that hardly a bit of honeycomb can be found in which many irregularities and much patchwork do not occur. Indeed, no man ever saw a single honey-cell of perfect form, in spite of Lord Brougham's extraordinary assertion in his "Natural Theology," that the mathematical theory of the cell and the bee's practice are absolutely coincident. And what becomes of all the poetry about the Argonaut nautilus spreading its sails to the favoring breeze and sailing over the summer sea, when it appears that the arms of the nautilus are never used in this manner, and that the little creature is, and always was, quite incapable of any such exploit? The natural theologians have always set great store by the chambered nautilus on account of its supposed power of condensing air in its unoccupied chambers, so that the shell may be made to sink like a diving-bell. This condensing power was justly considered an extraordinary invention, a wonderful adaptation of means to ends. And so perhaps it would be if it were real; unfortunately for the argument, it is not a fact that the chambered nautilus performs any such remarkable operation. Between a theologian dabbling in science and a scientific man dabbling in theology, it is, indeed, hard to choose. Any one who desires to see further instances of this method of studying nature may find them, ad nauseam, in such books as "Homes without Hands," by the Rev. Mr. Wood, and the works of Mr. Leo H. Grindon.

We scarcely realized how vicious the general method of popularizing science has been until we lately took up a collection of "Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects," which is singularly free from the common cant. Sir John Herschel has published under the above title a collection of the lectures he has delivered to popular audiences; it contains lectures on "Volcanoes and Earthquakes," the "Sun," "Comets," "Light," "Celestial Measurings and Weighings," and the "Origin of Force," subjects which usually call forth the best eloquence of those who think they can find out the Almighty. Sir John Herschel treats all these great subjects plainly, worthily, humbly. The inventive genius of the Creator never receives laudatory mention, the kind intentions of the Disposer of All are never appreciatively alluded to, and no surprise is ever expressed that God allows this thing or that thing to happen or to exist. It is a relief to find a new familiar treatise on scientific subjects which is accurate and logical, and free from the flippant semi-religious sentimentalism which mars so many of the popular books on such subjects. In one essay, however, that on "The Yard, the Pendulum, and the Metre," we feel bound to say that Herschel's English feeling gets altogether the better of his reasoning faculty.

In thus speaking of the dangers which attend the process of making science familiar, we have no desire to gainsay the necessity of diffusing scientific information as widely as possible. But in pursuing this desirable end. it is of primary importance that nothing but real science should be diffused, and that the methods of teaching employed should be, before everything, characterized by simplicity, fairness, and humility.

ENGLAND.—THE REFORM DEMONSTRATION.

LONDON, December 14, 1866.

THE procession of trades societies in favor of reform, which caused so many forebodings and so much anticipatory triumph, took place last Monday week, and has been the subject of a good deal of controversy ever since. Two hundred thousand reformers were to march through the streets of London; as their friends declared, it was to be the most imposing spectacle of moral force ever seen within the memory of man—order, decorum, and obedience to the law were to be exhibited in their highest perfection. The Tories responded by calculations to prove that the procession would never get to the place of meeting; that when they did get together they would be crushed to atoms; and that, at all events, the streets would be given up to an infuriated mob, smashing windows, robbing elderly gentlemen, and possibly tearing eminent Tories to pieces. I knew gentlemen who, impressed by these awful warnings, sent their families from the south to the north side of Hyde Park to be out of the way of the expected democratic deluge. As I had a strong disbelief in any crowd being too big for London or possessed by any really bad feelings, I calmly walked through St. James's Park at the hour appointed for the start, on the way to a club in Pall Mall. Persons who were to attend the meeting wore a white card in their hats, and my first impression was that the whole procession had dispersed in order to look at the procession. The streets and the park were swarming with these ticketed gentlemen, but the procession was long invisible. At last I caught sight of a few large flags, and discovered the thin line which it was forming under the mask of that strange phenomenon—a London crowd. Such a crowd is certainly amongst the least picturesque of all great aggregations of men. The absence of any particular costume is, I suppose, as complete in London as in New York. Each class seems to be dressed in the cast-off clothes of that next above it; the only difference perceptible is, that a coat as it sinks through the various grades of the social hierarchy is gradually toned down to the hue of London mud, thus imitating the providential (or Darwinian) arrangement by which the color of every animal is assimilated to the prevailing colors of his habitation. The same fine gradation appears to be carried out in regard to washing; it would be easy to assort a complete series, divided by imperceptible degrees, from the chimney sweeper to the Prince of Wales; of course the lowest terms in the series are the most numerously represented. All the countenances, however, that saw, whether white or dusky or whity-brown, were marked by the characteristic expression worn by Britons out for a holiday. It is not simply good-humored, and it certainly is not sulky; it is rather a compound which involves both elements intricately blended. Every one seems to be saying to himself, "I have come out for a 'lark,' and I feel it a duty, which I shall discharge with all due solemnity, to enjoy myself; at the same time, I am uncomfortably conscious that I am doing a foolish action, therefore I will be in a good temper, but distinctly under protest." Although it was a gloomy, drizzling English day, the good humor seemed to be rather nearer the surface than usual, the people apparently feeling themselves bound in honor to disappoint Tory predictions. The only amusement which I observed was a parody of Divine service, consisting in reading the lessons of a production something like the "Gospel of Peace" I remember during the American war. This precious production referred to reform, and was stupid enough. It was applauded, however, as a profane caricature is pretty certain to be by a miscellaneous crowd. After pushing my way through the only compact crowd which I met, which was in the entrance to the Park from Pall Mall, I took up my position at the window of a club, and listened to the remarks of the Saturday Review reading population—perhaps the most distinctive epithet by which I can call them. One gentleman was still cheerfully predicting disaster, or, at most, deferring it to the time when the fasting reformers should have imbibed a little beer and gin. Such prophecies seemed, however, perfectly absurd, when the procession actually appeared. There was not a policeman or a soldier within sight, although the streets were crammed with a crowd such as only London can collect. It made way, however, for the processionists in perfect good order, and the processionists (I do n't know whether I am coining a word) seemed to be in excellent temper. Just opposite my standing-place there was a slight obstruction, on passing which they made up lost ground by a run, and the chief incidents were produced by the consequent difficulty of keeping two bearers of one standard together. There was nothing but hearty laughter and occasional cheers for anything that specially struck the fancy of the crowd, a small body of sailors coming in for the heartiest applause. Most of the societies had bands of music, which displayed great energy, if not great skill, in music, and, if the dresses of the performers had been a little less dingy, the whole thing would have been really handsome. As it was, even the Saturday Review readers were impressed by the good order and excellent spirit in which the whole affair was conducted. There was "but one fault," to quote Goldsmith, "but that one was a thumper," namely, that there was not enough of it. Instead of the 200,000 men, not more than 30,000 at the outside marched in procession; and, after all the boasts and the warnings and the calculations, 30,000 men from the whole of London seemed like a very thin brigade in place of a mighty army. Whether the falling off in quantity did or did not counteract the excellence in quality, has been the subject of easily conceivable disputes ever since.

The fact admits, I believe, of an easy explanation. It has been very gravely disputed whether it was desirable that the trade societies should lend themselves to the purposes of political agitation. A Mr. Potter, a clever man, who has made himself important amongst the working classes, organized this procession. Most of the leaders, however, of the societies have a very strong distrust of Mr. Potter, whether on good grounds or not I cannot say. They look upon him as an adventurer without very much principle. Consequently, many of the most numerous societies refused to follow his lead in what they considered to be a questionable policy. The largest and richest of all such societies (the Amalgamated Engineers) sent only forty men, when it might have sent hundreds. The printers refused to join at all; and so on. Consequently, the procession by no means represented the real strength of the societies which took some part in it. As it was, it never succeeded in getting fairly to its destination. The approaches to the meeting-place got blocked up; only about a third obtained admittance, and listened to oratory of which I can only recollect the one sentence, viz., that it was the object of the reformers to get the devil out of the House of Commons and God Almighty into it—a programme to which no one can refuse his sympathy, assuming that they are able to carry it out. Towards the afternoon the rain began to come down steadily, and wearied and draggled bands of reformers were to be met with dribbling back in various directions along the gloomy streets.

The next day there was a meeting at St. James's Hall to hear the necessary oratory, especially to hear Mr. Bright. I had never before heard him address a popular audience, though I have several times listened to him from the gallery of the House of Commons. In my opinion he speaks far better in the House than he does out of it, judging from the specimen which I heard and from what others have told me. In the first place, I am sorry to say that he has strained his naturally admirable voice, and that after a time the effort of addressing a large audience becomes too evidently painful. He spoke for about an hour on Tuesday night. By speaking very slowly, so slowly that it would have been almost possible to take down his words in long-hand, he succeeded in getting very well through the first half of his speech. The last half was so far spoilt in its effect as a speech must be when the orator is himself suffering. This weakness has of late been somewhat perceptible in Mr. Bright's parliamentary efforts. It is, however, to a different cause of inferiority that I principally refer. In addressing the House of Commons, the sense that he is speaking to a hostile audience, only kept in temper by his superlative eloquence, seems to brace and stimulate his mind. He ventures into higher regions of rhetoric than any one else dares to attempt, and where nothing but the purity of his style sometimes preserves him from overstepping the dangerous line between the sublime and the ridiculous; but the sense that he is speaking to a critical audience seems to chasten, without emasculating, his eloquence. When he addresses a popular meeting, and is no longer under the same restraint, he ventures, so to speak, upon a cheaper style of ornament. On Tuesday, he elaborately compared his present position to that of a man prophesying a volcanic outburst, by way of illustrating the statement that he did not threaten but merely predict. Now, the volcano is a metaphor which has been rather overworked; of course it brought down cheers, but it was handled with less delicacy than he would have instinctively used before a more critical audience, and sounded rather commonplace. Another difference concerns rather the audience than Mr. Bright. A defiance sounds much better than a threat. When Mr. Bright is telling the thick rows of country gentlemen what he thinks of them, in a house where perhaps not one man in ten sympathizes with him, and which is yet profoundly silent from sheer admiration of his power, the effect is admirable. When he repeats the same sentiments—and they are substantially the same—to a large and uncultivated audience, all of whom are ready to agree, as a matter of principle, in any denunciation of their superiors in rank, it is not quite so pleasant. He is going with the stream for the moment instead of struggling against it. That such things should be said outside the House of Commons as well as within it, I fully agree—assuming, that is, that they are said sincerely, which, in this case, no man doubts. But unsparing denunciation of opponents produces a better rhetorical effect when the opponents are present. And I must say that, in my opinion, Mr. Bright is really carried away into much unfairness when he is speaking without the fear of immediate contradiction. Thus, he attributed the evils of Ireland to Tory policy the other night; it is perfectly absurd to say that Tories have had more to do with the misgovernment of Ireland than Whigs. To take one example: a Whig ministry has been in power for nearly the whole of the last twenty years; one resolute effort on their part would have destroyed that abomination, the Established Church of Ireland; but they have never made it; on the contrary, they have carefully avoided the whole subject. Whig traditions, I fear, are in such matters as bad as Tory, and the only hope is from the appearance of some new political forces. It was, therefore, a rather small rhetorical artifice of Mr. Bright for casting odium upon his antagonists, and though doubtless sincere at the moment, would perhaps have been subjected to a severer scrutiny before he had produced it to the House of Commons. Whilst giving this opinion, I must distinctly add that I compare Mr. Bright only with himself. In the House of Commons his best efforts are, to my mind, beyond all comparison superior to those of Mr. Gladstone or any one else. On a public platform, he is still a giant, but he sinks more nearly to the common level.

I may mention one little incident which occurred on Tuesday night. Mr. Ayrton, a radical M.P., is a very clever man, but with a singular want of tact, which in the House of Commons makes him a dreadful bore, and on this occasion led to a very absurd fiasco. After some remarks, singularly ill-calculated to please his audience, as, for example, one to the effect that he had just left a much more interesting meeting, and that the one hundred and seventy-five thousand missing men had shown their sense in staying at home, he proceeded to criticise the Queen in rather a marked way for not showing herself on this occasion to receive the cheers of the procession. He said that they had elected Miss Burdett Coutts Queen for the day, by popular acclamation. (They had cheered in passing the house of that most charitable lady). After Mr. Ayrton had concluded, Mr. Bright rose, and in a few words very eloquently vindicated the Queen, and declared that she was to be respected for continuing to cherish her sorrow. Mr. Bright, of course, put it admirably and excited great enthusiasm. The Queen's name will always do so amongst the most radical reformers, even without Mr. Bright's eloquence. This was all very proper and becoming; I must add, however, that Mr. Ayrton's remarks were also applauded to some extent, and it is a fact which may possibly be some day important, though it is properly hushed up at public meetings, that the Queen's persistent course of seclusion has distinctly diminished her once unbounded popularity. Mr. Ayrton was clumsy enough to blurt out such a sentiment in public, but an anonymous writer may admit it to be true.

Fine Arts.

COLOR PRINTING FROM WOOD AND FROM STONE.

Printing in colors is not a new art; but the present wide extension of this art, in many directions and by several processes, is very recent. Color printing from wooden blocks has never been entirely unpractised since there has been an art of printing, but very little has been done to apply the process to any except its original and time-honored uses of calico-printing, the manufacture of paper-hangings, etc., until within about thirty years. During that time, a great many print publishers have worked hard at the process of wood-cut printing in colors, in hopes to develop it into something, the resulting prints of which might be, or pass for, "artistic" pictures.

Chromo-lithography, or lithochromy, to take from the French a less awkward word, is a recent invention, or rather a recently tried application of Sennefelder's fortunate discovery. It has not been made so widely useful in the industrial arts—except in one notable way, of which thereafter—as printing from wood-blocks. But it has been very rapidly developed into a pseudo fine art, and copies made by it from pictures, copies pretending, themselves, to be pictures, are in every print-shop and bookstore window.

The best known and most commonly seen wood-block pictures are those of the Illustrated London News, in its Christmas and other supplements. These are generally too coarse and too vague and blurred for any beauty of effect, and they pretend to no other merit than that. More minute and delicate are the almost equally well-known prints, "Printed in oil colors by George Baxter," a great flight of which settled down upon this country after the original Great Exhibition of 1851. These are still on everybody's hands in one form or another; at least, he is fortunate who has lost or man fully destroyed his last specimen. They were terribly dead and bad in color, and the latest executed that we have seen show no marked advance over those of the first Crystal Palace and its contents. In mentioning these as being wood-cuts, it is right to say that they seem to have been printed upon an aquatint ground.

It was, perhaps, 1856 when there were first received in America large chromo-lithographic copies of pictures by Turner and other painters. It was about that time that prints of "The Old Temeraire" and other Turner pictures were first for sale at Williams & Stevens's store, now vanished from Broadway, and untravelled Americans found it impossible to believe that what they saw was in any important respect like the pictures. Intimate acquaintance with the originals has fully confirmed that incredulity. Since that time English print-publishers have made fortunes by chromoliths. Day & Son, of London, have become a great joint-stock company (limited), and their advertisement has been in the New York papers, these holiday times, inviting Americans visiting England to step up and view "500 different subjects, from 5s. to £4 4s." But there remains something yet to be done of which there seems no promise and no prospect. The best pictures Day & Son can make are poor things; they are ugly things when compared with art that is really beautiful. That which makes an oil painting or a water-color drawing delicate or forcible, truthful or noble, these chromos have not; that which makes all human art poor beside nature, they have. Title-pages of music and the best chromo-lithographic pictures are one and the same thing, after all; good art is another and a different thing.

Chromo-lithography has been introduced into this country, and many small pictures have been produced, and have sold well within the past three or four years. We have received from L. Prang & Co., of Boston, a copy of their chromo "Chickens," from a picture by Mr. Tait. This house has a recently established agency in New York, and does probably a much larger business in this line than any other American establishment. Hundreds, and in some cases thousands, of their chromos, at two dollars, three dollars, and five dollars a copy for "prints," have been sold in all parts of the United States. They are as common in Chicago as in Boston. None of these that we have seen are quite equal to the best of European make; it is impossible to train good workmen and build up an establishment of sufficient resources in a day, but the improvement in the work of the Boston workmen is obviously rapid. It is of the value of the best of these as works of art, and of their probable influence in educating the people, that we propose to speak very briefly, and we instance six that lie beside us, viz.: "Going to the Bath," after Bouguereau (called "The Baby" in the advertisements); "The Sisters," artist unknown to us; "The Linnet" and "The Bulfinch," after water-color drawings by W. Cruikshank; "The Chickens," after A. T. Tait; and a study of ferns, etc., after a water-color drawing by Miss ——. We have had no opportunity of comparing these with their originals; it is probable that they are as faithfully copied as it was found possible to do the work with the requisite speed. One thing only, quite unnecessary and quite inexcusable, throws discredit on the whole matter and makes the pictures merely merchandise; some of the pictures are made to look like oil-paintings on canvas, by printing them all over with indented lines to imitate the effect of the threads of the canvas, and by giving them a varnished surface. The main question, however, is this: Are these pictures good as pictures; good to have and to look at; good in their influence on people who do not have much original art within their reach; good as teaching people to feel and understand nature? So far as these six are concerned, the answer is easy: in none of them is there any brilliancy or purity or noticeable softness of color; in none of them is there any true or delicate "gradion" of color; in none of them is there any accurate, subtle, delicate drawing. Although it is hard to say what will or can influence any person to begin to observe nature or wisely enjoy art, this much is evident, that the more one loves nature and the more he knows what art is and can do, the less he will enjoy these chromos. And, on the other hand, as Ruskin has truly said that "if you are fond of the large finished prints from Raphael, Correggio, etc., it is wholly impossible that you can make any progress in knowledge of real art till you have sold them all or burnt them," in like manner one who enjoys these chromos and wants to study art to purpose, may begin when he has put them well out of his sight.

But will not the art become so much improved that such pictures will be good? Probably not. Good color, that is, delicately gradated color, is not to be produced by the printing-press. A black and white engraving or wood-cut or lithograph is a true reproduction of the forms and of the light and shade of a picture, if it is only truthfully made. But a colored reproduction must be perfect or it is nothing. What the brush of a skilful painter does at every touch in graduating, softening, and blending tints, leading one color into another, breaking one color over another, until there cannot be found two grains of color the size of a pin's head that shall be really the same; this is beyond the reach of any mechanical contrivance. And, when a skilful operator, master of every device of his art, doing everything with supreme care and cunning from the first transfer to the stone to the printing of the last tint, shall have produced the best approach to handwork that the machine is capable of, at what cost per copy will he supply the trade with such prints? That, however, is a small matter. At whatever price, they would be nearly valueless as art, or as things of beauty and of truthful suggestion of nature.

We said above that chromo-lithography has in one respect aided the industrial arts; it is in the admirable representations of the ornaments and works of decorative art of past times which have been produced by this process. Owen Jones's "Alhambra" and "Grammar of Ornament," several large works by Louis Grüner, Humphrey's "Illuminated Books of the Middle Ages," Silvestre's "Paléographie Universelle," Digby Wyatt's several publications, J. B. Waring's illustrated records of the great collection of ornamental art at Manchester in 1857 and at London in 1862, Decloux and Doury's "Histoire de la Sainte Chapelle" (we mention only books which are within everybody's reach in New York); these and other such collections of chromoliths have made it possible for those who cannot give their lives to travel to study the arts of the ages of art. The most perfectly executed and the most beautiful plates, we think, are some of those contained in the "Album" of Labarte's "Histoire des Arts Industriels," published by Morel. Some of the plates in this superb book exceed, in every respect in which reproductions of art are valuable, any pictures of the kind we have ever seen, and seem to fulfil all that one can expect of chromo-lithography. One serious fault is said, on excellent authority, to exist in all these books—the perishable nature of the gold and silver pigments which enter into nearly all their illustrations. Mr. Henry Shaw, who has issued a series of most valuable and accurate books on the arts of the Middle Ages, not mentioned above because his illustrations are in wood-cut, and nearly all colored by hand, has recently published a work on illuminated MSS. which is illustrated by admirable wood-cuts, printed in one color. His preface gives at length his reasons for not having used chromo-lithography, as follows:

> . . . "The most successful of these reproductions are too costly to be within reach of persons of ordinary means, while they fail of being completely satisfactory, especially when the examples chosen are those showing the highest degree of refinement. . . . When flat tints only were used, and the effect of light and shade was produced by consecutive bands of color, of increasing degrees of density, proceeding from pure white, the details of the composition being made emphatic by a surrounding of red or black lines, a close approximation to the original may be effected by means of the printing-press; but colors so produced can never have the solidity and richness of tone of those on which the hand and the brush alone have been employed. In the finest works of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, the most careful gradations of color are found, and both the miniatures, the frames in which they are enclosed, and the other ornamental accessories, display the most skilful blendings of the richest and most delicate tints. The press has hitherto proved inadequate to the production of these refinements, and we can scarcely hope for any material improvement, as, independently of the difficulty of producing these gradations and blendings by machinery, some of the most beautiful pigments used in drawing are, when combined with the necessary varnish, of too thin a quality to be employed successfully in the process of printing."

To go back to our wood-blocks: at Fountain's and at Vantine's one buys Japanese colored prints, magnificent in effects of broken flat tints, and in brilliant and harmonious combinations of pure color. It is little to say that these are far finer, far more desirable and instructive, far more precious as works of art, than the best chromoliths yet produced in America. It is true that a little drawing in full color by one of the two or three colorists among our painters is better than they. But all excellence is relative. And the best of our colorists might learn, from those wise barbarians, not to be afraid of a heavenly thing—bright and pure color.

"This work is written with care and vivacity, with a mind superior to the influences of superstition, and comprehensive in its study of the causes and consequences of events. . . . The volume has an important connection with the great questions which the mind of America is now engaged in solving, and is indirectly the highest tribute to the incomparable excellency of our institutions, and the most earnest admonition in favor of their perpetuity. for which Mr. W. was awarded, by Royal decree, the gold medal at last year's exhibition in Brussels, and for which he received the gold medal at the Hague at the last exhibition. We earnestly call the attention of the art public to an examination of these fine specimens of art as representative works of American talent, which have received the encomiums of foreign connoisseurs, and we feel confident in stating that they need only to be seen to be likewise endorsed by our connoisseurs at home. They are now on exhibition during the day from 8 till 5, and on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday evenings, the 10th, 11th, and 12th instant, from 7 till 10 o'clock.

CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOK, 1866.

Now Ready, in One Handsome Volume,

THE HUDSON,

FROM THE WILDERNESS TO THE SEA.

By BENSON J. LOSSING.

ILLUSTRATED BY THREE HUNDRED AND SIX ENGRAVINGS
ON WOOD, FROM DRAWINGS BY THE AUTHOR,
AND A FRONTISPIECE ON STEEL.

In this work the publishers trust that they have placed before the public the best and most extensive series of illustrations of America's finest river ever collected in a single volume. Upward of three hundred original drawings from the pencil of Benson J. Lossing, and all specially engraved for the Hudson, must give this book a claim upon the regard of all who dwell upon its banks, or who have at any time visited its broad waters; the more especially when the pictorial effect is enhanced by an accompanying text so amusing and at the same time so instructive as that of our artist-author.

Combining, as they have endeavored to do in the present instance, faithful though minute pictures of all that is remarkable in the entire course of the river, whether for its historical associations or its landscape beauty, with brief though accurate records of incidents which have rendered its waters memorable in American history, and its banks, in many places, treasures of natural beauty, it may be said that the attractions of the Hudson are now brought into the library of every one whose education or taste has fitted them for their appreciation.

Having thus far spoken of the literary and artistic merits of their volume, the publishers hope that in giving necessary publicity to the work they may be permitted to call attention to those minor merits of paper and printing which do so much toward constituting the difference between a "book" and a "treasure of art;" they have chosen toned paper of the hue which they think best calculated to give a delicacy to their engravings; they have employed the most careful printers, and have engaged the services of binders who have essayed to make the external appearance of The Hudson alike worthy of its pages and of the noble stream whose course it professes to delineate; and on the whole they have essayed to produce a book alike worthy of the shelves of the library, the drawing room table of the lady, or the valise of the traveler who has determined to make himself familiar in part or in the whole with the

One Thousand Dollars.

Office of The Nation, 130 Nassau St., N. Y.,
December 15, 1866.

The Nation newspaper, now entering upon its Fourth Volume, was established as an essay towards creating a higher standard of public discussion and literary criticism than had been common, especially in the daily press, and while maintaining the fundamental principles of our republicanism, to be independent of parties and sects of whatever name. That it has been successful in this design is proved by the abundant and almost enthusiastic testimony of the most competent judges, and by the rank which it assumed and has held nearly from the start.

If the aim of its proprietors were self-gratulation, they might be content with this; but they desire to exercise a wider influence not only on the people at large, but especially upon the young, and, as auxiliary in both cases, upon those whose profession is teaching—in the school-house, the pulpit, at the bar, in the legislature. They have accordingly determined to offer an inducement to these classes especially, but not exclusively, to read The Nation themselves and to procure subscribers for it.

One week after the first day of July, 1867, they will pay a premium of

to the person who shall, between the present time and the date above mentioned, have forwarded to this office the largest number of new subscriptions exceeding one hundred;

Provided, that each subscription shall be for a full year (beginning with any number); and that there shall be at least TWENTY competitors for the premium.

If there be fewer than twenty competitors, but at least ten, will be awarded to the most successful.

In case of a tie, the order of time of receipt shall decide; and nothing sent after June 30, 1867, or received after July 7, will be allowed in the decision.

☞ A commission of fifty cents, on account, will be allowed for each subscriber as forwarded, to be retained by the person sending the name and subscription price; and the first ten subscribers will entitle the canvasser to a copy of The Nation for one year, besides.

The attention of law, medical, and theological students in particular is called to this opportunity, which adds to positive reward for exertion the chance of a very considerable accession to their resources.

INSTRUCTIONS.

Every competitor should announce his intention with the first subscription forwarded, and should number each subsequent sending.

For $4 50, a receipt in full ($5) will be sent from this office directly to the person indicated.

Write legibly all parts of the address.

The address of the person awarded the premium will be promptly forwarded to each competitor.

The Week.

THE Supreme Court has pronounced its decision on the test oath cases, four judges, including the Chief-Justice, dissenting. The Missouri Act, prescribing a test oath as a qualification for the exercise of certain callings, has in the case of a Catholic clergyman been pronounced unconstitutional. The Act of Congress also, which made the taking of a test oath denying participation in the rebellion a qualification for practice as an attorney and counsellor in the Supreme Court, has been pronounced unconstitutional, on the singular ground, amongst others, that to require this oath of a man who cannot take it is to inflict a punishment without trial. In other words, the right of Congress to prescribe the qualifications of the lawyers in the Federal courts is solemnly denied. Judge Miller read a dissenting opinion of great power. His illustrations of the weakness of the reasoning which attributes a penal character to the exaction of a qualification are very happy, and if the paper were not slightly tinged with temper, it would be a model argument. This last decision is much more instructive as an exhibition of the leanings of the court than the one in the Milligan case, and it has the great merit of not being saddled with a dictum. Its effect on the country will, undoubtedly, be exasperating, and it makes the political horizon darker than ever. But we sincerely trust editors and orators will keep their temper. Revilings and threatenings, directed against the judges of the Supreme Court, and talk of "judicial conspiracy" and "judicial usurpation," are things which anybody has wit enough to utter; but they help very materially, when uttered by people of influence, to stimulate the growing want of respect both for judges and law. It is not possible for the Supreme Court to keep out of political controversies as long as its jurisdiction is what the Constitution has declared it to be; and it is to be expected in the nature of things that in exciting times its decisions should mortally offend one or other of the great parties, and that they should be marked by the infirmities of the men who utter them—for judges are, after all, men of the same flesh and blood as General Butler and Wendell Phillips. It is of the last importance to the country—to law, order, and morality, however, that their characters and motives should be respected, whatever disposition may be made of their decisions; and we do not hesitate to say that these last ones, considered in connection with several others which will doubtless come before long, bid fair to present to the people the momentous problem whether they will allow the Government to be jeopardized, and the form of polity on which the nation has resolved, and for which 200,000 men have laid down their lives, to be set aside by any tribunal, however eminent or respectable. Questions which affect a nation's destiny that nation only can answer; and no nation worthy of the name will ever allow anybody else to try to answer them.

THE impeachment still lingers in the Judiciary Committee, who have had Mr. Ashley before them for the purpose of extracting from him all he knows, but the investigation has for some reason or other been suspended for the present. Meantime, Mr. Loan, of Missouri, seems to have been robbed of his sleep by Mr. Ashley's laurels, and in casting about for some worse charge against the President than any which the latter had brought forward, he lighted on one of complicity in Mr. Lincoln's assassination. This he produced in the House on Monday with becoming solemnity, but on being asked, very properly but very sharply, by Mr. Hale to display for the sake of decency some little proof of the truth of his accusation, he loftily refused to do so then, but promised to do so hereafter. We doubt if any gentleman can outdo Mr. Loan, as there is really no crime more heinous than that which he has appropriated. There was at one time some talk of accusing Mr. Johnson of adultery, which, it must be confessed, would have had, as a ground for impeachment, many attractive features; but then there was some doubt whether it could be shown to be one of the "high crimes and misdemeanors" contemplated by the Constitution; so it has, we presume, been abandoned. In the meantime, General Butler has our heartfelt sympathy. There is he fretting away the slow hours in Lowell, while Ashley, Loan & Co. are having their pick of all the best villanies and usurpations, and will probably have the impeachment cooked and ready to serve by the time he gets to Congress.

WHETHER the impeachment will really be carried through the House and brought before the Senate, it is still difficult to say. Public opinion, in every way in which it has as yet been tested, seems, as we have always anticipated it would be, decidedly against it. But a long article in the New York Times, and which is evidently from Mr. Raymond's hand, predicts very confidently that the trial will come off, inasmuch as the Radical leaders will press it, and the more moderate men, who in their hearts disapprove of it, will be driven into supporting it, as they have so many other things, by an unsparing application of the party whip. For our own part, we are still satisfied that unless there is in somebody's possession evidence of worse offences than Mr. Johnson is now known to have committed, his impeachment, whether it succeed or fail, will prove a great and lasting calamity. It will convulse the country at present and introduce a new element of disorder into our politics in the future. But there are crimes for which, if it can be shown that he has committed them, he must be impeached, whether we like it or not, and no matter what it may cost. "The million of Democratic arms" which were promised for his protection by some of the orators at the recent Democratic Convention in Connecticut exist in the imagination of the orator, and we advise Mr. Johnson not to count too strongly on their aid. The most palpable result of the impeachment, as far as the Democratic party is concerned, would probably be a vast increase in the consumption of whiskey and in profane swearing.

Mr. Cameron and not Mr. Stevens has got the nomination for the Pennsylvania senatorship. We feared this result as soon as we saw Mr. Stevens's declaration in favor of electoral purity. Political managers are apt to be as much disgusted by a candidate's announcing his intention to be honest and high-minded as the French are by a young man's boasting of his chastity. It invariably makes them drop him on the spot with mingled pity and contempt. But we must add that Mr. Stevens would have carried into the Senate certain gifts which that body can well spare. His humor, for instance, would neither add to its dignity nor its wisdom, and would have made as many people cry as it made laugh, we hope. Mr. Trumbull's success in Illinois will delight everybody who still sets some value on the union of zeal and discretion—of honesty and clear-headedness and learning.

There is to be no unreasonable delay in forming the "rings" which are to govern this city during the current year. Among the Aldermen there has been a little hitch in the business, but we judge from the proceedings of Tuesday that everything will hereafter go on smoothly. Alderman Ely's right to a seat was contested a year ago, and by a unanimous vote he was allowed to retain it. He holds over from last year. A committee of three was appointed to examine into his right and report whether the contestant should not be allowed to take his place. Twelve members, we believe, are already secured for the aldermanic ring, but a thirteenth is wanting to fill out the number necessary for passing any vote which involves expenditure of public moneys. Mr. Ely's friends proposed on Tuesday that the corporation counsel be asked whether or not the action of the committee of last year was not final. But this resolution was referred to the committee of three whose business it is to proceed with the investigation, and there is a very near prospect of Mr. Ely being unseated. Our Common Council on the same day deliberated under guard of a number of policemen, whose presence moved Mr. Stacom to enquire with wrath why these officers were brought there to crowd the room. Mr. Stephen Roberts replied that it was because the inkstands were not fastened down; he had not brought the policemen into the council room, he added, but he understood that their duty was to protect the citizens of this city, and probably they had read in the newspapers the account of the last meeting of the board. After some more debate, Councilman Flynn "avowed in emphatic terms his affection for the Democratic party" and was sorry to observe an inclination on the part of the press "to chuck odium onto him," and then the board adjourned. The Aldermen before adjourning voted themselves a badge and a staff of office apiece, and an amendment was defeated which provided that gentlemen who got these insignia last year should not get them again. This was defeated, but afterwards, in lieu of badges and staves, "books, maps, and stationery" were substituted. There seems to be a very general expectation that we are seeing the last of our City Fathers, and that they are to perish, fittingly, by operation of law.

"Whereas, James Stephens, the so-called C. O. I. R., has, according to his own words, proved himself a cheat, a scoundrel, and a rascal, and wound up a career of deception and fraud by a most ignominious fizzle in the city of New York, three thousand miles from the place where he promised to offer up his life on the altar of his country," therefore it has been resolved by the New York Fenians to depose "the man in the gap" and let another take his office. Choice has fallen on a man of the name of Gleeson, an ex-brigadier or acting-brigadier-general. It was maintained at the meeting where he was elected that, but for the cowardly treachery of Stephens, the green flag would be to-day floating, as it floated at Fort Erie, "high, proud, and victorious", over the red, the accursed red, of England, and our American citizens of Irish descent would have had a country which they might have used as a base of operations against the English Government. Roberts is now the leading Fenian, having discomfited O'Mahony, Stephens, Killian, and Sweeny. But we anticipate no Canadian campaign of 1867, and if there should be one attempted, there is no doubt that the supply of "informers" will be enormous, and the province can be amply prepared for Gleeson's march. Roberts's turn for deposition will, doubtless, come before long, and then the Fenian gallery of humbugs will be complete.

When we commented last week on the proposition to tax foreign pictures for the "benefit" of American art, we thought it was either a joke or the scheme of two or three gentlemen who found their own pictures hang heavy on their hands. But we learn from a letter in the Evening Post that it originated in the Academy of Design, and in perfect earnest. The tax is to be levied only on pictures worth less than $1,000, and it is to be for the benefit of the "younger" (i. e., the worst) artists, who are now beaten by foreigners. Why are young artists to be protected any more than young authors? Why are Messrs. Ticknor & Fields and Messrs. Harper to be allowed to republish novels, "social articles," poems, and what not, all imported from abroad, free of duty, when there are plenty of writers here with wares of the same kind for sale which they cannot dispose of? Why are artists afraid to trust their performances to the public judgment, and to rely on their own merits, any more than authors, or actors, or singers? Why do American singers and actors not get protection? Then, also, why can the public not be trusted to select its own pictures? Why may an American man not buy foreign "trash" if he pleases? Does the Academy of Design really propose to get up an Index Expurgatorius in art, and tell us what pictures we ought to have in our houses? If the Government is competent to do work of this kind, is it not also competent to select our books for us, and ought it not to levy duty on books according to their literary, and not their commercial, value? The Custom-house valuation of a picture does not, and cannot, indicate its real value. A young artist may produce a work far surpassing many a one of Gérome's or Couture's in real merit, but he cannot ask half as much money for it; and if we buy it in Paris, would it not be outrageous to have the Academy of Design step in and clap $100 duty on it because they choose to consider it "trash?"

Our neighbors of the Hartford Press will agree with us that when any object lies within the compass of Timothy Titcomb's wit, and is made a mark for the shafts of his satire, the ridiculous side of it must have been long perfectly obvious to the ordinary mind. Now, in his novel entitled "Miss Gilbert's Career"—at which the Press and Miss Susan B. Anthony ought to be equally angry—the doctor has several pages "full of comparisons and wounding flouts" which he puts upon half a dozen typical "country papers." Mr. Lowell, before him, had done the same thing, and Dr. Holmes, we see, begins in his new novel to glance at them. We all know, who know anything of the little sheets published in the rural districts, that they are equally prone to quack-medicine advertisements and "first-class notices" of circuses, poems, and other such things for which they have tickets or of which they get a specimen copy. Every man laughs at his "local paper." But what man will say that we ever put upon such journals as the Advertiser of Boston, or the Transcript of the same city, or the Tribune of Chicago, or the Democrat of St. Louis, or the newspapers of Springfield or Hartford or Milwaukee or Cincinnati or Lewiston, that opprobrious epithet "provincial"? We hereby inform the Press that we have not adopted, and do not now think of adopting, that division—dear to the reporter of the "great dailies"—of all American newspapers into "metropolitan" and "provincial."

News comes from Massachusetts which we are, on the whole, sorry to hear. The town records, it is said, show that in the first generation of settlers, when they were Englishmen, the average number of children in a family was eight or ten. In the second, third, and fourth generations, the number was seven or eight; in the fifth, five was the average number; in the sixth, it was less than three. In the present, which is supposed to be the seventh generation, the average number of offspring is less than three even, and the deaths exceed in number the births. Meantime, the foreigners increase by immigration and by excess of births over deaths; and in about twenty-five years, if things go on as at present, the foreign-born population and the descendants of foreigners will be in a majority. The gradual progress of this diminution has been taken to prove that the vitality and virility of the old Puritan stock is gradually diminishing. Probably this is not true, or not true to any very great extent. In the war just over, Massachusetts men, as may be proved by statistical records, showed no lack of endurance or courage. We do not understand that complaint is made of the want of virility of the New Englanders, largely Massachusetts men, who have peopled the West. And it must be remembered, too, that the damaging comparison of Massachusetts parents with foreigners is drawn between them and people of the Irish race, one of the most prolific in the world. We suppose that the comfort in which the New Englanders live, and for many years have lived, has had the same effect upon population there that a like condition of things has had latterly in France and for a longer time in Switzerland—namely, it has kept population nearly stationary. Give a man a respectable position in life, and he does not wish his children after him to occupy lower places. That this consideration is of force is a fact in political economy, just as it is a fact that when a man in poverty and misery is satisfied that he cannot raise himself by any exertions, he marries young and leaves many children to inherit his wretched condition. "The Irish manufacture, that of children," which Sydney Smith speaks of, was never more flourishing than when the manufacturers were most abjectly miserable. Ministers have been cited, a proof that these somewhat occult causes are to be taken into account, though we have never seen any statistics that would support the theory. They seem, it is said, to get into the habit of relying upon Providence and their congregations, and thus generally have a pewful of offspring. Were they more worldly-minded and careful of ways and means, they would have less need of carefulness than too many of them now have. The prudence of the Yankees, then, has, in our opinion, had most to do with bringing about a state of things which the rest of us regret. And doubtless it would be correct, too, to lay some portion of the blame upon the physical education, or want of it, of the New England women.

The news from Crete is the only news from Europe worth notice. A letter of great interest from a well-informed correspondent on the island will be found in another column, and, though six weeks old, will give a very good idea of the nature of the struggle—a struggle of heroism and despair against overwhelming odds; odds of arms, of numbers, of everything that makes an army formidable except mere valor. The sympathies of the civilized world are with the Cretans, and contributions begin to be forwarded to them from this country. But although the contagion of their example may reach the Greeks on the mainland, and risings may occur in Roumelia, Bosnia, and Bulgaria, and Greece proper may take part in the war, there is reason to fear that the movement will end, as so many others of the same kind have ended, without producing any better result than some splendid displays of courage and fortitude. The Christian population of Turkey consists of several races bound together by nothing but their religion and their hatred of the Turk. Unity of action amongst them is almost impossible. They are unarmed, and unused to arms, and have Turks living amongst them in every direction, not in considerable numbers, but in numbers sufficient to make insurrection difficult, who are better fitted for an irregular internecine struggle than even the regular troops. Then the very weakness and want of centralization in the Ottoman Government renders it hard to overthrow. There is no trade or commerce for a rebellion to damage, and each pashalic is so thoroughly independent of all the others that it serves much the same purpose in the state that a water-tight compartment does in a ship. There might, in fact, be half a dozen insurrections raging in as many provinces, and the Sultan would not be much worse off than he is now. He would send troops to ravage and kill; and if the rayahs could stand it as long as the Turks, or drove the Turks completely out, the former would, of course, succeed. But in the absence of foreign aid this is not to be looked for; and the absence of any population fitted to assume the government when the Turk is gone, the jealousy of the European powers touching the possession of Constantinople, the helplessness of Russia with her arsenal in the Black Sea gone, and a Hohenzollern reigning on the Danube, render it unlikely that "the great powers" will do anything better than watch each other. The continuance of Turkish domination in Europe is a blot on civilization; and if the Greek kingdom had proved more successful—if the Greeks had exhibited as much capacity for self-government as they did for revolution—the Ottoman Empire would ere now have disappeared.

THE FREEDMEN.

The New Year dawned upon a vast number of expired contracts at the South, and once more the labor question assumes considerable prominence in the affairs of that region. General R. B. Scott, the assistant commissioner for South Carolina, issued on the 26th of December a circular to the planters and laborers of that State on the results of the past year. He stated that the free-labor system had been mainly experimental, and that an avoidance of past errors would ensure success in the future. He urged the planters to encourage education among the freed people, in order that they may better comprehend the nature of contracts and the obligations of citizenship. He recommended the adoption of the labor system of the agricultural districts of the North and West, namely, to pay each laborer for his services by the week or month. Experience had convinced him that practical and fair-minded men can succeed with the freedmen as laborers. He concluded by exhorting the freedmen to cultivate honesty, industry, and thrift.

Unhappily, there appear to have been so many hardships under the old régime—partly due to the ill-temper and bad faith of the planters, and partly to natural causes—that a large portion of the colored people are ready to emigrate, and are actually removing to other States. Texas is the bourne of many, but Florida, being nearest, receives the majority. On the 5th a well-selected colony of six hundred freedmen sailed from Charleston for New Smyrna, Florida, in charge of Brig.-Gen. Ely, to settle on lands located for them under the Homestead Act. Their number is to be swelled to three thousand. A similar exodus of laborers is reported from Columbia and Sumter. Transportation is afforded by Government, with the promise of six months' rations after arrival.

—We learn via Richmond that there is a widespread unwillingness on the part of the freedmen to contract for the current year. In the lower counties of Texas they try to stipulate for one-third of the crop, which is generally denied them. In North Carolina, $15 a month and rations are rejected by them, and they are desirous of working on shares by combinations amongst themselves. In Lancaster District, S. C., no trouble prevails, and new engagements have been already formed. At Columbus, Ga., Capt. Moseback, Bureau agent, announces that the regulations of the Bureau are still in force, and that no contracts will be enforced by it except those which it has approved.

—In the pine-barren country south of Mobile a company of Northern men, the New York and Mobile Turpentine Manufacturing Company, have tried the experiment of free labor—if it can still be called an experiment when conducted with common sense and honesty—with very gratifying success. For a year past they have employed forty hands, all colored men, of whom one receives $50, one $30, two $25, twenty-one $20, and twelve $15 a month. They are also rationed by the company, and furnished with medical attendance gratis, and their work is said to be done in a very satisfactory manner, and its result to be quite profitable to their employers.

—In Texas, Gen. Kiddoo has ordered the work of the late legislature called "The Labor Law" to be disregarded, and contracts made in accordance with it to be disapproved by assistant commissioners. Gov. Throckmorton has requested Gen. Sturgis to send cavalry to Caldwell Co., to repress outrages on freedmen and others.

—The Inspector of Schools, etc., has just made a report of the schools in West Virginia and the Shenandoah Valley. He found one at Parkersburg, two at Martinsburg, and four at Winchester. At Parkersburg the city authorities pay $30 per month towards the support of the school. The inspector states also that the citizens of Harrisburg have written to the Rev. Mr. Brackett, the agent of a Northern educational society, inviting him to open a freedmen's school at that point and promising assistance. He closes his report by saying that public sentiment with regard to freedmen's schools, in Northern and Western Virginia, has changed very materially, so that those who a year ago openly opposed them, now come out in their favor and even assist them.

—In Richmond, Va., the city authorities are issuing fuel to the poor whites, but utterly refuse any assistance to the blacks.

LITERARY.

An article in the January number of the "North American Review" calls general attention to an historical question relating to the early colonization of Virginia which has been raised and discussed by Mr. Charles Deane in the introduction to his recent reprint of Captain John Smith's "True Relation of Virginia." Mr. Deane takes the ground that the story of Smith's deliverance by Pocahontas, by far the most romantic of our early legends, is entirely mythical. The argument is complicated, but rests chiefly on the basis of Smith's general want of veracity, and on no mention of the circumstance being made by Smith until sixteen years after, in the "Generall Historie," when Pocahontas herself was dead and the story could hardly be refuted. The silence of contemporary writers is also of weight. In 1608, the very year of his escape from the Indians, Smith published in London the "True Relation," giving an account of his capture and release. In this he does not even mention Pocahontas, but speaks of being treated with great kindness by Powhatan and all the Indians. Wingfield, the first president of the colony, circulated the same year a "Discourse of Virginia," in which he gives the dates and history of Smith's expedition up the Chickahominy, but does not allude to the romantic story. The next account is in 1612, when Smith published "A Map of Virginia," with an account of his explorations. In this he speaks of his capture, but makes no mention of Pocahontas's part in his release. About the year 1615, William Strachey, late secretary of the colony, wrote a history of travel in Virginia, printed by the Hakluyt Society in 1849, which contains accounts of Smith's adventures and some curious details about Pocahontas, but not a word of this story. In 1615, a small quarto volume appeared in London by Raphe Hamor, which gave a minute account of the capture of Pocahontas, of her conversion and subsequent marriage to Rolfe, and of a visit which Hamor paid to Powhatan, and the details of a conversation with him, and also Rolfe's letter to Sir Thomas Dale, justifying his marriage. The silence of all these books leads us inevitably to suppose that no one in Virginia then knew of the noble act of Pocahontas. In 1616 Pocahontas and her husband came to England and were entertained at court. Purchas, who knew them and knew Smith well, and had many interviews with Tomocomo, an Indian of Powhatan's tribe, published in 1617 the third edition of his "Pilgrimage," in which he tells the stories of Smith and of Pocahontas, but makes no reference to the one great story. The same year Pocahontas died. The prominence which she had in England probably gave rise to various romantic stories, and to this among them, which Smith may have adopted instead of invented. In 1622, in a pamphlet called "New England's Trials," he makes an allusion to it, and in 1624, in the "Generall Historie," he tells the story in full, with many exaggerations and changes from his narrative of 1608. The reasoning of Mr. Deane seems to show conclusively the falsity of the legend.

—A new publishing society, called the Agathynian Club, has been started in this city for issuing original publications and reprinting rare, curious, and old American, English, French, and Latin books. They are to be printed at the Bradstreet Press, with great exactness of text and careful attention to excellency of workmanship. One hundred and twenty copies only of each work will be published, one hundred of which will be for sale and the remainder for private distribution. The first issue, to be published about the 15th of February, will be a reprint of a very rare satire, entitled "Advice to the Officers of the British Army," the authorship of which is generally attributed to Captain Grose, a literary gentleman of the last century. A satirical woodcut, supposed to represent Sir Henry Clinton, General Burgoyne, Lord Cornwallis, and others, will be given in fac-simile of the original. The notes and introduction to the book will be by a well-known author. The price of the first reprint will be $5, paper; $6, extra cloth, top edge gilt. Subscriptions are received by Messrs. J. M. Bradstreet & Son, 18 Beekman Street, N. Y., and by Messrs. John Penington & Son, 127 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

—Mr. John Dorgan, the promising poet of Philadelphia, who is just dead, much regretted, is understood to have left behind him manuscript poems sufficient to form another volume, which may very likely soon be printed. They are in the hands of the poet's sister.

—We are very sorry to record the death of the Rev. Edward Hincks, D.D., the distinguished Assyrian scholar, on the 3d of December last, at the age of seventy-four. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he gained a fellowship before he was twenty-one. He became a minister of the Church of England, and for the last forty-one years has been rector of Killyleagh, in Ireland. His talent in deciphering texts in unknown characters and languages was wonderful. It was applied first to the study of Egyptian hieroglyphics, and afterwards to the inscriptions in cuneiform characters found in Assyria. At this he labored for many years with great perseverance and success, and was one of the chief authorities on the Assyrian language and history. Living in a remote country village, he accomplished much less than if he had been at London, near the British Museum.

—A spirited controversy has arisen in Germany on the genuineness of the Roman inscriptions found in the Nennig excavations, mentioned in a late number of The Nation. Prof. Brambach, of Bonn, first gave his opinion that they were forged; and, after a lively debate on both sides, the question was submitted to Prof. Mömmsen. At a meeting of the Archæological Society in Berlin, on the 6th of November, in which the inscriptions at Nennig formed the principal topic of discussion, he declared them to be forgeries, and minutely stated his reasons for believing them to be such. They are supposed to have been forged by some students in order to mystify the antiquarians. Steps have been taken to prevent any repetition of such outrages, and to guard the excavations more thoroughly.

—Russia, as well as Germany and England, celebrates the centenaries of the birth of its distinguished writers. On the 13th of December the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Karamzin, the historian of Russia, and one of her greatest writers, was celebrated with much ceremony at St. Petersburg, Moscow, Nijni-Novgorod, and at all the universities in Russia. At Moscow, the festival was under the charge of the University and the societies of Russian history, archæology, and literature. Various papers and poems were read and speeches made, and the whole terminated by a grand dinner. At St. Petersburg the ceremonies were more splendid, and were held in the hall of the Imperial Academy of Sciences, before an assembly of more than fifteen hundred distinguished personages. There were present the son and daughters of Karamzin, the Czarevitch, the Grand Dukes Vladimir and Alexis, the Duke of Leuchtenberg, and Prince Peter of Oldenburg. The president of the Academy, the Count T. Lutke, opened the meeting by announcing that the Emperor had conferred the order of St. Stanislas of the first class on Vladimir Karamzin, the son of the historian, and on the academician Pogodin, who had just published a biography of Karamzin in two volumes. It was also announced that the Academy had published on that day the letters of Karamzin to his intimate friend Dmitrief, which cover a period of forty years, and are of great historical and literary importance. They had been presented for that purpose by the nephew of Dmitrief. A French translation of the "Letters of a Russian Traveller" had also been published by Prof. Poroshin at Paris, and Mr. Glinka had sent to the Academy a manuscript containing his personal recollections of Karamzin. A poem by Prince Viazemski, and several discourses on Karamzin and his works, were then read. An oration by Mr. Bestuzhef-Rumin was pronounced the next day at the University of St. Petersburg. At this séance the degree of doctor of history was conferred by the University on Gen. Milutin, the Secretary of War, for his work, "The History of the War of 1799 between Russia and France."

—Rousseau, in his "Emile," raised some controversies, not entirely free from paradox, on the morality of La Fontaine's fables. With that exception, and the opposition which Lamartine manifested to them in one of his "Entretiens," these simple and inoffensive fables have had an uncontested popularity. The edition now being issued with wood-cuts by Gustave Doré—by far the best of his recent work—will not by any means diminish the pleasure they give to adult readers as well as children. A new fabulist has come forward in the Count Anatole de Ségur, who, though he professes to be a humble disciple of La Fontaine, and merely a gleaner in the field that he has reaped, has written many fables that bear a very favorable comparison with the works of the master. The dedication, which is itself a fable, is addressed to La Fontaine. This is not M. de Ségur's first book, though he is not in the profession of literature, but only writes in the leisure left to him from his duties as Maître des Requêtes. This last volume, "Nouvelles Fables et Contes, suivis de Satires et de Poésies diverses," as its name implies, is not confined to fables, but includes many tales and short poems, all bearing the impress of the author's delicacy of imagination, and breathing a pure religion which is very rare in modern French poetry. Some of the satires are excellent, and one fable, which is a satire as well, is so charming that we give it entire as a specimen. It is called "L'homme qui cherche un fiacre."

"Il pleuvait à torrents. Un bourgeois tout crotté
Cherchait partout un fiacre avec anxiété,
Et ne le trouvait pas.—Vous perdez votre peine,
Lui dit à la fin un passant,
Touché de son air innocent;
Si la journée était sereine,
Pour un que vous cherchez, vous en trouveriez dix;
Mais, par le temps qu'il fait, votre recherche est vaine;
Vous ne trouverez rien, c'est moi qui vous le dis!
Les fiacres sont pareils à ces amis du monde
Sur lesquels à tort on se fonde,
Tout prêts à vous servir quand le péril est loin,
Mais qu'on ne trouve plus dès qu'on en a besoin."

—Mr. Whitley Stokes, the well-known Celtic scholar, is at present secretary to the Legislative Council at Calcutta. He has just printed a contribution to the study of Gaelic and Erse, in a pamphlet of 108 pages, called "Goidilica; or, Notes on the Gaelic Manuscripts preserved at Turin, Milan, Berne, Leyden, the Monastery of St. Paul, Carinthia, and Cambridge, with Eight Hymns from the Liber Hymnorum, and the old Irish notes in the Book of Armagh." Mr. Stokes's object in printing was to preserve his glosses from the destruction which all MSS. in India sooner or later meet with, and "to give those excellent German philologists who, like Schleicher and Ebel, have expressed a desire for trustworthy copies of old Irish compositions, material on which they may work with confidence." All the Gaelic and Erse pieces have full notes, in which there is much minute comparison of the words and forms with others of Indo-European stock, and glossaries, and some are translated.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE Illinois State Teachers' Association, held December 25–27, at Jacksonville, took decided ground against any division of the Agricultural University fund. The feeling on this matter is so nearly unanimous in that State, that the few who hoped to reap benefit for the treasuries of existing colleges by its division will have no power. President Sturtevant, of Illinois College, an offshoot of Yale, expressed the almost unanimous feeling when he said that the college and the public school must be in full sympathy, and if the establishment of a free university interfered with existing colleges, let the colleges go, his among the rest. Aversion to multiplying colleges so as to find students with only the attainments of pupils in elementary schools, with a mere sprinkling of regular course students, was strongly expressed in addresses and discussions. The difficulties surrounding the proposed university now seem to be only those liable to grow out of mistaken legislation as to its location and organization.

The subject of reformatory schools was prominent in the convention, and it was recommended to found two State schools at each extreme of Illinois. The appointment to civil offices under Government according to merit purely was advocated on account of its necessary tendency to encourage thoroughness in education. And the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures was approved and urged.

—A great hubbub has been caused among the wide-awake teachers and school-men of New England by a case of whipping which occurred last June in one of the schools of Cambridge, Mass. The merits of the local question are of little general interest; but owing to the fact that some of the professors in Harvard College, and some of the most distinguished educators in the neighborhood of Boston, have taken part in the discussion, the principles which pertain to corporal punishment in schools are likely to be thoroughly examined. The occasion of the controversy was this. A girl of sixteen years old was whipped by one of the lady teachers in a public school for disobedience. The parents were indignant and appealed to the school committee for redress; but the committee sustained the teacher. Thereupon, the venerable President Walker and other excellent men petition the school authorities "to abolish the corporal punishment of girls" in the public schools. Then began a discussion which is running through all the school journals and many of the newspapers. The school committee of Cambridge has published a defence of the necessity of whipping as a means of discipline. Dr. Morrill Wyman has made a vigorous protest (in another pamphlet) against the punishment of girls by whipping; showing conclusively, as we think, that there are physiological reasons why a distinction should be made between the sexes in respect to the punishments inflicted. The recent election of school officers in Cambridge turned on the point of sustaining the committee, and, as might be expected, public opinion was pronounced in opposition to the defenders of corporal punishment. This leads the teachers to exclaim that they cannot preserve order without the permission to resort to punishment; and school committees are discovering that in place of whipping still more offensive, and in some cases ignominious, punishments are liable to be resorted to. Prof. Atkinson, in the "Massachusetts Teacher" for January, sums up the whole matter with excellent judgment. He copies a curious article from Southey showing where "the superstitious regard for corporal punishment came from," he prints the semi-official protest of the Boston masters against the abolition of whipping, and then makes a calm review of the state of the question. His conclusion is this, that the punishment of the older girls is open to grave physiological objections and that the whipping both of girls and boys should be given up in schools. But this cannot be done in a day. It must be a gradual change. But teachers and school officers should resolutely set their faces in the direction of a change.

—The school of the fine arts which was instituted at Yale College by the late Mr. A. R. Street has just received as a gift one of the best and most celebrated paintings of Washington Allston. It was presented by Prof. S. F. B. Morse, who was well known as a painter long before the days of his telegraphic discoveries. As he is both a graduate of Yale College and a pupil of Washington Allston's, his donation is a double tribute of regard to his early teachers. The picture has long been in the possession of the Gibbs family, in Newport, R. I., and was sold for $7,000.

—Much interest is felt both by the lovers of the fine arts and by the friends of liberal education to know what form the new department of Yale College will assume; whether it will be a mere collection of paintings, statuary, casts, engravings, and the like, or whether instruction will be given in the practical methods of art and the principles which underlie the production of works of beauty and the æsthetic culture of the mind. No formal announcement has been made upon this subject. The immediate responsibility of determining upon a plan is supposed to rest with the "Art Council" of the school, which consists at the present time of the president of the college, ex officio, Daniel Huntington, the artist, Donald G. Mitchell, the author, and Professors E. E. Salisbury and Noah Porter.

—A recent letter from Beirut mentions the curious fact that a professor in the Liberian College at Monrovia is now at Beirut for the purpose of acquiring the Arabic language and purchasing Arabic books so as to act upon the Arabic-speaking tribes in the interior of Africa, who are now fast encroaching upon the borders of Liberia. He also proposes to send two young men from Liberia to the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut in order that they may acquire the same language. Native Africans studying Arabic in an American college on the coast of the Holy Land in order to combat the encroachments of Mohammedanism in the neighborhood of Liberia, is a remarkable illustration of the mode in which different systems and nationalities now operate on one another.

—The report of the Superintendent of Common Schools in Pennsylvania for 1866 has just been published. The total cost of the school establishment for the year was more than four million dollars. The number of scholars enrolled was nearly three-quarters of a million. The law requires that schools be kept at least four months in the year. The number of male teachers was increased during the year by 493; of female teachers by only 62; showing, we think, that young men returning from the war are resuming their posts as teachers. The establishment of a State board of education is strongly recommended. More normal schools are called for in addition to the three which are now maintained. Mr. J. P. Wickersham, author of two excellent manuals for teachers, is the newly-appointed State superintendent.

THE school of what may be called the Native American or Know-Nothing poets we had thought was extinct, dead long ago, and gone bodily to Joel Barlow. But not so. Here we have two volumes, six hundred and forty pages, newly published, which not only belong to that school, but are really uncommonly fine specimens of its works and ways. To know that we have one of these writers so near us as Albany, surprises men of this generation as much as the late finding of the primeval bones at Cohoes. Everybody remembers that once upon a time, and, after all, it is not such a very long time ago, it used to be an article of faith, to be held by all the patriotic, that immediately America was to produce a poem at once grand and truly indigenous. The rotten monarchies of effete Europe—this was the argument—we had put to shame by constructing the Federal Union; Zerah Colburn led the world in mental arithmetic; Baltimore clippers were the fastest thing going; we could whip out anything in the way of mammoth caves, moonlight nights, and naval heroes; no absolute monarchy had any buffaloes; in short, we had a new world with everything in it new and everything superfine, and we were bound to have an original epic, if not a new art of poetry. In those days none of our thirty or forty first-class literary men doubted that a poem, committed with malice prepense, might, perhaps, be poetry in the first degree, and there was not one of them who could feel sure that he, discarding with a freeman's scorn the Acropolis, the knight-at-arms, the lion and the unicorn, the daisy, the nightingale, and other European poetic properties, might not be the destined son of the soil and of genius who was to indite the genuine poem of America. Our independence had been recognized, and we had a President of our own. It was only further necessary to sing the mighty Mississippi, the fringed gentian, the Capitol at Washington, golden maize, the heroes of Seventy-six, the red man with his hatchet, the pioneer with his axe, and the truths of the Declaration. Thought, imagination, harmonious verse—these, we fancy, no "Democratic" or "Analectic," or even "North American" reviewer would have severely insisted on in the case of a bard native born or duly naturalized.

And we can recollect, some of us—for who is wise at all seasons?—the time when we used to make honest efforts to do our duty as Americans and admire some of the dreariest volumes that have ever engaged the attention of post-Adamite man. Others of us were early cured. Those were they whose parsing lessons were in a book compiled by a Mr. Wells and a Mr. Truman Rickard, and whose reading lessons were in "Swan's District School Reader" and "Porter's Rhetorical Reader and Speaker." To such unfortunates the American elm is now the ugliest member of the whole vegetable kingdom, and the mocking-bird and the oriole and the bald-headed eagle very odious. It is those persons who admit readily that autumn is the saddest season of the year; October comes, and they seem to themselves to be once more reading "how much less beautiful than the gorgeous coloring of our own American foliage are the dull hues of the English woods in the fall." Visitors to Niagara are not drawn from among such pupils, nor would be, though the mayor and council of the village there should regulate the charges of the Niagara hackmen and the price of board. Such are not buyers of "Percival's Poems;" they had no tears to shed, we fear, when Lydia Sigourney and John Pierpont died. And persuasion would be wasted on them, they will not be got to read the poems of Mr. Street. Indeed, nobody will read them; the titles alone warn every one away: "White Lake," "The Gray Forest Eagle," "Onnawah," "Henry Clay," "The Harmony of the Universe," "Sunset on Shawangunk Mountain," "Osceola," "Fourth of July Ode," "The Willewemoc in Summer," "The Late Hon. Stephen Van Rensselaer," "Indian Summer," "Mongaup Falls"—these no persistency in printing them will ever publish; they have surely had their day and ceased to be. To offer specimens of them is not necessary, and it is better to show the author in another field. A few lines will be enough, and we take them from "Nature," which is sixteen pages of blank-verse. See into what a wooden orrery he turns the universe:

"God glanced on chaos, into form it sprang;
Worlds clustered round him; instant at his will,
Blazing, they darted to their destined spheres,
Spangling the void, and in their orbits wheeled,
Each with a different glory. Kindled suns
Shot their fierce beams, and gentle moons were robed
In soft, pure, silvery lustre. Chaos lived."

On further consideration, however, we will give one short extract as a specimen from the vein which Mr. Street habitually works, and permit the poet to be tried, as he should be, by the things he can do best. It is more blank-verse, and is taken from a piece called "A September Stroll":

"A grassy glade, with points and curving banks,
The dry bed of a streamlet, lures our steps.
The varied aster tribes stand clustered round;
The gnarled thorn shows its yellow-crimson fruit,
Studding its boughs, and scattered thick beneath;
And from the brinks the solidago bends
Its golden feather: mingling with the sweet
And peaceful quiet, low monotonous sounds
Stream from the insects, varied with the swell
Of the near locust's peevish clarion,
And chirping of the cricket. Now the fence
We leap, and stray into the broad green field.
The air is an elixir; as we breathe,
The blood swift tingles in our veins; we long
To bound with transport and shout out our joy.
The thread-like gossamer is waving past,
Borne on the wind's light wing, and to yon branch,
Tangled and trembling, clings like snowy silk,
The thistle-downs, high lifted through the rich
Bright blue, quick float, like gliding stars, and then and so forth; it is really of no consequence where one leaves off. The poet is always sure to proceed in just this way, making inventories of every scene as if he were an appraiser, and piling up details in the most oppressive and utterly unreadable manner. To be brief, he is a perfect exemplar of the fault which consists in not being able, as the old saying goes, to see the wood for the trees; and a bad photographer is as much a poet as he.

In his own way, Mr. Michael Scanlan is as distinctly of a well-known class as Mr. Street is in his totally different way. Mr. Scanlan as a poet is an Irishman of the sort that peoples the stage and novels. He has the familiar "smile on his lip and the tear in his eye." Whiskey and fighting he adores, and to the girls he gives an equal admiration, now of the rollicking and now of the sentimental kind; and on any of these stock subjects he finds it perfectly easy to knock off a song which quite often shall only narrowly escape being poetry. And with this stage and novel Irishman he unites that Irishman whom we hear about in Sarsfield Literary Associations, and whom of late years we have not infrequently had visibly before us, who very rhetorically expresses his deathless hate of the Sassenach and his fierce resolve to make the land of Brian free. Still, it is impossible not to feel sympathy with the feeling that prompts the rodomontade of a "reasonably honest" head centre, and it may be taken as one convincing proof of the magnitude of Irish wrongs that even Irish eloquence has not made them wholly ridiculous. Mr. Scanlan is a Fenian of the Fenians. His book is even edged with ugly red, so that the grass-green of the cover may be above the hated color, and the contents of the volume show that the poet must have been a treasure, literally worth many greenbacks, to the high officials at the Roberts and other headquarters. The "President I. R.," if he is wise in his generation, will appropriate some thousands—if so much remains unexpended—to the circulation of these fervid verses among the faithful who have so often bled freely for the treasury, at least, if not for the war department of the republic. Thus the poet versifies that "appeal" which Mr. Roberts put forth in Fort Erie times:

"At freedom's doors the lion's whelps, driven from the mother's den,
Whose spoors are traced across the earth by the blood and bones of men,
Like carnivores have jungled where they howl defiance nigh;
And shall they crunch our brothers' bones and we stand idly by?
No! spirits of our fatherland! Jehovah's mighty sons!
Let your answer be the bugles' blare and the flashing of your guns;
Let the rhythm of marching legions thunder vengeance in their ears,
As ye cross, once more, the borders with your old victorious cheers."

Of course, when the poet is Fenian, his brain is in a state of effervescence, and he can hardly help being noisy and foolish and ferocious; and when he is plaintive and sentimental, although he is never exasperating and emasculate like most other plaintive and sentimental verse-writers who use English, still he is, of course, tiresome, and half-a-dozen of the correspondents of the Pilot or the Citizen fill a quarter of a column as well as he. We prefer him when he is not humbugging and not ill-tempered, and take leave of him by quoting a stanza from "The Bachelor's Soliloquy," and by advising any one who wants a poetic memorial of a movement a little the most astounding of any as yet made in this century to buy Mr. Scanlan's book. Aside from the latter consideration, here is a tolerably fair sample of the most readable sort of writing that will be found in it:

"Says my grandfather, 'Tom, when you want a good jorum,
  Take whiskey and boil till it half disappears;
Then sweeten with honey; pour lemon-juice o'er 'em—
  But wather, me boy, 's a producer of tears.'

“And so I fill up and I drink to the Bradys;
Och! they were the boys for a fight or a spree.
Let me see! I was talking of love and the ladies:
’T is a subject just now more agreeable to me.”

Of Miss Emma Lazarus it is hardly fair to say anything. Her title-page tells us that the poems “were written between the ages of fourteen and seventeen.” A few of them are translations from the French of Alexandre Dumas and Victor Hugo, and the study of even such masters will be enough to teach Miss Lazarus soon that she has filled a book with verses and, as yet, written no poetry. We are bound to say that some of the verses are good ones, and that far older people than Miss Lazarus are daily publishing worse.

A NEW POET ?*

It is very natural that young and inexperienced persons should fancy that what is precious to them must be of value to others. His thoughts, his fancies, his sentiments, seem to the young man who writes verses to be an original possession of worth not only to himself, but even more to the general public. The emotions of youth and the expression of them are so new and delightful to him that he neglects to consider that all mankind are once young, and that, at least in our day, a large proportion of young men and women find pleasure in writing what they call poetry. The youth who writes verse with facility commits a pardonable error if he overestimates its value, and one in which he is encouraged by a common superstition which the progress of intelligence has weakened, it is true, but has not yet destroyed. It will be one of the triumphs of rationalism to free the human mind from its bondage to the writers of verse, by establishing the distinction between poetry and verse, and by limiting the title and authority of poet to the few who possess authentic claims to these honors.

But whatever excuses may be made for the young man or the young woman who offers his or her verse to the public and labels it poetry, and however leniently the good-natured critic may be inclined to deal with any individual instance, it is none the less true that the youth who thus displays the immature products of his intellect runs the risk alike of injuring his own modesty of soul and of making false claims upon those whom he addresses. In this age of notoriety, publicity, and puffing, it is hard, no doubt, to practise a reserve which is commended by the example of so few. But one who proposes to be a poet, or who fancies that the muse has deigned to inspire him with her divine breath, is thereby consecrated to a sacred service; a service which requires of him the dedication of all his faculties, and which he cannot hope faithfully to perform without long and arduous and patient toil. Reserve is the first study which he must practise. It is primary evidence against the validity of his claim to the office of poet if he be in haste to assert it. He is to win his knighthood only by labors and fastings and vigils. He can be a poet only on condition of fidelity to the muse. If he fail in this; if he seek for reputation, for praise, for money; if he find not sufficient reward and happiness in the service in which he is engaged, he may win the low ends which he prefers, but he shall never gain the pure, high glory of the real poet. For the true poet is like Sir Galahad, never turning aside from the search for the holy grail, never allured by low and unworthy objects, never seeking transient success, but holding steadily on his way, for Him mightier transports move and thrill;

So keeps he fair through faith and prayer
A virgin heart in work and will.”

Is it in vain to seek such self-consecration as this among our modern would-be poets? Is it in vain to hold up a fair ideal before those who are dazzled by the beauties of the world? If it be so, then there are lower considerations which may well check the desire of young people to publish their rhymes. If, for instance, the fact were understood that to write very respectable verse, verse which will pass for poetry with the public, requires little more faculty than playing cleverly on a musical instrument—a piano or a flute, for example—and affords no greater evidence of thought or feeling, we should certainly be spared both the annoyance of having to turn over so many pretty and utterly worthless volumes, and the regret at knowing that so many young people who might be better engaged are employed in this debilitating manufacture of poetic compositions.

“But,” some of these youthful enthusiasts for their own verses may object, “is not this criticism on our publications a virtual denial of the existence of genius? Do we not feel the fire burn within us, and how shall we venture to stifle or extinguish its flame?” “Dear, young, would-be poet,” we might reply, “how often does genius come into the world? How many geniuses (beside yourself) do you know? Genius can afford not to be in a hurry to manifest itself. Genius itself needs cultivation which no youth has had time to gain. The immortal works of poetry are great works of art, and youth is not capable of art. Art is long. It will, then, do you no harm to put aside these darlings of your pen at least for seven years. Be willing to serve for the muse at least as long as Jacob served for Rachel. Do not be afraid that your genius will decay; genius flourishes on self-culture, self-respect, and restraint. If, indeed, you think that we or the rest of the world require the instruction or solace or joy or beauty which your verses afford, will you be good enough to remember that we have already Homer, and Dante, and Shakespeare, not to mention the poets of whom you are most fond, Tennyson, Browning, Clough, and Lowell? And will you, with that modesty which becomes genius no less than it becomes mediocrity, be so kind as once more to read over these poets (and look also at Keats and Wordsworth), and then, laying your hand on your heart, tell us if you really think we need your verse quite yet, or whether your genius might not learn something by continued and faithful study of the works of these men, in whose number you desire to be enrolled. Are you not too hasty in trying to join such a company, and to be admitted ‘tra cotanto senno?’ ”

Here our reply should stop, for face to face with an innocent creature which has proved its innocence by the publication of a volume of verse, we have no mind to be otherwise than tender and considerate. We would hide even our compassion, lest it give offence. But were we to speak impersonally, without having any special individual in view, we should say that most of the poetry of young people, most of the poetry which appears in pretty duodecimo volumes, is an offence to both gods and men. Without absolute excellence a poem is worse than good for nothing. It is a pure delusion that to write a passable poem is a praiseworthy achievement. Men and women ought to try to find something better to do. Almost any other honest calling would be more creditable and more serviceable. It is only the men or women who write because expression is a genuine necessity to them who have a right to publish, and who will secure a place among the poets. Let us consider poetry as a profession disgraceful to any one who is not forced into it.

This may seem rather an ungracious preface to a notice of a little volume of poems by a young author, but it needed to be said, and we were the more ready to say it on this occasion because Mr. Weeks’s verses show qualities which may hereafter entitle him to be listened to—hereafter, when by culture and experience he shall have developed and defined his own individuality, widened the range of his thought, and deepened the tone of his feeling. The defect most obvious in his volume is, that it is written under impressions derived from other poets. The reader of Browning and Tennyson and Mrs. Browning and Lowell finds that Mr. Weeks has read them also, and that his verse is full of reminders of his favorite poets. But there is a delicate, sweet, and tender sentiment in many of his pieces which, however the tone and manner in which it is expressed may resemble that of some other writer, is plainly genuine and belongs to Mr. Weeks himself. The purity of feeling and the refinement of expression in some of the poems give assurance that he has faculties which he may cultivate to noble use. But as yet his sympathetic sensibilities overmaster his natural spirit, and there is a lack of individual pith, vigor, and certainty in his work. There is purity and sincerity in his verse, but a touch, now and then, of sentimentality. What Mr. Weeks needs is to cultivate and strengthen himself. Nature and the elder poets would be his best friends. Would he betake himself to their company and keep silent for a while, we should look to having from him ten years hence a volume much better than most of what goes by the name of poetry.

Let the following graceful verses of his own plead with him. They are called

THE GOOD PURSUIT.

I dream of the time when she
Whom I follow and dimly see,
And love still more and more
As ever she flies before,
True leader and guide to me—

I dream of the time when she
Shall be clearly seen by me,
Still flying, the beautiful one,
Still leading me on and on
To the lands which poets see.

I dream of the time when she
Shall be won at last by me,
At the edge of the promised land,
Which we enter hand in hand,
And I dream of what shall be.

Meanwhile, ’t is a joy but to see
The white robe beckoning me;

Time enough for a sight of the face,
When I prove myself true to the chase,
And am what she persuades me to be.

Mr. Weeks stands at the parting of the ways. Will he follow or drop the pursuit?

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JANUARY.

THOSE high-toned gentlemen, of whom every county in Eastern Virginia is supposed to have two or three, and of whom we ourselves have, with the eye of flesh, once seen one, who wear their hair down on their coat collars, and christen at least one son Powhatan because of the family descent from Pocahontas, daughter of that emperor, will be filled with the fiercest wrath if ever they read of Mr. Deane's researches in this last "North American." The name of Massachusetts—and it is long since any white Virginian loved it—will henceforth be more bitterly execrated than ever. A probable, at any rate a possible, descendant of the Federalist Adams, living in the State of the mudsill and Puritan, proclaims that John Esten Cooke's "Last of the Knights" and worthy pioneer of the first families of Virginia, was not only a roving adventurer and soldier of fortune, but a great liar, and on one occasion a base liar; and that the romantic Pocahontas, really a hard-featured Indian young woman, if she could look into Peter Parley's history or that of Mr. Bancroft, would need all the impassiveness of her race to keep from laughing at the wonderful tale which Smith, after she was dead, invented about her magnanimity and soft-heartedness. It is a pity—or, if the boldest historic truth were not, first, last, and all the time, infinitely better than the prettiest of misleading historical falsehoods, it would be a pity—that the legend turns out to be void of truth. If it uses all the materials which we owe to Mr. Deane's research, we doubt if Mr. Adams's argument, which we epitomize elsewhere, can be so much as shaken. To us it seems conclusive of the whole question.

The second article, on "Languages and Dialects," is by Professor Whitney. There is always in the speech of the individual—of the artisan, for instance, the artist, the man of letters, the ignorant man—a tendency to vary from the common forms. Thus dialects are always in process of formation, and we may say that almost every man has a dialect of his own, as a Yorkshire man has his own dialect. In his home a man may talk baby-talk to his child, for his office he has a legal dialect, for his church a religious dialect. Ignorance and isolation are influences wider reaching. But, on the other hand, there is always the effect of the community—for each must be understood by his fellows—to check the tendency to divergence. The history of language—and, by the way, Professor Whitney holds that the linguistic science is not to be called a physical science—is a record of alternate and repeated divergence and convergence of dialects, the many becoming one, the one becoming many. M. Renan, therefore, and Professor Max Müller, are not wise to maintain that the natural tendency of language is from diversity to uniformity, that human speech began its history in almost infinite dialectic division, and that, therefore, the human race began its history not in the unity of one family, but in the diversity of many widely-scattered tribes. Seeing thus, they see but half. This view begins in the midst of the historic development of human language; it goes back only half far enough. There were tribes before there was a nation; true, but before tribes was the family. The article, of which the argument here but hinted at is the gist, is full of matter useful to the student and entertaining to the general reader, and it is one of a series which, no doubt, will yet appear in a volume.

"The Sources of the Nile" is by Professor Gilman, and briefly tells what late explorers have discovered, and also cursorily speaks of the earlier writers who make mention of the great river. Professor Evans treats of "The Office and Influence of Clothes." We are ignorant whether he is indebted to the German work which is his text for his sermon also. The paper is marked by a rather forced ingenuity, and will be found not especially amusing or instructive reading. Mr. Norton praises Mr. Stillé's "History of the Sanitary Commission," finding in it no fault except that the laudatory personal notices of leading members of the commission, appearing in a book published under their auspices, have the look of self-praise. As to the organization itself, he justly and proudly says that it was framed and administered in entire accordance with the principles of our national life, and "to the end of time the Sanitary Commission will stand in history as a worthy monument of the patriotism, the humanity, and the religion of a Christian democracy." The "Tyranny of the Majority" seeks to show that "if the majority in a popular government is disposed to tyrannize, there is no way of preventing it except by the use of force;" and further, "that a majority which has had the courage and ability to gain power without resort to violence, or by organized violence simply, is no more likely to tyrannize, and does not tyrannize any more, than any other body of men in whose hands the absolute sovereignty of a country is lodged." Mr. Thomas Hare's theory, as set forth in his well-known treatise, that the majority is a wicked creature which must be got to tie itself up tight, and then will be a good enough creature never to untie itself and behave according to its evil nature, furnishes the text for the article. "Governor Winthrop in New England" is a review of the second part of Mr. Robert C. Winthrop's memoir of his great ancestor.

As usual, the most taking article of the number, the one to which the reader may very likely turn first, though it is very certainly one to which he will not turn oftenest, is Mr. Parton's. Mr. Parton probably can write nothing for which the publishers of any American periodical in flourishing circumstances would not pay him, and would not be justified in paying him, almost any price he would ask. He writes nothing that is not extremely well adapted to please, both by its matter and style, the great mass of newspaper readers. The men whom vast numbers of their fellow-citizens have been voting for, whom everybody has been interested in, whose names are conferred upon Western towns and the offspring of legal voters; the topics with which editors have made the subscribers to their journals familiar—these are the themes in which he delights. He cannot be said to write good English, but his English is good enough; he is not to be called a thinker, but he never puts on paper a sentence which means nothing; his ideas are those which a lawful majority of the reading public possess, which they have always possessed, and their own ideas are presented to them in language such as some of them do use, and all, if they could, would choose to use. In short, the newspapers having first formed for him his audience, then supply him with a topic and a mode of treatment. The colloquialisms in phraseology, the slap-dash way of making his statements, his hasty and not infrequently very doubtfully correct generalizations, his want of careful accuracy—all of them very decided blemishes in the literary character of a writer who would please long—are, on the whole, advantages for a writer who has determined on pleasing many readers in a country like ours. The paper now before us is a historical study. Daniel Webster is the subject, and the general view which we get of him is that which nine intelligent men out of every ten in the North would have given if they had been asked for an opinion any time within the last six or seven years. There is really nothing new in it. But it is very readable for once. Looking at it a second time, one finds it a little tiresome, or discovers that he is ready to read another such discourse on Rufus Choate or Martin Van Buren or Old Bullion, but that he does not care to turn back to the one about Randolph or Webster. Yesterday's editorials were good enough to make us wish for to-day's, but we feel no inclination to go through them again. How much of this feeling is due to the nature of the subjects and how much to the writer's way of treating them, it might be not easy to say with exactness. But the choice of subjects is the author's choice, and, whatever advantage or disadvantage it may bring him, he is to hold himself responsible for that as much as for his style. But let us repeat—it is not necessary for us to tell the public so—that, blameworthy as they are in some particulars, and apt as they are to leave a feeling of unsatisfaction, Mr. Parton's studies of characters are exceedingly readable. We hear that they are to appear as a book. It is useless, we suppose, to hope that Mr. Parton will be less aggressive, less ready to strike a blow obiter at anything which does not please him, from systems of collegiate study to stained-glass in windows, but we may express a wish for a little more biography, pure and simple, when his studies are put into a volume. It is as biographies, after all, that they will be surest of a reasonably long lease of life, and in a biography exactness is a fine thing.

The ninth article, containing nearly a hundred pages of critical notices, is very good. The reviews of Ward's "Life of Percival," of Bancroft's "History of the United States," of Swinburne's "Laus Veneris," of Procter's "Memoir of Charles Lamb," of Walker's "Science of Wealth," and of Greeley's "American Conflict," are the best—the best of all being the one upon Mr. Ward's book, or upon the hero of it—but nearly all are excellent. Further mention of Percival as a poet ought not to be made; and if any one thinks too cruel justice was executed on him, let them reflect on the fact that his influence on the youthful mind was great enough in the year 1866 for him to find a biographer whom admiration called to the task. Altogether, this number is a good beginning of the year, and our aged quarterly grows more and more vigorous the older it grows, and surely now offers the reading public a very cheap six dollars' worth.

AN ENGLISHMAN ON SHERMAN'S TRACK.[*]

MR. KENNAWAY is an Oxford man and a practising barrister who spent a hundred and twenty-eight days of 1865 in making a hasty tour of the Southern States. His work is, upon the whole, an agreeable disappointment. It is not dull and conceited ; it is not offensively British ; it does quote from the President's Message, but it is not filled full with stupid discourses on the right of secession ; its praise of Southern gallantry is not pushed into absurd laudation of the South ; it makes no Freemantle obeisances to Southern chivalry and aristocracy ; it contains few remarks upon "democratic manners ;" it is generally uncommonly sensible, manly, and gentlemanly. It would not be true to say that the American reader will find much in it that is new, and will not find a good deal that is old. Unless he has learned to skip he will discover himself absorbing the regular amount of information about the wonderful growth of Chicago, the slowness of Southern railroad trains, the beauty of Spanish moss, the dreariness of Southern pine barrens, the recklessness of steamboat captains, and so on. And much of the volume is taken up with accounts of battles and campaigns, with the story of which we on this side of the water are quite familiar. What devastation and destitution he saw we also pretty well know by this time, and we know how Southern women feel towards the United States soldiers and people, for it is a tale that in the last three years has been often told. The book was, however, written not for us but for the English public, and in England it will be useful, for, as we think, its author has tried, and tried successfully, to be impartial as between the South and North, and between the North and England, and if he tells not very much about us, what he does tell is true. He is by no means what one would call an ardent admirer of this country, and evidently much prefers the form of government under which he was born and the social system established in England to American republicanism and equality ; but his beliefs do not run into prejudices, and, as we have said, we think him extremely fair, and it is difficult to find fault with him whether he is discussing President Johnson and his policy ; Mr. Seward, the Alabama, and the Fenian raid ; the treatment of prisoners of war in rebel and Federal military prisons, or the causes of the rebellion and the attitude of the English Government throughout the war. The negro, we observe, he occasionally styles "the nigger," and he permits himself to speak of Mr. Lincoln as "poor old Lincoln ;" but there is plenty of evidence in the book that he is no hater of the colored race, and Mr. Lincoln plainly has his hearty liking, if, perhaps, a little less of his respect—perhaps we ought rather to say his respectfulness—than Americans will be wholly content to see given. And as to the negro : on one point, at least, we must correct Mr. Kennaway, whom haste seems to have led into a statement not altogether true, or, at any rate, liable to be misconstrued. After saying that the most hopeful friends of the freedmen believe that, when he has enjoyed his freedom for a while, he will return willingly to hard work, the author goes on to say that "this view is not, however, borne out by the conduct of the negroes on the Sea Islands and at Port Royal ;" and in support of his assertion he cites the Southern correspondence of this journal, and quotes the language used by several gentlemen, and written down from their lips by THE NATION'S correspondent—language, some of which, indeed, would justify Mr. Kennaway's conclusion. But a not very careful reading of the letter from which he quotes would show that the complaints of the Port Royal planters were made rather against the system of government under which the islands then were than against the laborers. Nominally, while General Saxton was military governor, the negro on a landowner's plantation was a hired laborer—really he owned a small farm and could work for himself, or for his nominal employer, or for nobody, just as he liked ; and there was no ready way, almost no way, of making him vacate premises which he held not on conditions, but by order of a military governor. But it was said by one of the gentlemen whose complaints are given in the letter referred to, that "he felt convinced that a system of labor which should leave the employer and the negroes perfectly free, would show that the latter were careful, industrious, and profitable servants." The fault found with the Port Royal negroes was not so much that they would not work, but that they preferred working for themselves to working for an employer, and the fault found with the labor system then in vogue was, that it left the negro entirely his own master and almost entirely the master of his employer.

Some new things the American reader will find in this book. Of General Butler Mr. Kennaway speaks with respect, and he tells this story, which we suppose has not before been printed in this country :

> "The intensity, however, of that bitterness [against England] had, I fancy, been considerably modified at the time of our arrival in the country, and a calmer judgment had resumed its sway, as men who wished to be fair saw that there was much to say on our side of the question. 'I was right mad with you some time back,' said General Butler to us, or words to that effect, 'and swore a big oath that I would land before long a force of 40,000 men in Ireland ; but I am willing to admit now that there is not the same cause for complaint that I fancied, and I do not see how your Government could have acted much otherwise.'"

Nor had we ever before seen this story of Bishop and General Polk, which is further interesting as being one of the very few jokes recorded to Grant's credit :

> "They tell a pleasant story of some good-humored sparring that he had with Grant, on some occasion when they met on a matter connected with the exchange of prisoners, and when, business being over, according to the custom of the country they went in for a drink. Polk taking the lead, announced that he was about to give a toast in which both sides could equally join—'George Washington ;' to which, when the whole party was fairly committed, he added quietly, 'The first rebel,' raising thereby a hearty laugh at the expense of the Yankees. Grant was determined on having his revenge, and on the occasion of a subsequent meeting led the conversation to the subject of state rights, a question upon which Southerners were never tired of expatiating. He himself said but little, leaving them to infer that he had some difficulty in answering the arguments that they advanced, and they were soon ready to accept without hesitation the toast of 'Equal rights to all,' until the laugh was turned and the old score paid off when he added the rider, 'Black as well as white.'"

And to conclude this notice of a book which we have read with pleasure, and which we hope may, as the author wishes, do something to assist Englishmen and Americans to a better understanding of each other, we copy his account of the way in which Bishop Polk came to be a general :

> "On the breaking out of the war he, with the rest of the Southern bishops, gave in his adhesion to the de facto Government, to 'the powers that be ;' and at an early period sought an interview with Jefferson Davis, for the purpose of pointing out what, from his knowledge of the country, he conceived ought to be the strategy adopted in the Mississippi district. Then, going on to describe the very peculiar qualifications that were required for the command of such a post, he asked the President if he had any one in his mind to whom he thought it might safely be entrusted. Davis hesitated, then said pointedly, 'Bishop, you are the man : I know of no one but yourself.' Polk at once negatived the suggestion, notwithstanding all that could be urged on behalf of the claims of country, and the examples that, doubtless, were adduced of warlike prelates who had stood forth in the good old times as champions of the faith and of the right.
> "Before he left, however, he promised to ask the advice of Bishop Meade, of Virginia, with whom he had shortly afterwards a protracted interview. But little progress had been made in overcoming his scruples, when Meade proposed that they should consult General Lee, as he was a God-fearing man, and one whose opinion might with safety be acted upon. Polk consented, and the two bishops set out together. They had only gone a few yards when Lee himself met them, and of his own accord entered upon the subject, which he knew to have been under consideration, and stated it as his deliberate conviction that it was not inconsistent even with the holy vows of the episcopal office to take up arms when a man's country required it of him. On this Polk gave way, and, regarding this seemingly chance encounter as an indication of the will of Providence, he consented to forego his scruples, and to exchange the mitre and the crosier for the plumes and the staff of a field-officer."

Liffith Lank, or Lunacy. By C. H. Webb. Illustrations by Sol Eytinge, Jr. Quotations by various authors. (New York : Carleton. 1867.)—There is some good fun in this book, and the author of it finds very fair game in the inartistic management of the ending of Mr. Reade's "Griffith Gaunt." And of course it is possible to raise a laugh, for which there is ample justification, at Mr. Reade's typographical feats and other conscious eccentricities, and his free way of flinging Latin about. Also, the reader will find some most unblushing puns—beauties which are their own excuse for being, and have no relation to anything of Reade's. Here, for example, is one that we find in connection with a picture of the Southern Cross—five white stars on an oblong black patch in the middle of a page : "Dost recognize the constellation, gentle reader ? There are other Southern Crosses in our universe beside Mulattoes." The following specimens are equally bad. They are puns pure and simple. They do not come laying claim to respect because, though puns, they hint at a deep truth, or they convey a touch of humorous pathos, or they do some other fine thing. Toleration is all they ask, and they are content to be laughed at ; the maker of them throws himself on the charity of his friends and sheepishly awaits their sentence, as the true punster must : "One day she nagged and egged him so much, that he was determined to break the yolk. So he collared a poor devil of a priest, with whom his wife happened to be discussing the vicarious powers of the Pope, and shook and trampled him till there was seemingly no life left in him. Black and blue and livid, those who picked the poor priest up thought he was suffering from an attack of malignant collarer." Mr. Reade's very unpretty bragging in his Prurient Prude Letter gets many hits as well as the novel, and it will amuse the readers of letter and book to read also this gibing and jesting.

The Friend. An Independent Monthly. January, 1867. Vol. II., No. 1. (New York : 131 William Street.)—This publication, in abandoning the form of a newspaper for that of a magazine, loses also its originally distinctive character as an organ of the liberal wing of the Society of Friends. There is a gain in thus breaking away from sectarian ties, but an increased difficulty in competing with the larger and long-established magazines. In the number before us strong religious convictions are prominent, and probably occupy more space than it is intended to allow them hereafter ; they correspond pretty closely with that able and aggressive periodical, "The Radical." Better writing and a greater variety of articles may reasonably be looked for in subsequent numbers. There is no lack of earnestness, and that is a large part of any one's claim to a hearing.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE LESSON OF THE CRISIS.

The one thing which was evident throughout the war, whatever might be doubtful or indistinct, was the determination of the Northern people to preserve the Union. There was a great deal of discussion on almost every other point, but there never was any room for discussion on this. The one thing which is now plain is that the Northern people are determined that there shall no longer be any such thing as political inequality on American soil, that all men shall be equal before the law, and that no legal barrier shall stand between any man and any of the prizes of life. About the cause of this determination and about its wisdom and about the means used for carrying it out, there may be a good deal of difference of opinion; about its existence we believe there is none. There are people who say that the negro ought not to be the equal of the white man before the law, and there are others who say that if he is it will ruin the country; but there are none who deny that the majority are determined to have him so, and the greater the number of obstacles thrown in the way of the gratification of this desire, the fiercer it seems to burn. It would not be possible to point out a single act, either of the South or of the Democratic party at the North, committed since Lee's surrender with the view of hindering or delaying or discrediting the movement for equality, which has not had the effect of strengthening and accelerating it. The President came out of the war armed with almost absolute power, and in possession of enormous patronage, and at the head of a party which four years of bloody struggle had familiarized with executive usurpation. His defection, one would have said, would have scattered his party like sheep. It only made it fiercer and more compact. Some of its most gifted and influential members, who had borne the heat and burden of the day, followed his example, and were simply overwhelmed by execrations and defiance. The South has been emboldened by the countenance of the President and of the Northern Democrats into changing its attitude from that of a vanquished enemy into that of a power treating on equal terms, and has found, in spite of the largeness of the Northern minority, that there was even less to hope from resistance than from submission. The trade, the commerce, and the manufactures of the busiest community in the world are terribly embarrassed by the prolongation of the political disquietude, and yet no man dares to raise his voice in favor of the slightest lowering of the terms of settlement. In fact, hardly a month passes that something is not added to make them bitterer and less easy to swallow. The men who during the past year have been rising in influence are not the moderate but the extreme men, and the sentiments which are now most loudly cheered at public meetings are those which suggest the most desperate remedies. In short, after waiting a year and a half for the North to cool, it has only grown hotter and hotter.

Ought not "Conservatives" by this time to be satisfied that the measures they have been opposing are not the result of hasty, half-fledged impulses, but of a ripened judgment and determined will? If the events of the last eighteen months do not prove this, in the name of common sense what will prove it? We think that a man needs to be neither prophet nor sage to feel satisfied now that if the South and the Democracy persist much longer in their opposition to the policy of the Northern majority, we shall find ourselves thrust violently upon a stage of the struggle which will be distinctly and unmistakably revolutionary, and over which the nation will hardly pass without serious damage to some of the most valued and still most revered features of the Government. The signs of this are now so abundant that only a blind man can fail to perceive them, and we charge those who continue their senseless opposition to the popular will with responsibility of all the mischief, be it great or small, which may result from the resort of the majority to extra-legal courses. The South and the Democratic party are led by men who profess to be statesmen, and who talk and write as if they had read history, but they are acting like African "rain-makers." There is nothing of which they profess to be so well satisfied as of Radical unscrupulousness and disregard of constitutional obligations, and yet they act as if every Radical held constitutional obligations to be absolutely sacred. For instance, when they got the Executive on their side, they pawed and neighed fearfully, and shook the second article of the Constitution in everybody's face, as if the question was now settled. When they found that the Radicals were nothing daunted by this, and that they were disposed, if necessary, to get rid of Mr. Johnson by impeachment, these same Conservatives called the Supreme Court to their aid, and having got a decision against military commissions, they are twirling their thumbs complacently and assuring the world that it is all over, and that the Radicals must now submit—and all this in the same breath in which they preach upon Radical contempt for law.

Now, if there is any lesson which history teaches clearly, it is that there never has existed, and there never is likely to exist, a nation which will allow constitutions or forms of any kind on paper to stand between it and such a change in its policy as it deems necessary to its safety. That the popular safety is the highest law is not a mere saw of the publicists, it is a truth which every man in a free community has buried in his heart. There is nothing in which political sagacity is better displayed, whether in a statesman or in a party, than in the detection of the signs which indicate that the nation has reached the point at which it begins to consider whether it will blindly adhere to constitutional forms and perish or disregard them and live. The wise politician—whether in a monarchy, oligarchy, or democracy—is he who knows when resistance to the popular will has gone far enough, and, when the proper moment has come, turns his attention to finding out the best mode of carrying it out without violating the letter of the law. There are a thousand signs that we have reached this point here, and that people are fast, thanks to Mr. Johnson and the South, getting into a state of mind in which constitutional forms will count for very little. One of these, and not the least important, is the way in which the recent decision of the Supreme Court, as well as its dictum, has been received. The court is made the object of the most violent abuse, and the agreement of the judges on a point of law of unusual clearness is denounced unsparingly as a "judicial conspiracy," and movements are even talked of for putting the judges on their trial for it. All this is, of course, very wild and absurd talk; but there is behind it a sentiment which is neither wild nor absurd, and that is, that the question of reconstruction is a question too momentous, too wide in its range, and affecting too vitally the destiny of the nation, to allow of its being submitted to any court of law or decided upon any technical rules of interpretation. In other words, it is essentially a political question, and political questions nations and not courts must solve. No people in the world ever has—no people, it is safe to say, ever will agree to live in danger of its own dissolution as a political community, or permit the perpetuation in its government of principles which it deems immoral or unsound because nine judges think it ought to do so. It may be legally proper that it should, but it would be logically and morally absurd.

Now, political equality, the absence of all distinctions based on birth or color, having been determined upon as the basis of the National Government, and the fixity and sincerity of this determination having been thoroughly tested, the part of true statesmanship is to inaugurate the new régime under constitutional forms, and with as little departure from legality as possible. Equality may be made the basis of our political system in a perfectly legal way, and without doing any outward damage either to the independence of the States or the independence of the Supreme Court. What the South fears from the imposition of the new rule by Congress is the establishment of a precedent which might lead to the imposition hereafter of various other conditions by a victorious majority. But there is no political change that is not a choice of evils; no matter what we do, whether the amendment be accepted or rejected, whether impartial suffrage be established or not, the majority will still rule. The question is not whether it is to be allowed to rule—this has been decided—but whether it shall rule in good temper, under constitutional forms, and with its traditional respect for law still intact, or rule exasperated, after having been driven to extremes, and forced to fall back on its superior physical force for the defence of its policy. The plan of resistance to the majority which the South is now trying has been twice tried, and on much the same grounds—that is, that it was undertaken for the protection of "indefeasible rights"—once by the Stuarts and once by the Bourbons. In both cases the minority lost, part their heads and part their property, and the constitution was swept away altogether. Charles I. and his adherents, and Louis XVI. and his adherents, were determined to "save their honor," and "to hold firm at the outset;" "not to let in the narrow end of the wedge," "to show the world of what stuff 'gentlemen' were made;" "to save the rights of the monarchy," "to save the nation from a parcel of fanatics," just as the equally crazy "Conservatives" in this country now are—and the result was that the majority at last lost temper and made short work of them and their rights.

All these are things which most people as yet shrink from saying, although they are present to the minds of nine out of ten of the intelligent men of the community. The lookout is not a pleasant one. It is rendered every day darker and darker by such performances as the Democratic Convention at Hartford, and the steady and almost asinine stupidity with which the Southern legislatures go on manufacturing their cheap defiance. There is no more danger that these people will have their own way in the matter of reconstruction than there is that the United States will be annexed to Canada and pass again under the British crown; but there is danger that they may continue their opposition long enough to lead to the smashing up of some of the paper defences behind which they are now hiding their foolish heads.

THE NEW INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Any shred of incredulity regarding the hostile spirit of the Dakota Indians which may hitherto have clung to our countrymen must be swept away by the tidings of the late horrid massacre near Fort Philip Kearney. Whether or no there be a general complot among all the Territorial Indians, as alarmists assert, yet surely in that vicinage, at least, the red men have dug up the hatchet and struck out on the war-path. To judge from the tone of the public press, this revelation takes the country with thorough surprise; whereas the havoc in Colonel Carrington's command is only a bolder outcropping of the evil long felt by judicious observers to be nearing the surface. Our whole Indian policy is a system of mismanagement, and in many parts one of gigantic abuse. Yet, on all occasions of Indian raids and massacres, it has been a systematic aim in some quarters to lull the popular mind, to deny or to gloss the hostile rumors, and to represent that the relations between the much-revered "Great Father" and his docile and affectionate "red children" were elysian, or could be made so by extra appropriations for gin and blankets. Hence, for example, in the same day we got a Washington telegram stating that "the Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not credit the report of a massacre near Fort Philip Kearney," and a Fort Laramie telegram showing that the scalped and mutilated bodies of over eighty of the victims of that massacre had already been recovered and buried.

The Indians in our Territories number in all between 300,000 and 350,000 souls. No precise census of them has ever been made; for no man has had power, or leisure either, to "call from their woodland haunts the savage train and count them on the plain." But within these somewhat distant margins the total of those who retain a tribal organization is included. For this great class of our population we have no settled governmental policy, and our present Indian economy is a most pernicious makeshift. We have not even fixed in our minds, much less in theirs, what reciprocal plan of duty and protection can be or ought to be afforded. In a pending suit at law, it is made a question for adjudication whether hostile Indians are foreign enemies or domestic rebels. We do not justly discriminate between the tribes themselves; and our practice is usually first to massacre, by the wholesale, all the redskins we can get at—brave, squaw, and papoose—and next to patch up a peace by presents with all that are left.

Dismissing as apocryphal the story of "twelve tribes" coalescing for the winter's campaign, we must nevertheless credit a somewhat general rising among the Sioux and Cheyennes. Now, it is curious to observe that these two tribes have abundant cause for war—at least in the logic of the "untutored mind"—in our own dealings with them. The Cheyennes were the tribe among whom Colonel Chivington and his "gallant men" committed their deeds of hideous barbarity about two years ago. Chivington's command, according to the Committee on the Conduct of the War, murdered in cold blood a hundred unresisting Cheyennes of a friendly band, three-fourths of the butchered being women and children. "From the sucking babe to the old warrior, all overtaken were deliberately murdered," and that with accompanying acts of "revolting barbarity, such as, it is to be hoped, never before disgraced the acts of men claiming to be civilized." And in this hellish story the worst feature is that "the dastardly massacre, which would have disgraced the veriest savage," was "deliberately planned" in accordance with the almost incredible public sentiment of that region which applauded the shooting of Indians like wolves. It is the rough, relentless frontier spirit which trains the very infants of the log-cabin to "hate an Ingin like pisen," and which finds expression in countless such coins of current morality as "I do n't vally a redskin above a rattlesnake." If any one can read the record of our dealings with the Cheyennes, and then marvel at their present murderous marauding, he has poorly studied human nature. Nothing of this sort do we proffer, of course, in excuse for the Indian outrages, but in explanation, rather, of those outrages; we trace back from the harvest to the seed.

The other tribe, the Sioux, have a different history. Their nucleus is known as the Upper Sioux tribe of Dakota, found all along the valley of the Upper Missouri. This powerful tribe has been in open hostilities with us intermittently ever since the outbreak of the Southern rebellion. It would be a tedious story to recount all our warlike expeditions against these Sioux. Enough to say that our much-vaunted expeditions up the valley, undertaken at the cost of millions of dollars, have usually accomplished almost nothing. Throughout 1863 and 1864, especially, these expeditions were briskly conducted; but so excited were our people over the great rebellion, that they had no time or mind to sift the stories of "brilliant victories over the Sioux." But these brilliant victories were trifling and indecisive skirmishes, and the Indians were not then, and never have been, thoroughly whipped. If the Cheyennes—or rather the friendly bands of the Cheyennes—have been wronged by too harsh treatment, the Sioux have been injured by too feeble treatment. Both, therefore, as we said, have incitement sufficient to unite against us.

The random stories from the forts regarding the number of tribes now leagued for war are, of course, utterly untrustworthy. It is not probable that all the bands of any one tribe deliberately purpose hostilities; it is not probable that they contemplate a war à l'outrance. Of the Sioux of the Upper Missouri, however, there are about 15,000 souls. They were reinforced, some years ago, by their kindred, speaking the same dialect, the Sioux of the Mississippi, say about 5,000 strong. These latter were expelled from Minnesota after their wild riot of savagery in that State, whose memory even now makes the blood curdle. From that day to this, tempestuous and bloodthirsty spirits among the Sioux have been defiantly threatening our outposts; and, as we said, our boasted expeditions of two and three years ago did not quell them. The Sioux of the Plains, who inhabit the valleys of the Arkansas and Platte, number probably 5,600. The Cheyennes, who sojourn in the same region, number about 3,000. If we add the Arapahoes, denizens of the same locality, we obtain 3,000 more. As these figures represent total populations, the available warriors cannot be of alarming strength even were all conjoined.

But, in truth, so far from being the indication of a grand combination of Indians for a war of races, the late massacre among the 18th Infantry and 2d Cavalry is rather the sign of a new league for marauding. It is this bitter reflection which carries our minds from the immediate catastrophe to the larger question of our Indian policy. This consists, in a word, of the offer of a premium for robbery and murder. This effect it accomplishes in the following manner: In order to assist the Western march of civilization, and more especially to afford safe routes for travel across the continent, the Indians were induced to exchange certain tracts of desirable land occupied by them for annuities of money and merchandise. The payment of these annuities has attracted around the Indians a class of bipeds who may be fairly called Vultures of the Plains, who do for the Indian what "land-sharks" do for the sailor and sutlers for the soldier. With these "Indian traders," gamblers, and what not, are leagued the land speculators and usually the Government Indian agents themselves. All that the red man sees of the white disgusts him, and all that he feels of his influence debauches and ruins him. The only decent whites he sees, for the most part, are the soldiers who shoot him. The Indian, in a word, has been made by our system a drunken, lazy rascal, who has his semi-annual moments of profusion, when he is plundered and stripped and left more wretched than before. Unable to wait for his annuities to mature again, he takes to marauding and massacre. He robs as he has been robbed, and if any notions of justice or mercy could be left in his whiskey-steeped brain, they must be obliterated by his contact with the whites. If troops are sent against a band of Indians the latter draw off, giving their pursuers great trouble, and finally propose a peace, which is accepted, and sealed by another grand presentation of money and merchandise.

The result of such conduct is that the Indian, partly goaded by his wrongs, partly forced by his needs, partly coaxed by his opportunities, falls upon the unprotected emigrant or soldier wherever he can. And sometimes it is perfectly clear that, besides his immediate object of plunder, he has begun hostilities merely to make show enough for insisting on a formal treaty of peace, to be accompanied with more goods and greenbacks!

The primal remedy for our evils is in the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Department of the Interior to the War Office. The trouble has hitherto lain in a divisum imperium, the authority which dealt with the Indians during peace being entirely different from that which dealt with them during war. Moreover, the interests of these diverse authorities are not always the same; different motives and aims inspire them; they employ means which conflict; they are seldom harmonious in action, but are usually jealous and full of complaint. What is still more hurtful under the present system, neither the civilians nor the military authorities can be held to entire responsibility for the good conduct of the Indians, and each invariably ascribes any calamity directly or remotely to some prior action of the other. The recent urgent recommendation of General Grant, based on the report of General Sherman, to transfer the control of Indian affairs to the War Bureau, was made at least two years ago by General Pope, though it passed unheeded. It would not be so much a transfer as a return of authority, since the War Office held it until it was unhappily given to the Interior.

Suppose the troops on the Plains should be held solely responsible for the good behavior of the Indians, what could they do more than now? The answer is, The troops could corral the Indians; they could keep them away from the emigrant routes; could establish a healthful state of non-intercourse; could remove the temptation to plunder by forcing the Indians away from certain prescribed regions. In this way they would effectually police the "short route" to Montana and the Pacific. Such, in substance, we understand to be the meaning of General Sherman's plan. It is worth notice that the massacre which has formed the text of our present remarks occurred quite within the route or belt from which it is contemplated henceforth to exclude the Indians.

CONCERNING THINGS SPIRITUAL.

AFTER having been scoffed at, spit upon, and theoretically annihilated for the last hundred years, ghosts are again beginning to look up in the world. The newspapers teem with accounts of the marvellous doings of the uneasy inhabitants of the unseen world, and every private circle has its tale of wonder and horror which never finds its way to the press. The air is fairly heavy with the burden of restless spirits, who go wandering to and fro over the earth and walking up and down in it; at the dead of night their footfalls strike on wakeful ears all over the land, and to believing eyes they show themselves at times in visible forms. Vague reports of their appearance in some locality creep into the public prints, to be followed by innumerable items of circumstantial statement, and these again reinforced by bundles of affidavits. If we can credit what we read, the devil has lately visited one of the interior towns of Kentucky, breathing forth fire and showing the traditionary horns, tail, and cloven hoof. Mrs. Surratt still treads the chambers of the mansion in which she lived, clad in the robes of serge in which she died, and is reported to have actually lowered the rents of the neighboring houses—the only recorded instance of any agency, material or immaterial, which has hitherto succeeded in lowering the price of anything in Washington. For it is to be noticed that the ghosts who are now coming into fashion are not altogether like those whom they have succeeded, and who contented themselves with frightening children and servants. They are of a far higher character. They no longer haunt solitary hearths, sombre groves, solemn churchyards, and lonely houses; they seek now the companionship of man, frequent crowded streets, linger about the densest quarters of cities, and seem to have a praiseworthy taste for cultivated society. They have no longer need to be exorcised; with many they have now become a part of religion itself. If we go on, indeed, at the rate we have been going on for the past ten years, it is not an unreasonable anticipation that the time will come when every well-furnished mansion will no more be considered complete without its own private ghost than it is now without its bath-room or hot-air furnace.

But, seriously, among all the phenomena of the present century, there is hardly one more remarkable than the rapid growth of the belief in the possibility and existence of a constant intercourse between the material and immaterial worlds, and the fact that this belief does not prevail so much among the ignorant, but is confined rather to the educated classes. Under the name of spiritualism it has spread to an extent which would seem incredible were that sublimated mysticism anything more than a natural reaction from the intense materialism of an age which practically believes in nothing that cannot be seen or felt or demonstrated. And truly a faith which, if the claims of its adherents be correct, numbers its proselytes by millions; which can point among them to many men certainly highly cultivated and commonly esteemed clear-headed; which boasts of a literature of its own, already almost infinite in quantity, though infinitesimal in value; such a faith deserves consideration for what it has done, if not for what it is. At any rate, clear ideas should be held as to the nature of its claims and proofs. Yet about these there is the least knowledge, owing principally to the fact that the moment a man begins to believe in spiritualism, he does, it must be admitted, often begin at the same time to talk and write on that subject a kind of transcendental twaddle to an extent which furnishes new and uncomfortable conceptions of the immense abysses of absurdity in human nature which still lie unexplored. It is the aim of this article to give a general idea of these claims and proofs, translating only the vague and misty language in which they are ordinarily couched into the vernacular idiom.

Spiritualism, then, according to the claims of its adherents, is the natural successor of the Christian religion. The latter is represented as having been a good thing, and as having done a good work in its time. Like the Mosaic dispensation which it superseded, it came into the world at the period in which it was wanted, replaced the worn-out faiths then existing, and lifted man up to a higher plane of thought and action. But its day has now gone by; it has outlived its usefulness. Everywhere over the earth are prevalent vague feelings of unrest and dissatisfaction upon all matters appertaining to religion. This is seen more especially among the young and highly educated. They feel that they cannot be satisfied with believing what their fathers believed, or living the life their fathers lived. It was a state of mind precisely similar to that which prevailed in so marked a manner throughout the world at the time the Saviour came—this discontent with existing forms, this longing for something higher and purer. Spiritualism comes in to supply this want which men vaguely feel but cannot all express. In its turn it will be succeeded at some future period by a higher and purer religion still.

For the support of this claim spiritualism relies almost entirely upon a direct, constant, and intimate communication with disembodied spirits. It presents, in favor of such a communication, an array of evidence which, whether true or false, has been sufficiently striking to challenge the attention of the curious, sufficiently plausible to shake at times the doubts of the most incredulous, and sufficiently convincing to gain the assent of many men of education and capacity. Indeed, it is a singular fact that nearly all who have begun the practical investigation of the subject, no matter how sceptical they were at the outset, have ended in becoming ardent believers in the new faith and advocates of it. Many, perhaps all, of the marvellous stories told may be untrue; but, under the circumstances, it is hard to say that they are in themselves absurd. However this may be, the supernatural machinery for manufacturing miracles is limited in its workings in two most important particulars, of the latter one of which notice has rarely been taken. The mediums, or spirits asserted to act through the mediums, have never yet been able to foretell coming events, which, to be sure, may be no more within the power of a spirit in the other world than of a spirit in the flesh; but, further, so far as our observation extends, they have never been able to tell any particular person what he himself did not know already. The enquirer does not wonder at the fact; he wonders only how the medium became possessed of it. In cases where he is told what purports to be a fact, and, if such, is a fact which he did not know, the information is of such a kind that, by its very nature, he is unable to test its truth.

Spiritualism has hitherto generally been assailed by denying the miraculous nature of the facts upon which it bases its claim to be of divine origin; but the facts of Spiritualism are the very things out of a belief in which its adherents can never be reasoned. It would seem to be a more conclusive argument to admit them, but deny the conclusions drawn from them.

One point in connection with them, however, must not be overlooked. It is constantly assumed by Spiritualists, and often brought forward as an evidence of the divinity of their faith, along with its rapid progress, that the human mind naturally shrinks from a belief in the possibility of a communication between the visible and invisible worlds. Nothing can be further from the truth. The success of Spiritualism has been due not alone to its being a senseless reaction from the equally senseless materialism of the age, but, in part, to the fact that it makes so strong an appeal to a predisposition of the mind to believe in the seemingly impossible, simply and solely because it seems impossible. This tendency to credit everything unexplainable by the reason to supernatural agency, however dwarfed by education, or hid by fear of public opinion, is as universal as the race, and crops out, at times, in most surprising forms. Of all the paths, indeed, wherein we walk by faith, and not by sight, it is the one in which we are most prone to tread. For all those mysterious problems which, some time in life, come to each one of us, and the solution of which we grope after in vain, in the soul's own darkness, it furnishes the speediest and most satisfactory answer. Mankind are like Horace's bad poets, who persist in introducing a god, whether the difficulty be worthy of the appearance of one or not. And it is to be remembered that while there is nothing save the infrequency of direct supernatural agency to contradict such a belief there is much both in history and revelation to strengthen it. It is an illusion, if it be entirely an illusion, which the traditions of all nations have favored, and in which the wisest and greatest men of all ages have shared. It has formed the groundwork of the most striking portion of the legendary lore of modern Europe. There has been no time in which it has died out utterly; it is not until a comparatively late period that it has even died out in the minds of men of commanding ability. Every one knows that no longer ago than the preceding century Johnson went on a ghost-hunt to Cock-lane; and Addison, who lived in an age inclined to be sceptical in all matters spiritual, and himself noway given to credulity, in an essay ridiculing the vulgar horror of ghosts, took pains to add that he thought a person terrified with the imagination of spectres much more reasonable than one who, contrary to the reports of all historians, sacred and profane, ancient and modern, and to the traditions of all nations, thinks the appearance of spirits fabulous and the belief in it groundless.

But the admission of the miraculous nature of the facts of Spiritualism serves only to render clearer the inherent weakness of the system of belief they are brought forward to sustain. It may be granted, for the sake of the argument, that they are the work of supernatural agencies. The barriers between the material and the immaterial world are not so high and broad that they may not be overleaped. But if the wonders of Spiritualism are perfectly real, they are just as perfectly worthless. They prove nothing but the powerlessness of those who execute them, whether they be spirits or mortals. And they are worthless because the wonderful things upon which so much stress is laid are not in themselves wonderful. Their mediums cannot foretell the future; in that respect their manifestations have not even the value which is sometimes attached to dreams and presentiments. They cannot tell an enquirer what he does not know himself; and it is not worth while going to the unseen world for information which one has already, or which can be gained much more easily. They do, indeed, move chairs and tables, draw pictures and talk twaddle by the hour, as they claim, by direct spiritual agency. But it is nowhere asserted, nor can it be truly asserted, that the mediums move furniture half so well as day-laborers and porters; that they make drawings which are equal to those executed by hundreds of artists; or that they have as yet said or written anything worth reading or printing. It is the utter uselessness of what they do, their utter powerlessness to equal not the best but the mere ordinary efforts of ordinary men, that fill a rational mind with the most profound contempt for the new faith and its apostles. If what is done is done by the agency of spirits, what respect can a reasonable being have for spirits that work so much and accomplish so little, and that little of no account whatever?

It may be said, and it is sometimes said, in reply, that it is not for their usefulness that miracles are wrought; that it is a low view to judge them by any such test. They are wrought, it is asserted, to establish the proofs of a new faith; to demonstrate that its origin is supernatural; to awaken the attention of careless men and convince the minds of prejudiced men. It may be granted that these ends are had in view; still, the fact remains that God does not do wonders for the sake of doing wonders, but for some great beneficent purpose. The miracles recorded in the New Testament as having been performed by the founder of the Christian religion were not performed save when good to individual men was to be accomplished by their agency. Not for money, not for show, were those wonders wrought. Moreover, they were wonders such as man could not do. Christ healed the sick, gave sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf, made the lame to walk, brought the dead to life, and foretold what was to be. Upon these works he rested his claim to be of divine origin. But Spiritualists ask us to believe in the divinity of their faith because their mediums, by an inappreciable exertion of power, can lift a table a few inches from the ground, which, by a fuller exertion of power, any man can lift several feet. Christ proclaimed as fundamental truths doctrines then strange, novel, only dreamed of by speculative men if ever dreamed of at all, though now they are too common to excite surprise; but he proclaimed them in language so simple that he who runs may read. The great apostle to the Gentiles, in unfolding the highest mysteries of the faith he preached, traversed with matchless ease the uppermost air of speculation, and the wisest of men still reverently quote his words and adopt his conclusions. Now we are asked to accept for the simple but sublime statements of Christ, or the clear conceptions and exalted theories of Paul, the rhapsodies of diseased brains, in which no meaning can be found because none exists, and whose claim to be supernatural is that they are incomprehensible.

Still, mothers are losing their children by death; fond fathers unwillingly give up the only son of their name to the grave; each day how many die, some of whom are long and some of whom are always bitterly mourned by the survivors—mourned with "blind longing and passionate pain." And this being so, it is vain to look for a speedy ending to a belief that offers the living one more opportunity to speak with the beloved dead.

ENGLAND.—CHRISTMAS AT CAMBRIDGE.

CAMBRIDGE, December 27, 1866.

THE newspapers are all lamenting over the dearth of news; near five hundred men were killed in a colliery explosion the other day; but, as few of us work in collieries, that incident has quickly died out of memory. I therefore venture to send you a letter treating of a subject of a different character. I am here in one of the oldest colleges at Cambridge, keeping Christmas according to the rites of our ancestors, in a fashion which is almost extinct in England, and which, I presume, is unknown in America. I am tempted to think that a description of some of our customs may not be uninteresting to you. Railways and other shameless innovations have considerably affected even these hallowed retreats. It used to be customary for many fellows of colleges to pass their Christmas here; fellows having been, till the year 1859, necessarily bachelors. This restriction having been partly removed, and the facility of travelling having so greatly increased, most of them are now attracted to the bosoms of their families. This college forms a gallant and, I think, a solitary exception. We still stand upon the ancient ways, and keep up our festivities in defiance of cavillers and reformers. Our fellows are nearly all lawyers, and, at other times of the year, are for the most part in London. At each Christmas we gather with a small circle of such friends as we can tempt from family pleasures, and drink milk punch, eat boar's head, and play whist as our predecessors did before us. Some two hundred years ago, a former master of the college spent a thousand pounds in buying a piece of land. He left it to us with the condition that we were to erect to his memory a memorial, "not curious nor costly, but lasting," and to bury him beneath it in our chapel. The rents were then to go to provide waxlights for Divine service, to pay a small sum to every fellow or scholar who should attend a certain commemoration of which I will speak directly, and the balance, if any balance was left, was to be applied to "some small provision of supper" on the same day. Old Dr. Eden sleeps soundly, I hope, beneath a monument which is certainly not costly, but which has lasted fairly enough. We still provide waxlights;

and, once a year, on the 24th of December, we gather in the chapel to the number of about thirteen. There the will is read; a few prayers are put up, giving thanks for former benefactors (we can't quite pray for their souls); then a fellow reads a Latin oration in praise of the civil law; curious coincidences have been remarked in the expressions used in different years, lending some countenance to the theory that the oration is not always original; it grows, however, gradually shorter, neither Latin orations nor civil law retaining their ancient charms; after the oration comes a list of the benefactors. It begins with the bishop who founded us in the fourteenth century in order to provide lawyers for his diocese, the then existing generation having been killed off by a plague. I doubt whether modern bishops would look upon such a plague as a very heavy dispensation of Providence; however, our worthy founder doubtless found the college useful, for he stipulated that our fellows should always defend his causes "for a competent fee." When our statutes were altered a few years ago, some of the fellows made great difficulties about abandoning this regulation; but, strange to say, the present bishop did not seem to value highly his privilege of getting a lawyer by paying for him. The list of benefactors continues through five centuries, closing with a gentleman who lately gave some books for our library, and, still more nobly, sends us a fat swan for our feasts every Christmas. It is really a pity that we cannot pray for his soul. Service over, we do a certain quantity of business in regard to our landed property. The point of the will, however, which is observed with most scrupulous fidelity is that relating to supper. In fact, we spend, I suspect, a good deal more for that estimable purpose than the whole revenue of the estates. In former days men used to dine early, say at four o'clock, and, with the digestive faculties of the generation when two-bottle men were common, they were eager for supper before ten. They kept up a succession of dinners and suppers every alternate day for a fortnight. The dinner was of the solidest, and was washed down by no meaner liquids than sherry, madeira, and port; claret they despised; but a glass of strong beer might be interpolated somewhere about the cheese. Thus fortified, nature supported them till supper-time, when a light repast of oysters, boar's head, game-pie, with spiced ale and milk punch followed. Any ill effects were obviated by the sovereign remedy (as it was held) of a baked apple, eaten the last thing at night. And so these jolly old gentlemen went to bed, and, let us hope, to pleasant dreams and slumbers light. Time has brought changes, staunch conservatives as we are, but they may be summed up as follows: Dinner is now at six instead of four, the supper remaining at ten; claret has been added to the wine-list after a long constitutional struggle, and there are even hopes at some future day of champagne; and the dinners, instead of being spread over a fortnight, are compressed into a week. One old gentleman has stood fifty years of this heavy feasting, and bids fair to survive many more; but he is careful not to overwork his brains in the intervals. I think our founder should be as much gratified at this celebration as the shade of some ancient hero at the slaughter and consumption of hecatombs of sheep and oxen.

I fear I may have given you the impression that our hospitality is rather substantial than delicate; but, to say the truth, it is chiefly kept up as a show rather than as a reality. I do not mean to deny that some gallant diners still encounter the perils of old-fashioned supper supervening upon a modern dinner; they are the young or the strangers. Any who are at home consider that we are going through a time-honored ceremony, but one which has few other claims to honor. We play a quiet rubber or two at whist, for there is something eminently respectable and almost High-Church about whist at Christmas. There is supposed to be somewhere a strait-laced sect which thinks card-playing unbecoming to the clergy; but here the severest of parsons thinks that there is something incomplete about his Christmas unless he has won or lost a few shillings. Sometimes we venture upon an oyster or take a glass of milk-punch on principle, for that milk-punch has a traditional celebrity, the recipe having been presumably handed down through successive butlers through several centuries past. But boar's head and game-pie are things to look at, not to be touched. They harmonize well with the appearance of the rather low room with an antiquated marble mantelpiece, with dark oak panels, lighted by waxlights in silver sconces and adorned with the portraits of ancient worthies. Lord Chesterfield and Bishop Gardiner, of persecuting memory, are the only two likely to be known beyond the Atlantic, and they form a curiously contrasted pair. The sight is picturesque, but the atmosphere of such rooms is apt to grow muggy and suppery, and I prefer a quiet cigar and conversation in the rooms of a friend, for at this time the students' rooms are pretty well filled with old fellow-students coming back to revive their college associations; and, on the whole, heavy though the feasting may be, we have no bad time of it.

There are seventeen colleges in Cambridge, each of which is an independent corporation, keenly jealous in some respects of its rivals, though, as against the outside world, they are bound most strictly together. The most significant of our Christmas ceremonies is the passing of the grace-cup. It is handed backwards and forwards across the table, each man standing up to drink, and his next neighbor standing up (as is traditionally explained) to prevent any enemy taking advantage of the attitude and stabbing the drinker whilst his head is buried in the cup. In this venerable fashion we drink the solemn toast, "In piam memoriam fundatoris nostri." I offer you this picture of somewhat elephantine hospitalities not because a chronicle of milk-punch can be very interesting in itself, but because it illustrates certain peculiarities of English university life. The old custom, the ancient cup, and the sentiment expressed give the central idea of an English college. It has to the imagination of its members a kind of continuous personality, unbroken by the lapse of ages. They feel bound not only to each other, but to the dead who have gone before them. Our own roll of worthies is not a long one, but such as they are I cannot help regarding them with a certain affection. I can pardon Gardiner for burning a heretic or two, and I think less severely of Chesterfield's morality, when I remember that, after all, they were Trinity Hall men. It is not, I am aware, a plea of much weight to the philosophical historian, but, as a mere question of sentiment, it is agreeable, and has its elevating influence; it helps at any rate to strengthen the bond—one of the pleasantest that we can form in life—of fellow-studentship. To have been at a brand new "academy" together is something, but it is much more to be a fellow-sharer in so many memories and associations stretching back into the dimness of the past. I need not enlarge upon this text, for it is my experience that strangers are apt, if anything, to regard such sentiments with more indulgence than they deserve. We often admire a picturesque old building, such as are some of our colleges, where fragments from many centuries have been gradually mellowed by the lapse of time into a harmonious whole, a great deal more when we see it from outside than when practical experience has taught us its many inconveniences. And so it is with this strong college spirit. The power with which the colleges affect the imaginations of their members is pleasant, but prejudicial in many ways. Thus, it is very difficult to legislate for the university systematically without interfering with some vested interests. To take one example: Every one would admit that the great revenues of the colleges would be better applied if a larger part of them were devoted (say) to the encouragement of natural philosophy. But each college insists on applying its own revenues as it chooses, without being accountable to any one; no college chooses to give much encouragement to natural science, for the very reason that, as it is neglected at present, the college which encouraged it would be filled by the less eminent men. Each of the seventeen colleges wishes to attract the students who distinguish themselves most in the most popular studies—that is, at present, in classics and mathematics; so that, for want of any central power, a foolish competition takes the place of what might be a most useful co-operation. These things will come in time. Meanwhile, the university is like an ancient and clumsily constructed piece of machinery, in some respects, although I should do it great injustice if I did not add that I believe it has never been fuller of vigor nor in a better way towards reform.

LETTER FROM CRETE.

CANEA, CRETE, Dec. 1, 1866.

AT last we begin to have from the outer world faint echoes of the sounds of the Cretan insurrection. After two months' heroic and triumphant resistance of half-armed and wholly unorganized men against the trained troops of a whole empire; after battles that have been without parallel since Bunker Hill, Lexington, and old Fort Ti, and in some respects even more unique than those; after feats of arms which ought to be immortal (and will be if the Cretans win), the men who govern and enlighten Europe begin to be aware that the revolution means something, to suspect that men may be goaded by bad government and long endurance of wrong to revolt in the very face of destiny, and European statesmen begin to enquire what can be done to extinguish this fire which begins to threaten the overthrow of all their Oriental arrangements, and to light anew the fires of liberty in the elder world.

It is not Crete alone that is in question, though Cretans alone bear the brunt of battle. She is to the new revolution what Massachusetts was to the old one. If she can endure the armed shock until the other Greek states can prepare, the doom of the empire of Omar is come. The Sultan has poured all his disposable legions in here, and a fleet of war steamers coast continually the circuit of the island. Two months ago they began by a battle which the governor could watch with a glass from his palace, and to-day they are only fifteen miles beyond the first battle-field, where he has now been ten days, not daring to attack the insurgents.

I don't think any two months since Xerxes played out his rôle have seen so much heroism of the true old type. At Vryses less than 3,000 Cretans, without artillery, without bayonets, and with guns that their grandfathers owned, attacked in their camps 4,000 Egyptian troops, shut them in, fought 2,000 more who tried to force their way in, and after four days, when the troops asked for terms, about a thousand men came out, leaving everything they could not carry behind them At Keramia, the Cretans attacked the troops advancing, and, fighting back Parthian fashion, finally repulsed them, 11,000 strong, though at no moment were more than 3,000 Cretans engaged. At Candanos they defeated the troops and drove them into the town, where they blockaded them, and it required a force of 16,000 troops to raise the siege, and even then the Cretans pursued them, as the Americans did the British after Concord, to within sight of Canéa. At Sourba, 500 Cretans defended the village against the assaults of the troops, who numbered in all 21,000, and at the end of two days' resistance, the 500 having increased to 1,200, pursued the Mussulmans out of the valley. And, not to go through the whole series of battles small and great, at Vafé, the only decided victory the troops have so far won, 600 Cretans resisted the whole army, 14,000, and, finally coming hand to hand, retreated, but not before having put hors du combat at least their own number, and some accounts say 800 men. A small body of them assaulted the governor's camp, cutting their way to his tent, where they did not however find him. They lost many killed and prisoners, 30 of the latter being brought in, the only ones the troops have taken so far, except three of the Greek officers taken at Vafé for the sake of information. The troops don't seem to fancy taking prisoners, and the Cretans don't fancy being taken.

The affair of Sourba seems to me one of the most brilliant things in history. The wounded of the previous battles were collected there, and when the attack began only 500 Cretans could be collected, the others being distributed all over the island to defend the passages from surprise. The army made four distinct assaults, and the roar of their artillery, plainly heard from my house, was incessant for two days, and they could be distinguished as coming over the ridges nearer and nearer to Canéa, as the Turks fought a retreating fight, pursued by the Cretans.

The individual dash and pluck seems to be almost at the maximum; but the fight once over, the Cretans disperse, and perhaps when the troops return to the attack the pass so obstinately defended is deserted and the next is defended. The élan in attack is equally remarkable, and they will charge for miles in a helter-skelter way, which suits the character of the country, running from cover to cover with great rapidity and firing at close quarters with deadly effect, though they have no rifles or even good smoothbores, and their arms would figure in a museum. Within a few weeks they have received rifles and a few pieces of artillery, and I hear that they are throwing up works against the city of Retimo.

The Ottoman troops seem to have become so much demoralized by these energetic attacks and the sharpshooting that, a retreat once commenced, they never make a decided stand again until they get behind the walls of one of the fortresses or in the open plains, where their artillery and horsemen can act; and to-day, so far as we have heard, there is only outside of the walled towns the main movable force of about 16,000 men, all concentrated for the attack of the famous passes of Askyfo. There this same Mustapha Pasha who now commands suffered one of the most disastrous defeats in the whole Greek revolution of '21-'30. It is not believed he will venture the attack now, but, if he finds the Cretans resolute, will turn eastward and measure his strength with Coroneos, the general-in-chief, who has under him most of the Greek volunteers, and occupies the country around Mount Ida.

But heroic, and brilliant even, as has been the defence of the mountain lands, the Cretans have had sufferings to endure compared to which Valley Forge was but camping out for exercise. Shut in the narrow valleys of their rugged mountains, where they were driven by the inevitable massacre that awaited every Christian, man, woman, or child, that fell into the hands of the troops, the families have endured things incredible to those who only know what war is in civilized countries, and the men, who would have disregarded personal hardship, are half disarmed by seeing their wives and children driven, starving, into the snows of Asprovouna and dying by hundreds under the hostility of the heavens. Between butchery on one side and death from cold and hunger on the other, they, like David, have chosen the hand of God to be their discipline. Yet even in the mountains they were not always safe; all could not reach Sphakia, but, hiding in caves and in the gorges of the nearer hills, have been hunted out by the Cretan Mussulmans and butchered in cold blood, or smothered by smoke à la Pelissier. On one threshing-floor of the village of Kaysonos they say that one hundred and twenty dead bodies of children, decapitated, lie in a heap; in one cave of Kephala over two hundred men, women, and children were smothered by fire and smoke, beside many smaller parties, who found their deaths by the same means, scattered all over the island. Credible reports state that thousands of women and children have perished between the knife, the elements, and the want of food. A Greek officer in command at Askyfo wrote his wife a month ago that for eight days he had only eaten carobs.

Yet all this does not bend them. To every overture of the Mussulman authorities they only reply, We will fight while any remain. Their villages are all destroyed, their crops all lost, nothing remains but their bodies, and those they will fight for, was the answer they returned to the summons to lay their arms down and accept the mercy of the Sultan. When, a few days ago, the pasha summoned the Cretans in Askyfo to surrender, and promised them an amnesty if they delivered up their arms and the cannon the volunteers had brought, they replied that the cannon belonged to the strangers, and as for their own arms, if he wanted them he must come there and take them.

He has, so far, taken very few. His formidable army is met in all the difficult passes by a few hundred Christians (they have never had more than 3,000 in the fight at once), and in almost all cases repulsed. Making slow way by flank movements when they can be made, and changing the direction of his march when they cannot, as now, we find that, despairing of entering Sphakia by force of arms, he has moved off towards Retimo, where Coroneos is carrying all before him. It is a pity such a heroic struggle should only end in defeat by exhaustion—as it will, if Europe should not intervene—but exhaustion, I fear, of all the best blood of the island.

You will admit, I think, that it is a noble race, worthy of liberty; but, as my letter is an ethnological rather than a political one, I do not enter into the question of political rights or wrongs, and only say that the last chance of studying personally the old Greek stock from living models and examples will soon be lost if this war goes on. These men are, to my mind, the legitimate successors of Leonidas and Epaminondas, Agesilaus and Themistocles; what wonder would it be if we found some of their vices as well as their virtues?

I must defer to another letter some of the curious facts developed by a comparison of the Mussulman and Christian Cretan, of the same blood and, until a few generations, of the same education—comparisons which will show wherein Mohammedanism fails to comply with even the requirements of this simple and antique civilization. SOMETHING ABOUT NEW BUILDINGS IN NEW YORK.

I.

One of the most noticeable of the new buildings in this city is the large white marble-faced structure which, as the public generally know by this time, is intended to enshrine the New York Herald establishment. This building stands in so very conspicuous a position, on that celebrated corner lot from off which Barnum's Museum was burned a year and a half ago, that passers are compelled to look at it. As one walks down-town-ward along the western sidewalk of Broadway, and enjoys the cheerfulness and daylight effect of the wide open space called, by way of a joke, the Park, the big white Herald building begins Broadway again, shuts in the street to its inadequate eighty feet, and will be looked at. So all the walkers look at it, and all the walkers in couples and at leisure talk about it and discuss it. There is a sort of free school of architectural criticism always being carried on, where he who listens may have his choice of tastes and theories. Just now it is the fashion to admire French roofs; this one is an extra large French roof, and is duly admired. Just now it is the fashion to admire large windows, and things colossal in scale, generally; for which reason Messrs. Ball & Black's store, at the corner of Broadway and Prince Street, is a great favorite, with its windows that seem only moderately large, until one goes near and finds them nine feet wide. But the Herald's new windows are rather small compared with the mass of the building, and this offends some of the talkers, and is approved by none. A few of the peripatetic critics look sharply enough to distinguish the numerous groups of J. G. B. over the windows, and these wonder why the G should be so much the largest of the three, and further they say nothing. Then, from afar off, half-way up to Chambers Street, it is perceptible that a row of street cars have been raised to the roof, and are doing duty there as skylights of portentous dimensions; these meet the popular approval, as suggestive of a well-lighted composing-room at the top of the house. So that if it be any gratification to those concerned to fill the mouths of the passers-by, they have that gratification, and to a much greater extent than is usually granted to the builder of buildings in America.

There is one respect in which this new building is really "an ornament to the city;" in this, that from further up Broadway—from about the corner of Duane Street—the green trees of the Park swell out beautifully between white walls, above and below. The trees peeped out from behind Stewart's store prettily of old, but the hideous Museum building closed the picture. Now we have a finer combination, or, at least, we had it last fall before the huge French roof was put on, and possibly even that has not spoiled it.

The first story, on the level of the sidewalk, is of iron, and painted white, of that peculiarly offensive sort of cast-iron work that imitates without at all resembling marble construction. This, in contrast with the marble, looks as cheap as its worst enemies could wish. The coarse, untransparent, dirty-yellowish white of the painted iron is bad enough when it is alone, without the contrast of the crystalline translucency of marble, as it is in the great store at the corner of Tenth Street. But the iron lower story of a marble building is ugly enough to shock, one would think, even New Yorkers' taste. In the case before us, as is usual, there seems to have been no sufficient reason for making it of iron at all; there was certainly none for giving it the ridiculous pasteboard look which is achieved by boxing out the thin iron into a wretched similitude of rusticated blocks of marble.

From this to the cornice on the two longer sides the building is calm and grave and reserved in general effect, beyond most of our buildings. The moderate-sized windows are good, and their squareness is good, and when one is far enough away not to see the detail that surrounds and caps them, the rows of quadrangular holes cut squarely into the thick wall, and following each other around the obtuse angles of the corner, tend to make the building solid and simple in effect. On this account, the triple window over the main door and the three-centred arch heads of the other windows on that front are to be regretted. They mar the unity of the façade while adding no variety, deny its general character of quietness and horizontalness, and make the principal face the poorest and meanest. There are barbarisms in all parts of the marble work, but, on the whole, there is a sort of virtue in the general design not very common in our restless and "loud" Broadway buildings. The cornice, impure in detail as all the rest of the outside, is about the right size for it, has about enough parapet for it, and is not very showy. So that the marble work ends decently enough; before the roof was put on, one looking from a distance might think the building before him an unusually inoffensive and temperate building for New York.

Above the parapet rise the dormers, huge, sprawling, and shapeless. They dwarf the whole exterior. What are the windows below but pigeon-holes, and the high massive walls more than a screen, if these great receiving-tomb-looking edifices are the right size for garret windows? The largest dormer, that over the entrance, is the worst one we know of—really a monster. Above these dormers is a second row of windows, circular, surmounted by frames like mirror frames prepared for gilding, and hooded with semicircular caps which make the windows seem higher than wide. The detail of dormers and mirror frames is of the coarsest and clumsiest character, true to the traditions of cast-iron. These are painted white, contrasting forcibly with the dark roof. Painted white, also, are wide bands marking each hip of the roof, so broad and glaring as to reduce all the marble pilasters below to absolute nothingness. The shape of the ground-plan, not otherwise unfortunate, gives cause for six of these, four of them rising from the prominent angles of the building and leaning toward each other, destroying all the quietness it might have had, and seeming even to shake its stability.

As for these modern cast-iron adornments, there seems to be a contest between rival establishments which shall produce the most novel and unexpected tours-de-force. There are continually new and more remarkable designs hoisted into place, making the beholder wish that there were no fusible carbonate of iron, that metal were to be worked only on the anvil. So far as we know, cast-iron has never been rightly used in our supposed ornamental building; only in the most purely utilitarian structures are its good qualities rightly employed. There are buildings wholly of iron which, at another time, will be themes of discussion.

The difficulty that inheres in the criticism of such buildings as the one before us is this: It is not architecture at all that we are considering. It is wholly a misuse of the art of architecture to suppose or allow that there is anything in common between it and such buildings as this. Because large and costly, they attract the notice that in other and happier times was given to what was architecture indeed. Because attracting such notice, they demand criticism which ought not to be wasted upon them, which ought not to notice at all as works of fine art things that have no part nor lot with fine art.

We have found a few relative merits—better say relatively slight faults—in the building we have been considering, and a few accidental merits, so to speak. Let us mention another accidental merit, but a very enjoyable one the great south wall, one unbroken and perfectly smooth sea of dull red brick, mottled as walls of common hard brick always are, glowing warm in the sunlight or shadowed by passing clouds like the slope of a mountain. When the proposed building for the Park Bank shall shut out from view this noble wall, unless it shall be the best building on Broadway, it will be less fair than what it conceals.

THE NEW JERSEY RAILROAD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Dear Sir: I have just read the article in The Nation of Thursday, 3d inst., upon the Dwight railroad accident. I hope you will make no concessions to the New Jersey monopoly or its conductor. Both public morality and safety require that the facts, and especially the habits and customs of that arrogant concern, should be thoroughly sifted and ventilated. The result to you cannot be doubtful if properly contested with first-class legal talent on your side, bold enough to be independent of the great monopolists, and fighting your side with zeal.

For the past twenty years or more I have used the New Jersey Railroad once or twice a year, and, until Congress has been lately investigating the doings of the company, I never once passed over the road without being made to feel that its managers treated the public simply as a milch cow—with no rights which a white man was bound to respect.

Reading your account of the sad tragedy lately occurring there, I feel that neither it nor the treatment of the lady sufferer were accidents, but rather the natural results of the monopolist spirit which has long ruled there. An experienced eye can always read the spirit of a company in the behavior of its employees—from the ticket-seller down to the brakeman, baggage-master, and switch-tender.

I think a reprint of your article under review sent to each member of Congress would have an excellent effect upon the action of that body. The free use of the company's money (so freely drawn from the people) in lobbying, printing, and other modes of influence, together with the differences of opinion as to State rights, make it very difficult for Congress to resist the taxation which this company and its pliant servant the State of New Jersey, exact from the rest of the country; but right will prevail in time.

Yours truly, —— ——.

To the Editor of The Nation:

I again read in this week's issue your article respecting the Dwight accident on the New Jersey Railroad, and your remarks respecting Mr. Rostine Parker, his claim for $10,000 damages for libel, etc., etc. It is to be desired that this suit against you may be and will be determinedly pushed forward with vigor, in order that a prominent opportunity may be given to the public to hear a dissection of the manner in which passengers are cared for on the rail, particularly by the New Jersey Railroad. As to the finale, you need entertain no fears; any of the daily riders over the road can honestly sustain your position and remarks, and it is high time railroad monopolies were given to know that the public and the press are their masters. With this I hand you an article from the Newark Daily Advertiser of January 3, 1867, which may be one straw more for the wind to blow at.

Yours, Justice.

The Week.

MR. BOUTWELL on Tuesday introduced and carried to a third reading a bill excluding from practice as lawyers before the Federal courts all persons guilty of having aided or abetted the rebels, an enactment which the Supreme Court has already pronounced unconstitutional, as being in the nature of a bill of pains and penalties. The bill is in effect an assertion on the part of Congress of its determination to have its way as against the court, and is therefore highly important and worthy of careful and calm discussion. But Mr. Boutwell refused to allow it to be debated, and is, as we write, forcing it through under the previous question, without allowing the minority to express their opinion upon it, and sooner than yield his point, has kept the House up all night voting on dilatory motions. This may be legislation, but it is not the legislation of a deliberative assembly.

THIS has been, on the whole, a great week for Billingsgate. Mr. Stevens displayed his almost unrivalled powers in an attack on Mr. Seward, which will certainly keep Parson Brownlow and George D. Prentice awake for the next month. We do not admire Mr. Seward, and have said our say about his course since 1860; but he is a man who for nearly forty years used great powers for the promotion of noble ends, and was an anti-slavery man when anti-slavery men were scarce, and who has consequently, in his day and generation, done honor to his country. The spectacle of another old man, therefore, bespattering him in Congress with abuse such as may any day be heard in any Democratic bar-room in this city is not edifying.

THE Judiciary Committee is said not to be making much if any progress with the impeachment investigation, and it now seems probable that the preliminary investigation, as well as the proceeding itself, will be bequeathed to the next Congress. According to Mr. Sumner, the whole North is eager for the impeachment; but if we may judge from the press, very few people are eager for it. The Washington correspondent of the Springfield Republican, who is generally both sensible and accurate, estimates the chance of impeachment as one in a hundred, and the chance of conviction as one in a thousand, which we think is probably a fair estimate of the extent of Mr. Johnson's risk. We may add that we doubt if Mr. Sumner is helping any cause by delivering such tirades of abuse as he poured on Mr. Johnson last week. All he says is, perhaps, true; but then, Mr. Johnson is not improved nor the country enlightened by saying it, and Mr. Sumner's reputation is certainly not increased. What is called a "scathing denunciation" is a kind of performance to which almost any intellect is equal; and certainly Mr. Sumner might have found a thousand better ways of using his great powers than "exposing" Andrew Johnson. Mr. Johnson has put himself beyond the reach of the moral censure of wise and good and even decent men. Anybody who "swung round the circle" as he did last summer may fairly bid defiance to criticism.

NEBRASKA and Colorado are admitted into the Union as States if the bills for their admission are not vetoed, or, which is very doubtful indeed, are passed over the veto that is pretty sure to come. They are not to come in, however, until the Territorial legislatures have accepted a condition precedent which binds, or which is supposed to bind, or which some persons pretend to believe will bind, the new States never to make between their citizens any political distinctions based on color. An honest imposition of this requirement the necessary majority in the House and Senate could not be brought to make; but they have succeeded in seeming to insist severely on impartial suffrage. Two years from to-day a Colorado or Nebraska convention does what it likes in the matter. But the Radical strength in the next Congress will be increased by the coming in of the new members, and the accession may be useful should it be decided to offer an impartial suffrage amendment to the Constitution—the only way in which the friends of impartial suffrage will make quite sure of it.

MR. W. E. DODGE, of New York, spoke strongly in the House, on Monday, against the impeachment, which he deprecated as "not only unfortunate in a political point of view, but vastly more unfortunate in paralyzing the industrial and business interests of the country." He mentioned, in illustration, a charitable institution in New York which had agreed to invest its surplus capital in United States securities, but, on account of the impeachment proposition, changed its decision and put the money in a trust company. Nobody is better qualified to speak on this point than Mr. Dodge, and we hope the Ashleys, Loans, and other wise men will heed what he says.

MR. MORRILL's bill, obliging the Secretary of the Treasury to give six days' notice of his intention to sell gold, and to dispose of it to persons bidding for it in sealed proposals addressed to the Assistant Treasurer, and to be opened by him in public, has passed the House. The bill deprives the Secretary of a power which we believe was not abused, but which might be, and which, whether or no, no man ought to have.

MR. COWAN has been nominated as Minister to Austria in place of Mr. Motley, who, Mr. Johnson says, resigned, but who, Mr. Sumner says, has been removed expressly to make way for Mr. Cowan. Mr. Sumner has therefore very properly called on the President for the correspondence in the case, and should it prove that a man like Motley has been turned out of the public service to make way for a man like Cowan, we trust the Senate will do its duty and see that the arrangement is never carried out. The Pennsylvania Legislature is highly indignant at Mr. Cowan's appointment, on the ground that after they have pronounced him unfit to be senator, it is an insult to the State to make him a national representative abroad. We should share in this view if senators were never turned out except for bad behavior, but, unfortunately, they are so often dismissed simply for the purpose of giving some one else "a chance" that dismissal does not necessarily carry with it a moral or political stigma. Mr. Cowan has lately laid down his own views on the subject of tenure of office, in which he promulgated the doctrine of rotation in office in the very form in which every trickster, intriguer, vagabond, knave, and adventurer loves and upholds it. We trust, therefore, he will get no place of honor or profit, and that the Senate will make a firm stand on his case. Mr. Lincoln put into office the best set of foreign ministers we have had in many a day, and all our representatives at first-class courts for the last six years have been men who were in every sense of the word an honor to the country. We might perhaps make an exception in the case of Cassius Clay, but though "a child of nature and a child of freedom, and having his bright home in the setting sun," he is an honest and an honorable man, who, whatever discredit he might bring on the national rhetoric, would never bring any on our national character. They are now being removed one by one to make room for the broken-down adherents of "the policy," and if anything can be done to stop the process, stopped it should be. That "bright illuminating jewel" of New Jersey, Mr. Rogers, will probably be nominated for some mission before long.

A STORY has been set afloat in the newspapers that, being full of gratitude on account of the Supreme Court decisions, Mr. Johnson intends to displace Mr. Adams, American minister in England, to make room for Mr. Dudley Field, whose brother is one of the justices of the Supreme Court. The story is destitute of truth, unjust to three of the four persons mentioned in it, and palpably an invention of some mind transported beyond the bounds of honesty and decency by the late decisions. A report much vaguer in its charges, to which currency has, however, been given by the respectable authority of the Boston Advertiser's Washington correspondent, is to the effect that the very well known Jeremiah Black, often irreverently styled "Jerry Black" and "Buchanan's man Jerry," the constitutional adviser of President Buchanan, who, as Attorney-General, informed that public functionary that the United States could not legally coerce a State to obey the Constitution, is the fountain whence Mr. Justice Davis draws his legal and political opinions. This is said to be the common belief among radical Republicans in Washington. It would, no doubt, be tolerably hard to prove it true; but, at any rate, the fulsome laudation of Justice Davis delivered at a late "banquet" by Mr. Black, who is a practising attorney at the bar of Judge Davis's court, was in sufficiently bad taste, and has helped to get credence for a report which Mr. Black may like to have credited, but in which Judge Davis probably takes not much delight. It is getting to be more and more the practice to punish men of prominence who may happen to differ from the majority by inventing a little story showing them to be animated by the vilest motives. Thus, Mr. Beecher wrote the Cleveland letter, we were told, to get his son reinstated in the army after having been dismissed for drunkenness, and, if we remember rightly, for swindling. The slander is usually manufactured by some of the "lively writers" who act as chiffonniers for the press, and then solemn and sedate politicians take it up, pass it about, and draw long, lugubrious faces over it as if the spectacle of human depravity was getting to be too much for them.

THE New York World, in its best style—which, like its worst style, is not easily equalled—has recently shown the extreme foolishness of one or two projects for lessening the power and authority of the Supreme Court which have been broached by the Chicago Tribune. One of the two, we see, has been put into shape, and on Monday was offered in the House as a bill. It ordains that whenever the Supreme Court is called upon for a decision in regard to the constitutionality of any law of Congress or of a State, the hearing shall be before a full bench, and the decision, to be binding, shall be made without a single dissenting voice. This is a shade worse than the Western journal's plan, which only provided that the voices of three-fourths or two-thirds of the judges should be required to set aside a statute. But even then, as the World points out, in every case tried some one man, plaintiff or defendant, would have to submit his cause to a tribunal in which the chances against him would be as three to one or as two to one. The Supreme Court is not a Council of Revision. It is only in suits between citizens or States that the constitutionality of a law comes before it, and this the Chicago Tribune seems to forget. It is true that in jury trials one of two men must convince the twelve jurors that he is in the right, and one dissenting juror can prevent his winning his cause; but in such cases new trials and appeals are always easily possible. A Supreme Court decision is for all practical purposes final. We have not space to examine that journal's theory in regard to the appellate jurisdiction of the court. It is as carefully prepared as the other, and as entirely mistaken, reminding one of certain philosophic theories which Longfellow's American traveller found abroad in the natural home of lager and smoke. They were ingenious, elaborate, beautiful; they seemed like wide roads which must conduct the traveller somewhere; but they had a way of getting into waste places and contracting, and finally, like squirrel tracks, they led up a tree and stopped.

THE insolent indifference of our great common carriers to anything but the making of money has, during this stormy week, had the completest possible illustration. Hundreds and thousands of passengers between New York and the opposite shores of the North and East Rivers have had the satisfaction of waiting two and three hours in ferry-houses, and even two and three hours aboard boats stuck fast in the ice, unable to cross, while tug-boats were moving about apparently with perfect ease. Some one of the many men who have lost valuable time by the gross and impudent neglect of these corporations ought to prosecute them in the courts. Nothing would be easier than for such a prosecutor to have a purse made up for him out of which to defray the legal expenses attendant on doing a great public service. Then, too, we have had the squabble between the directors of the Central Railroad and those of the Hudson River line, which has been settled we neither know nor care how, but which in its progress brought on the travelling public an amount of inconvenience which has found expression at Albany. "Travellers," we are told, "were compelled to walk across the ice at East Albany and take charge of their own baggage; the local trains to Troy ceased running; the new bridge might as well not have been built." The bill introduced into the State Legislature is not all that is wanted; but that and the comments of the press and the anger of the sufferers prove progress, and are a promise of better things to come. By-and-by the community will fully believe, and make these tyrants believe, that a franchise granted by the people the people can take away when it is shamefully misused.

NATHANIEL PARKER WILLIS died on the evening of his sixtieth birthday—January 20, 1867. For many years sickness, almost constant, and his editorial work for the Home Journal, had withdrawn him from all literary labors of a kind more pretentious than trifles for that paper or more likely to be of permanent value. He had outlived the greater part of the fame which he once possessed, and at no time since 1850 would his death have been really an event in the literary world. His prose writings have been extensively read; gossipy, light, even frivolous, they yet were cleverly done and once were very readable; his touch was lighter, his expression more piquant than in his time was at all common among us. But their day is pretty much done. For a generation or two, however, Mr. Willis's name is likely to remain; he was an American author at a time when authors were rare in America, and he was author of one or two little poems which, whenever and wherever produced, would deserve to be called excellent.

THE news from England is unimportant. Trade is depressed, and the iron trade is largely passing into the hands of Belgians, who are able to undersell the English dealers owing to the continued differences between the English workmen and the masters. A terrible snow-storm has added to the distress already existing, and the Government is said to hesitate about introducing a reform bill; but there appears to be no doubt that the arbitration proposition made by the United States for the settlement of the differences growing out of the war will now be gladly accepted. The prospects of trouble between Austria and Hungary continue to increase, owing to the determination of the Hungarians to keep the control of their own army. But above and beyond all these minor troubles looms the "Eastern question," that portentous monster which, for fifty years, has troubled the repose of every statesman in Europe, and which no spell or potion yet devised seems strong enough to quiet. But the chances are that, before very long, the experiment of a Greek kingdom on a larger scale will be made, but it will be very long, we fear, before any power will venture to propose that the Turks shall leave Europe.

We publish in another column an interesting letter from our Cretan correspondent, giving a detailed account of the fight at the convent of Arkadi—an episode in every way worthy of the best days of Greece. Spartans might have done worse; they could not have done better. The way in which the Turks treat their captives, as described by our correspondent, is the way in which they have always treated them; the beheading of the dead, and the presentation of the head or ears to the pasha in command, is an old military custom of the Ottomans, and was practised, to some extent, in the Russian war, but repressed in deference to French and English prejudices. So that the appearance of the practice in Crete argues no increase of ferocity on the part of the troops, but it does argue a monstrous bluntness of the moral sense on the part of the European Powers. In these days barbarous modes of warfare are justly regarded as an offence against civilization, which will justify remonstrance, and even interference, on the part of neutrals. The English press teemed with denunciations of Russian barbarity in opening fire, without notice, on the unready Turkish men-of-war in the harbor of Sinope, and the editor of the Saturday Review writhed in agony for two years over General Neill's execution of ten guerrillas in Missouri. The rebellion of Crete affords a good outlet for some of this abounding humanity. Turkey is the ward of France and England; they have only to say, Let the Cretans alone, and Turkey withdraws from the island; they have only to say that the Cretans must be treated like civilized belligerents, and it will be done. Ten words of joint protest from the ambassadors at Constantinople would settle it. But for people who could not bear General Butler's rule in New Orleans to submit month after month to the massacre of women and children and the mutilation of prisoners in a Christian island by hordes of Asiatic barbarians, cannot but be regarded either as a display of great feebleness or a proof of great hypocrisy.

Louis Napoleon has struck another of those unexpected blows, and the effect shows how largely the element of suddenness has entered into his statecraft, and at the same time how much wiser man he is than most of his personal adherents. His management of the Prussian difficulty, his failure in Mexico, the ignoble issue of his troubles with the United States, and the unpopularity of the scheme for the reorganization of the army, had all seriously impaired his popularity, and, consequently, endangered his dynasty, for he is nearing sixty years of age and is somewhat broken down in constitution. Ten or fifteen years ago he would probably have sought fresh strength in a foreign war; he now turns his thoughts towards peaceful political reform, acknowledges in an indirect way the responsibility of the ministers to the Corps Législatif, and places the press under the protection of the courts—the correctional, not "convictional" courts, as the telegraph amusingly and somewhat ominously announced; and, though last, not least, legalizes public meetings. He may say now with an approach to truth that he has fulfilled the promise of 1852, and "crowned his edifice" with liberty. We say, "with an approach to truth," because one thing is still wanting, and that perhaps the most important of all, the individual responsibility of public functionaries before the courts of law for all their acts, whether done "par ordre supérieur" or of their own mere motion. Without this, French liberty cannot be said to rest on any substantial basis; but still an immense step in advance has been made, and we must all hope that the work of political discussion which is now reopened in France will show that the sound experience of the past eighteen years has not been thrown away, and that France will resume in the world of ideas the place for which no depth or length of oppression seems to disqualify her. Perhaps the worst feature in her case just now is the fact that a breed of newspaper writers has grown up during the reign of repression so worthless both in character and mind that they will probably use their newly found liberty in such a way as to disgust the public with the press and prevent the better class of journalists from exercising their just influence.

THE FREEDMEN.

Communications from Texas represent that in the north-eastern counties of the State the freedmen are more oppressed and brutally treated than in the days of slavery. Says the report: "The lash is more cruelly administered than ever before;" and freedmen who have cultivated land and raised crops have been robbed of all the fruits of their toil. A member of the grand jury of Red River County was heard to say that they dared not indict these criminals known to them to be guilty. Outrages, from cold-blooded murders down, have occurred, and there is no one to whom the blacks can appeal for redress. A recent letter from Austin gives an account of the murder of two freedmen—one near Austin, and the other at Home Bend. The murderers were white men. A case is reported where a freedman at Prairie Lea was cruelly whipped for addressing a young man as "Tom," instead of "Master Thomas." Another was shot for refusing to lend his bottle of whiskey to two white men. The civil authorities will not take any steps to bring the offenders to justice. In Panola County there exists a gang of five or six white men who live by robbing the freedmen. The citizens themselves are afraid of them, and the civil authorities powerless, because witnesses dare not testify against them. The military commandant at Victoria having refused to assist the Freedmen's Bureau officers, General Griffin, the military commander of the State, has issued an order to the effect that all military officers must assist the Bureau in the contingencies provided for in the Bureau and Civil Rights acts. The only cheering news from the State relates to labor. General Kiddoo, in a recent tour of observation, found the negroes actively making contracts for the ensuing crop. In spite of immigration, there is still a paucity of laborers.

—A colored man in Wilmington, N. C., has had letters of administration granted him as executor of the estate of another colored man, deceased. It is probably the first instance of such a grant or such administration at the South. A Northern colored man has been denied admittance to the bar of Georgia by the Superior Court of Chatham County. The court doubted its power to contravene a regulation of the State. The applicant, unfortunately, has found it difficult to practise long at any bar, and his forthputting is now, as it has often been both North and South, a positive injury to his race.

—The first news from Louisiana (Jan. 4) declared great willingness on the part of the freedmen to accept employment. On the 9th, we heard that the negroes of the interior had been very "restive" during the holidays, but were now "quieting down;" that the planters, however, found much difficulty in procuring help for the new year, "the freedmen being backward." On the 12th, the attitude of laborers and planters was reported "favorable." "The former are now generally contracting, where good crops were made last year, for shares, and, where bad crops were made, for wages. . . . Amicable feelings seem to prevail, especially where no troops are stationed." (Who knows whether this, as Tennyson enquires of war, is a cause or a consequence?) And finally, on the 18th, "The freedmen are deserting the plantations by hundreds, their contracts having expired, and the full amount of their wages having been paid to them. They refuse to work except at exorbitant rates."

—The burning of twenty-two colored prisoners (not necessarily criminals) in the jail at Kingstree, S. C., seems to have occurred in consequence of the inhuman hesitation, to say the least, of the jailor and sheriff. The only white prisoner was released. Maj.-Gen Robinson has ordered Gen. Scott to arrest these parties, ascertain the facts, and then hold the culprits, if so they prove, in military confinement on the charge of murder till the civil authorities are willing to try them.

—Wayne County, N. C., is afflicted with "regulators," the terror of the authorities as well as of their special victims, the freedmen. In Green County, five negroes, imprisoned on a charge of rape, were taken out by armed men and visited with "a horrible punishment"—so horrible that no other word than lynching is used for it. The action of the State courts in regard to apprenticing colored children has given rise to such complaints that Governor Worth has invited Inspector-General Sewall, of the Bureau, to investigate the alleged abuses.

The first number has appeared of a new quarterly journal called the "Southern Review," published in Baltimore. It is edited by Albert Taylor Bledsoe—formerly professor of mathematics in the Universities of Mississippi and Virginia, and late Assistant Secretary of War to the Confederate States, a prolific writer for the Southern press—and William Hand Browne, of Baltimore. It "is intended to supply a need long felt at the South; the need of an organ for Southern men of letters, and of a high class of periodical literature for Southern readers," and will "represent the South not as a party, but as a people." Besides literature, art, and science, it will temperately discuss politics, in the higher sense of the word, and education, the Southern people having found "that they can no longer trust the mental and moral training of their sons and daughters to teachers and books imported from abroad." This number contains 256 octavo pages, and has eight leading articles, two of them political. "The Legal Status of the Southern States" is a commentary on, and conclusions from, the cases decided by the U. S. Supreme Court during the war, by Mr. Russell, late Attorney-General of Virginia and member of the Confederate Congress. Dr. Craven's "Prison Life of Davis" is made a peg on which to hang a virulent and violent accusation of the War Department for the imprisonment of Mr. Davis. Dr. Bledsoe contributes the leading article, on "The Education of the World," and Mr. Wm. B. Reed, of Philadelphia, a review of Earl Stanhope's "Life of Pitt." "The Daughters of de Nesle" gives a very entertaining account of the first three mistresses of Louis XV.; and a very severe and amusing punishment is administered in another article to Mr. N. C. Brooks for his "Viri Americæ Illustres," in which the almost innumerable mistakes and errors of that gentleman's Latin style are pointed out. Two other papers treat of "Craftsmen's Associations in France" and "Mental Physiology." Altogether the Review is less Southern than would be expected, not in sentiment, but in style, which is, except in one article, calm, temperate, and often really good. In ideas it is somewhat behind the age, as is natural, the South having been, in great measure, cut off from literature for the last five years. Most of the books reviewed are already old to the Northern public. The writer of "Mental Physiology," for example, would doubtless have written very differently if he had seen the theories and facts on that subject that have been published in the last ten years, his knowledge of the literature of the subject seeming to stop short at 1856.

—Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are about to publish "The Open Polar Sea," by Dr. Hayes. It is a history of the expedition made by the author in 1860 and 1861, and contains a full discussion of the question of an open Polar Sea, and a description of Greenland ice, and of the formation of icebergs. It will be illustrated with engravings and vignettes, and three maps. Dr. Hayes succeeded in getting to latitude 82° 45′ north, within seven and a quarter degrees of the pole, after much danger and difficulty, a great part of his journey having been made with sledges. After his return in October, 1861, Dr. Hayes was actively engaged in the medical department of the army until some time after the close of the war, which accounts for the late appearance of the book. Messrs. Hurd & Houghton have now ready the first number of their reprint of "London Society," from duplicate plates.

—The Prince de Polignac, who served in various capacities in the Confederate army during the rebellion, is endeavoring now to do the South service with his pen. In a late number of the "Revue Contemporaine," an organ of the French liberals, he has a long article on "The American Union after the War." It is one of the most amusing misstatements of the position of the North that we have yet seen. Of course the prince discusses the war and its cause, which, he says, was not slavery, as is often mistakenly alleged, but the opposition of the South to a consolidated, unconstitutional form of government. He thinks the laws against the education of the blacks were not made for the persecution of the negroes, but to guard them from the pseudo-philanthropy of the North, who wish to put in their hands the knife and not the pen. Besides, these laws were never enforced. "What negro who wished has not learned to read?" "The black population of the South was more moral than any other black population on the globe. It was certainly more moral than the white manufacturing populations of the North. There was a double reason for it; they had no Yankee schools, and they had the example of the family," the family being the basis of all Southern institutions. The article ends with a tirade on Montalembert for his pamphlet on this country, and an appeal to the instincts and sympathies of the French nation. It shows very truly the feelings of the Polish nobility as to progress and liberty, and is a comment on the Polish as well as the Southern insurrection.

—De Tocqueville somewhere says, "Freedom creates a thousand times more property than it destroys, and in states that enjoy it the resources of the people increase faster than the taxes." This, if not the motto, is certainly the moral of a book just published by Cotta, of Stuttgart, written by Dr. Karl Freiherr von Hock, Imperial Privy Councillor of State of Austria, on "The Finances and the Financial History of the United States." The author states in his preface that he began his special studies of the subject in the fall of 1862, induced to do so by the wonderful aspect which the finances of the United States began to present, by the readiness with which burdensome taxes were borne and loans contracted after a long period of immunity from taxation. His work was long interrupted by the negotiations between Austria and the German Customs Union, in which he bore a conspicuous part; but, as often as he returned to the subject, he recognized more fully its general and permanent interest. The analogy of the internal affairs of the United States to those of Austria made it important "to enquire what were the means employed in America to secure the triumph of the Union, a higher degree of cultivation, freedom, and the increasing prosperity of the people, while such results could not be achieved in Austria." It is important, too, for the emigrants from Europe to know something about the financial laws and administration of the country of their adoption. A careful reading of the book would, doubtless, be also of great value to many native Americans, and we hope that a translation of it will be made. Von Hock published in 1857 a work on the financial administration of France that has been much read and studied in France, and in 1863 he published another on "Taxes and Public Expenditures," that was also well received.

—Dr. Ori, of Tuscany, well known in Italy as a scientific man, has lately returned to Cairo from a very adventurous expedition into the interior of Africa. He had been appointed by the Viceroy of Egypt physician-in-chief of the Soudan country, and made his journey of seven years in the little-known territories of Darzaleh and Darfur, under the patronage of Victor Emanuel, who paid his expenses. In Dr. Ori's explorations, which have extended over five thousand miles and into districts never before visited by a European, he was accompanied by his wife, an Italian lady of great endurance and courage. He is now preparing for publication his journal, and an account of the many specimens of rare animals and plants which he has brought home with him. His medical knowledge and his acquaintance with several African dialects were of great advantage in conciliating the friendship of the tribes through which he passed.

Four very interesting and valuable articles by Emile de Laveleye, on "The Instruction of the People in the Nineteenth Century," have appeared in recent numbers of the Revue des Deux Mondes. Their translation and republication in this country, with suitable notes and additions, would be of great service to the cause of education. Even a condensation of the articles, or the selection of such portions as most pertain to our affairs, would be a welcome contribution to the pages of any one of our many educational journals. The first of the series is a general review of the public school system in the United States. Taking little notice of slight local differences, the writer presents in a clear and compact form the essential features of what is fitly termed the American system. Four nations, he says at the outset, can boast that all their (native) citizens can read: North Germany, Norway, Switzerland, and the United States; but only in the one last named does every one read in order to understand political, religious, and industrial discussions. In the Union, he continues, there is twice as much printing as anywhere else, and as much paper is consumed as in France and England together. With this flattering opening he proceeds to describe and discuss our school system, pointing out its defects as well as its good points, and strongly commending it to European statesmen.

The second article is a review of the systems pursued in England and her colonies; and the facts which are here collected show forcibly that where the government simply favors instruction, without doing anything to enforce it—in other words, where private and corporate schools are established, and public schools, in the American sense, are not organized—the education of the people is not accomplished. The argument here presented is one of the strongest we have ever seen in reply to the saying that "the State cannot keep school." In our opinion, the writer shows conclusively that if the State does not "keep school" the people will grow up in ignorance.

The third article of the series is a consideration of the possibility and desirability of enforcing attendance at school, and the means by which compulsory laws are carried out. The last of the essays which has yet appeared is one of the most important, being a discussion of the religious question. To Holland is attributed the credit of having first solved successfully the problem which has vexed all communities of different religious creeds. The radical separation of theological education from secular, first attempted there and subsequently accomplished in this country, in Upper Canada, and elsewhere, is specially commended.

Superintendents of schools, and all others concerned in public discussions of the principles which underlie our educational systems, will find these essays instructive and suggestive.

LIFE OF WINTHROP.[*]

THE sons of the earliest Massachusetts sires take an equal pleasure and pride in writing their memoirs and in standing by the legitimate results of their noblest principles. The library of her histories and biographies is becoming a voluminous one. Most of the modern works, however, are but a corrected or enriched and amplified rehearsal of the staple matters related in a fragmentary or incomplete way by writers of the old time. The coming to light of ancient collections of papers of prime historical value gives us, from time to time, either a new theme or fresh materials for filling out or elucidating an old one.

The man of highest mark and service among the founders of Massachusetts was John Winthrop, its first governor. His son, of the same name, became, in his early manhood, a resident of Connecticut, of which colony he was the governor while his father held the office in Massachusetts. The descendants of the elder are now represented principally in the two States which represent those original colonies and in New York. A large collection of family papers, including a mass of original letters, was discovered a few years since in New London. They proved to be of just the sort and variety most prized in the preparation of memoirs. Two large volumes of these letters have already been published under the title of "Winthrop Papers," in the collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society. The president of that society, the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, has, during the whole term of his office, been most unwearied in promoting its interests and in quickening the zeal of its members. Under the prompting, we may believe, of an equal desire and motive to do his own part in the service of that society and to commemorate fitly his own honored ancestor, he has now completed a most pleasant and profitable task.

The documents to which we have referred contained, among the family papers, many of a private nature relating to the domestic affairs of the Winthrops in their English home, and helping, by the aid of personal research instituted by the biographer in two visits to England, to fill out at large the history and experience of the governor during that earlier portion of his life about which before we knew very little. A volume, published three years since, was devoted by the biographer to the history of his ancestor, his family descent, his education, and private life at home. Those of our readers who are acquainted with the contents of that volume found in it matter of a charmingly quiet and tender interest for such as love a picture of ancient home life and the delineation of character under the most attractive training of Puritanism in its softer phases.

Furnished with a most convenient line of division in the treatment of his subject, the biographer now gives us a second volume, dealing with that portion of the life of his ancestor which was spent in the New World. He arrived in the harbor of Salem with the large fleet bringing the intended colonists, June 22, 1630, N. S. He died in Boston, March 26, 1649. The interval between, with its matter of local and personal interest, as involved in the career of the subject, covers the term of years of which this volume is so far a history. Matthew Cradock, who was the governor of the trading company resident in England, administered under the Massachusetts charter, as he could not come over himself, resigned his office in order to allow the election of John Winthrop, under whose auspices and guidance the company had agreed to transfer itself and set up its jurisdiction with the royal patent on this soil. It was only after the most deliberate and well-weighed consideration of the inducements and discouragements, the helps and the obstacles to the enterprise, that the momentous measure had been resolved upon. Winthrop was its master spirit; the one who was to bear the heaviest sacrifice if it failed; the one on whose devotion, constancy, and full-nerved resolution feebler spirits would rely, under the stern exactions which they could foresee as sure of encounter, and the temporary and unlooked-for disasters which might dishearten.

The biographer has performed his own work with great discretion and dignity. The temptation which he might have felt, if he had had a less noble and a more exceptionable subject, to constitute himself expositor, defender, and eulogist of his ancestor, would undoubtedly have been restrained by his own good sense and high-mindedness. But, happily, there was no matter or occasion for such temptation. John Winthrop was a conspicuously true-souled, pure-hearted, and able man; a providential man to lead, to regulate, and to ensure the success of such an undertaking as only a wise and good man would have ventured, and only a thoroughly earnest and great man could have led on to triumph. His biographer has only to allow him to show himself for what he was, and in what he purposed and did, and as he bore himself and vindicated himself when under question, rivalry, or temporary misunderstanding, and his subject stands free of all need of a champion or a panegyrist.

His wife, expecting the birth of a child, remained in England when the fleet sailed, bringing him with a part of his family. His son Henry was drowned at Salem on the day after his landing. When the wife, the noble-hearted and beloved Margaret Winthrop, followed, she was called to commit the new-born infant to the deep on her passage. For twelve years, including that in which he died, John Winthrop was chosen governor. The years were not continuous. The cautious men whose affairs he administered, not without some little stirring of their anxiety by private jealousy, feared lest the office might be regarded as held by a life tenure. To guard against this fortuity they dropped their best man often enough to break the continuity of his chief magistracy, retaining him, however, as one of the "assistants," but recommitting their supreme honor to him again and again after they had made sure that he had learned his lesson of humility as faithfully as they had learned that they could not dispense with his services. Some of the finest touches of the portraiture in the book before us are those which relate to his bearing under the rivalry of one prominent man, and the questionings of many stern but honorable scrutinizers of his course.

The very full journal which Governor Winthrop left in manuscript, and which has been edited in two editions with such rare and elaborate painstaking by the Hon. James Savage, whose notes are often as quaint as the original text, has always been regarded as the most valuable of all the historical works of Massachusetts. The truthfulness and candor of the writer, his piety, the generosity and magnanimity of his spirit, his relations with all the prime movers in his enterprise at home and abroad, and his evident wish that posterity should be informed of the purposes and plannings of the first comers, give his pages authenticity and bring the reader directly into his confidence. It is, of course, mainly by this journal, with the illustrative aid of letters and other private with a few public documents, that the biographer has drawn out the life. The subject of it shared, of course, the superstitions, limitations, and religious prejudices of his contemporaries. There are many strange stories in his pages, many things which will move a smile in the reader, and some few which are painful, not to say shocking. But they are the reflections of the narrowness and darkness of view which marked the times and the men. And yet there was no austerity, still less was there anything of the malignity of bigotry or of the cruelty of superstition, in the character of John Winthrop. Were he with us to-day, just as he was when he trod the grass-fields and worshipped in the thatched meeting-house of Boston, he would be recognized as a most saintly and lovable man, and as accessible by knowledge or argument to all the new truths and all the real changes for the better which mark these days of ours. We have never heard of him as being summoned by any of the rapping mediums, who might well stand in awe of his grave and rebuking dignity. But sure we feel that of all the original settlers on the soil of Boston there was not one whose words from the spirit-world to those who occupy the scenes of his hardships and noble accomplishments would be more wise or gracious. The Bostonians are indebted to him for their Common, and we may take that fact as symbolical of the sort of claim in kind, but in enhanced degree and wide variety, which he has upon the gratitude and love of the people of the whole State.

The visitor to the chapel of Mt. Auburn sees at his left hand, as he enters the door, a marble statue seated, with the stiff neck-ruff and the costume of a gentleman of the ancient time. The face bears a good resemblance to the original portrait of the man for whom it is designed as a memorial, hanging in the senate chamber of the Massachusetts State House—viz., John Winthrop. In the secretary's office, in the opposite wing of the State House, is suspended the charter, that charmed document which he brought over with him, which legitimized the government set up on the new soil, and which was so tenaciously, not to say slyly, or artfully, or evasively, held in spite of royal commissions sent over to reclaim it. The man thus presented in portrait and statue, and the parchment which he resolved should never, if he could help it, recross the ocean, as he determined he himself would not, are treasures of which Massachusetts is proud. Yet it is not with a conceited or a local pride. She believes that the man and the parchment have a national significance for our country, and that they represent what is best of the influences which are to be our common aims and safeguards for the future. John Winthrop, as a man and a magistrate, had many contemporaries who, while greatly honoring him, shared many of his virtues. Indeed, there was a singular likeness and harmony of spirit between him and Bradford and Eaton and Haynes and Williams, whose offices and services in the other New England colonies were similar to his. How much the living generations owe to their lofty probity, their piety, their spirit of self-sacrifice, and their wisdom in legislation and in the establishment of precedents in new relations, only those can know who, after watching the aspects and currents of our modern life, turn back in quiet hours and read thoughtfully such books as this on which we have thus been moralizing, after having richly enjoyed its perusal.

LESSING.*

The life of Lessing, just published by Mr. Spencer, is a work of permanent value. It is the best of the many books which have been written and compiled for the purpose of portraying the character and career of one of the most illustrious scholars and thinkers that even Germany has ever produced. It combines judicious selection with ample information, criticism with narration, and presents with comparative brevity an outline of labors the benefits of which the world is now enjoying in almost every department of learning and culture.

The translation is excellent: it is a faithful reflection of the spirit and style of the original, and at the same time is good idiomatic English. We have carefully compared it with the German, and find it not only critically correct, but also so free in the structure of sentences and the choice of words that one would scarcely suspect from reading that the story first took shape in a foreign tongue. Even the verses in the text are in most cases good poetry as well as exact rendering. This excellence deserves particular commendation, because the work, from its treatment of philosophical and dramatic topics, is uncommonly difficult to put into English dress; and especially because very many translations nowadays are done in so hasty and slovenly a manner as to be mere caricatures of the works which they attempt to render.

The external life of Lessing is so intimately interwoven with his literary labors, and the powerful influence which he exerted on his own age sprang so directly from his personality, that we must here give a slight sketch of his history.

He was born in 1729 in an obscure village of Northern Saxony. From both parents he inherited a taste for scholarly pursuits, and his love of study was developed at an unusually tender age. His father was a Lutheran pastor, and brought up his children under strictly orthodox influences. But a passion for free enquiry and a keen subtlety of thought and reasoning were characteristic of Lessing from his early youth; hence the rigid system of instruction in the grammar school and the university, although of great advantage in training his brilliant powers to patient investigation and accurate conclusion, did not have the effect to destroy his originality. His regular studies were prematurely ended, partly through lack of pecuniary means and partly because he soon outgrew the slow processes of academical tuition, which are necessarily designed for mediocrity. From this period he was thrown upon his own resources; nay, more, he was all his life harassed and impoverished by the claims of needy relatives upon the inadequate recompense of his labors. For a time after leaving the university Lessing was engaged at Berlin in the publication of a literary journal and review; afterwards, his favorite department of literature, the drama, received his attention and the stage his active support. "Lessing," says Heine, "was the literary Arminius who freed the German theatre from every foreign domination," and what his vigorous emancipating genius did for the drama it accomplished also for the other departments of German art and letters. As he was obliged to choose such occupation as would bring him instant and regular pay, his most powerful inclinations were often held in abeyance, and he wandered from place to place, and from one situation to another, as opportunity offered. Thus at one time he was travelling as companion to a wealthy gentleman, at another he was brought into the din and tumult of war as secretary to a general of the Prussian army. Again, we see him striving to establish a national theatre at Hamburg, and this project having failed, through the ignorance and indifference of those with whom he had to deal, he accepts, after trial of other unsatisfactory plans, the post of director of the ducal library at Wolfenbüttel. Here he spent the last ten years of his active life, and here he died, after a laborious and singularly unfortunate career—unfortunate so far as his personal happiness was concerned, but gloriously useful and successful in its influence upon his fellow-men, and growing more radiant as his prophetic ideas find development in the actual progress of the race towards the liberty he demanded and the truth he adored.

Allusion has been made to his misfortunes; and it would, indeed, seem that in his private experience he was the mere football of fate. All his best hopes and wisest plans were thwarted, and it is certain that his life was shortened as well as saddened by anxiety and disappointment. He wished to pursue a scholar's quiet and absorbed existence, and he was early thrust forth to employ his store of learning towards practical ends of the commonest kind; he wished to travel, and, with the exception of a disastrous attempt to visit England, and a hurried tour through a portion of Italy as companion of a capricious and weak-minded prince, his movements were confined to a few of the petty kingdoms and duchies of Germany; he enjoyed the society of friends and the interchange of thought with kindred minds, but, in his ardent love of truth and sincere pursuit of knowledge, he rose to heights where his companions could not follow him, so that he was continually wearied with loneliness, and pained by the misapprehensions of those to whom he would fain have turned for sympathy and support. He longed, as only a man of pure mind and life can long, for the sacred pleasures of a happy home; and his marriage to the only woman he ever loved was delayed by adverse circumstances for six weary years, until the prime of life was past for both; and when the union was at last secured, he was granted only one year of wedded happiness, and only a few hours of the pride and joy of paternity before the grave closed upon wife and child.

But though we may regret the vicissitudes that made Lessing's life one long tragedy, it must be acknowledged that his experience was of a kind best fitted to discipline and direct his remarkable faculties, and that the result was the greatest possible advantage for the progress of culture in his native land, and for the spread of liberal ideas throughout the world. It is difficult for us of the present day to realize the state of German literature a hundred years ago. We regard with admiration this splendid, concentrated, skilfully arranged treasure of learning, the achievement, in great part, of Lessing's efforts; but, in his time, its departments and its institutions were as isolated and disintegrated as were the political interests of the land that cherished them. Each duchy, each city, had its exclusive clique or coterie of scholars and thinkers, who looked upon all outsiders with contempt. There was no desire for united labor, no pride in national success; and servile imitations of French rules and models hindered all characteristic development.

But Lessing was exempt from all weaknesses of parties and schools. Saxon by birth and Prussian by habit, he lived, in the midst of a deadly war between the two powers, entirely free from partisan prejudice, yet warmed with a holy patriotism for Germany as he dreamed of it and as it is destined to be—a united and powerful nation. Educated into reverence for the French standards of art, and surrounded by mongrel specimens of literary taste which were pronounced masterpieces by his age, he yet broke loose from all these trammels, and dared to express in his native language the lessons of truth which were taught him by the instincts of his own heart and by actual experience, thus filling up the gulf which had long separated literature from life. He was a philanthropist and an emancipator at a time when Jews were denied the protection of civil law, and free-born citizens were sold like cattle to fight for foreign powers; he was a Christian after the pattern of Christ's precept and example, while the arrogant religious world in which he lived was confined within the narrowest limits of bigotry and superstition. It need not be said that he found hosts of enemies, who exhausted their devices to destroy his influence, and even called to their aid the strong arm of tyranny to annoy and silence him.

* "The Life and Works of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. Translated from the German of Adolf Stahr by E. P. Evans, Ph.D., Professor of Modern Languages and Literature in the University of Michigan." Wm. V. Spencer, Boston. 1866.

Heine's wish that not a lyre, but a sword, might be laid on his coffin, would have been eminently fitting for Lessing, whose life was a constant battle. His mission was to war against prejudice, to overthrow the authority of bigots, to detect and dissipate shams; and nobly did he fulfil this work. His residence in various parts of the German empire, his sympathy with progress in every department of life and knowledge, his unquestioned authority in all matters of literature and art, his brilliant reputation as a scholar and a writer, his unselfish tenderness towards all forms of misery and sorrow, his hearty appreciation of excellence in others, even the nobleness of his personal appearance and the fascination of his manners and conversation, made him the central and combining influence amid the conflicting elements of his country's development—the key-stone of the arch of German literature.

And the good that he did lives after him. He who was named by Macaulay as, “without doubt, the first critic in Europe,” laid down rules of art which still retain their force; while the grandest trait of his character, his fearless and unwearied search after truth, found its reward in the gift of prophetic insight, leading him to utter sentiments which are brought forward in our day and hailed as new discoveries, without recognition of his silent but ceaseless influence.

We cannot better sum up the rightful estimate of this great and good man than by quoting the initiatory verse of the book now offered us:

> “Type of the perfect man he came;
> Of highest Truth the peerless Knight
> (Himself her image, pure as light),
> And Freedom's champion, void of blame.”

TWO NOVELS WORTH READING.[*]

SOME years ago a slender novel of English authorship made its way to these shores, where from inadequate advertising, it would seem, it met with but a small sale. The title was a rather singular one and easy to forget, and readers who, like ourselves, caught a glimpse of it at the time, must have been wondering since what ever became of that very good story which had for a heroine a certain Lill Tufton, and for a hero an ostracized Italian patriot, a Mr. Giuliani; a story written in the Ruffini vein which was not Ruffini's. But the other day Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt issued a pretty little volume bearing the title “Who Breaks—Pays,” a translation of the Italian proverb “Chi rompe—paga.” It was a republication of the neglected English novel, a second reading of which only served to strengthen our former liking.

The story opens with the rather trite occurrence of a “foreigner,” poor yet noble, who gives Italian lessons to support himself, falling in love with his rich and beautiful pupil, even as that model of the “deeply, darkly, desperately” delightful, Thaddeus of Warsaw, did before him, and under much the same circumstances as those in which Ruffini's Paolo falls in love with Miss Lavinia Jones. But it is pleasant to see what a nice judgment of the natural consequences of education and character and circumstances can make out of this romantic and hackneyed starting-point. Without unduly foreseeing the results, the reader likes to feel satisfied, when they come, that they are just what ought to have been expected. This merit, which may belong to the simplest little narrative, and which never belongs to the sensation novel with the “ingenious plot,” and, in fact, forms the great distinction between novels enjoyed by the thinking and the unthinking classes, is pre-eminently true of the great works of fiction. “Why, anybody could have thought of that!” has been the voluntary exclamation of many an inexperienced person after reading one of Dickens's most life-like passages. It is the old story again of Columbus and the egg. “Lavinia,” just alluded to, did not possess this attraction of natural sequence, so to speak. Doubtless all the things recorded of her might have happened, but certainly they never did. Ruffini, however, was not always wildly romantic, as everybody knows who has read “Dr. Antonio.” The author of “Who Breaks—Pays” has evidently studied that work with a deep and abiding admiration. Had he been a person of less ability, his book might have been a mere imitation of it. As it is, the resemblance between them is only a sort of family likeness—nothing more. But there will be those to insist, at least, that Giuliani is modelled after Antonio. We think it possible that two men being of the same blood, bred under the same political influences, and taught by like experiences of privation the governing principle of self-renunciation, may be strongly alike and yet not be the same men. From beginning to end, Giuliani is the object of an interest and sympathy to the reader that no mere weak rehash of somebody else's conception could lay claim to.

Perhaps, after all, there is no use discussing the originality of any “latter-day” book-born beings. Since the time when Dr. Johnson called Miss Burney “a little character-monger” there have been so many thousands of novels written, that a type of everybody has been produced and nobody can be a “character-monger” any more. Except for this fact, it would have been a temptation to give the author of “Who Breaks—Pays” and “Skirmishing” high praise for “original” dramatis personæ. But if “originality” is out of date, “appreciation,” as everybody knows who has to visit picture galleries or report on the merits of the last programme at the Philharmonic, is in high request. It may then be said, without violating the conditions of our sophisticated state, that the mind which has depicted “Lill, beautiful, sprightly Lill,” “surnamed Espiègle,” capital Miss Crumpton, that “vicious terrier” Sir Mark, and the Townsend with her queer religion, is delightfully appreciative of human nature. Not a person in the book but is individual, even down to the “broad-faced, broad-shouldered” Russian girl, Mlle. Arsenieff, who plays Chopin at soirées musicales; or pretty Edward Tufton, who listened so unconsciously when Lill sang at him:

> “There was a little man, who had a little soul,
> And he said to his soul, let's try, try, try,
> To make a little speech between you and I, I, I.”

Sir Frederick Ponsonby comes nearer being a lay figure than any one else, unless, perhaps, where he appears at the closing of the last scene—the whole of which is so deeply pathetic—and is made conspicuous by being painfully unnoticed. It was so with the poor Queen in “Ruy Blas,” whom fate or Victor Hugo leaves to commit suicide if she chooses, or else to find her way through the night as best she can out from that balcony, heavy with death and crime and despair, back to an inquisitorial etiquette that will call for an account of every step of her nocturnal wanderings.

It is a skilful biographer who can describe an entanglement through all its phases as justly, keenly, sympathetically, as the entanglement in this book is described. No vulgar partisanship betrays an inward pique which the wounded novelist seeks to avenge by relating it to the world. The perusal of Lill's history would be a real balm to a girl—and many a one there is—who is or has been in Lill's predicament; i. e., pursued by a superior man whom she knows she ought to love, but whom, somehow, she cannot love. How tenderly, and yet with what unflinching insight, are her weaknesses dealt with! How the delicate touches of humor lighten the picture without ever rendering ridiculous the real suffering of the poor, young, thoughtless, fashionable thing! It is impossible not to pause here, and guess that a woman tells the tale. No man could ever so relate a girl's experiences; not even the great Mr. Reade himself, who pretends to be able to see through a woman's very soul and down to the marrow of her smallest bones. This author dissects with gentleness and fellow-feeling, like a woman; not like a man who runs his sword through the Gordian knot of feminine complexities, and, holding up the ravelled cords, cries, “There's your mental formation, madam!” But if our entertainer's sex is betrayed by her fineness, it never is by her femineity. She generalizes like a man. She is free from affectation. She does not permit one's feelings for either hero or heroine to conflict with the justice due to the other; one is forced to understand how there may be two sides to a story.

In general terms, what is true of “Who Breaks—Pays” is true of “Skirmishing.” But although of a lighter character, and still shorter, we think the latter to be more complete than the former. The racy dialogue is racier than before. The plot unfolds with the dash and rapidity of a French comedy. The plot is a gem of a plot. There is a spicy little mystery whose catastrophe is positively a surprise even in these Coldstream days; and yet not a bit of a forgery or a particle of the Braddon machinery of secret springs and subterranean passages is employed. It is the kind of a story that suggests dramatization, only that by making a play of it the clever descriptions, and the scraps of philosophy scattered throughout, would be lost.

One is not annoyed by wordy, irrelevant rhapsodies on scenery, or anybody's reflections on looking at the cot where he was born, or, in short, by any of those tedious sentimental passages with which so many story-tellers feel called upon to interrupt an otherwise meritorious tale, in order to prove their possession of taste and feeling. Yet there is no disdain of word-painting. Every successive situation is a picture. The unimaginative reader must see in his mind's eye the actors and their accessories, a passing train of vivid figures, beautiful, grotesque, or humorous. There was the lovely Mrs. Brown at the rectory party, "in her plain black silk dress looking like a portrait of Vandyke surrounded by pictures from a fashion-book." And Mrs. Lonsdale, was also there. "She shone with gold wherever gold could be put—neck, arms, fingers, and waist. She and her husband had spent several years of their life in Australia to some purpose; she was very suggestive of nuggets." Here are the portraits of the grave lady and her equally grave husband, who came to pay a visit at the rectory, and for whom the party was given:

> "Two most cruelly unamusing and unamusable people. They could not talk on politics or religion or literature; on principle they would not play at whist or écarté, backgammon, draughts, squails, croquet, or Aunt Sally. The gentleman allowed of chess; but there was no chess-board at the rectory. Mr. Greatorex tired himself to death taking the husband over the church, and explaining that nobody could explain what a certain painted glass-window means, or how it came there, or indeed the church itself; there it was, nobody knew who had built it. This did seem a subject of interest to the guest, who, having heard that the Romans had certainly been in that neighborhood, though some time ago, no doubt, expected to have seen, at least, concrete bricks—yes, he did confess to an interest in concrete bricks."

The odd boy, George Brown, whom nobody can make out—with his mixture of good qualities and the free Continental ways and dislike of church that give so much scandal to the rural neighborhood—he is at the party to amuse the "pair of petrifactions" with his wonderful piano-playing. The female petrifaction would like to have any one tell her that is not a professional performer, indeed! The precocities and peculiarities of the young genius are equally sustained from his entrance to his exit from the book.

But the central figure of interest is Mrs. Lescrimière, the heroine Maud's French-descended grandmother. We read of all sorts of old ladies in books, sharp, or senile, or benevolent, or pious, but rarely one of that kind which is rare enough, but still to be found in real life—an old woman who adds experience to natural ability without extinguishing the warmth and spontaneity of youthful feeling; who joins to that fine result a quick wit, a keen sense of the ridiculous, a touch of defiance of public opinion, the utmost benevolence, and a mind well stored with the reading and events of her day. Mrs. Lescrimière remembers her own part, too, in the French Revolution. She tells an apt story well. Her good-humored antagonism to British prejudices is delightful. Her ruling principle is expressed in the motto quoted from her on the title-page: "Never repent a good action, however it turns out for yourself." Such a person in one's house would be a perfect specific for all sorts of selfishness and moroseness; we are not sure that it is not a partial cure just to read of her. How she vexed the conservative curate because "she never would receive any notion on authority, but would persist in discussing its reasonableness or credibility"! It was the "quickness of her circulation" which led her, in the course of her life, into many "admirable mistakes." "The wonder to her friends was that, after her sad experiences, she should be still so full of life and hope, and what Escott [the curate] denominated speculative optimism."

RECENT SCHOOL-BOOKS RELATING TO THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

THERE has been within a few years past in this country a noteworthy progress in the study of the English language. The publication of the books of Marsh, Trench, Max Müller, Craik, B. W. Dwight, W. A. Wheeler, and others indicates an increasing interest in philological studies, for most of these writings are popular rather than scientific, intended for what used to be called "The General Reader" rather than for the scholarly few, fitted rather to stimulate than to satisfy the appetite of scholars. So, too, our public libraries are paying more and more attention to the collection of early English literature, and likewise better books are preparing for the study of the English language in high schools and colleges. We are still without a first-rate series of manuals illustrating the grammar, the history, and the literature of English, and consequently it is commonly the case that young men who are liberally educated enter upon their professional lives having far less acquaintance with their mother tongue than they have with the languages of ancient Greece and Rome. Without disparaging the study of Latin and Greek, we give a special welcome to all books which are intended to promote a critical and historical study of English.

Among the publications of this character is an "Outline of the Elements of the English Language," by N. G. Clark, lately a professor in Union College. His book is made up of lectures given before a class of college students, chiefly on the history of the language, to which is appended a series of extracts illustrating the changes of the tongue between the days of Alfred the Great and Sir William Temple. The writer exhibits no special powers of investigation, drawing his facts chiefly from the larger works of Marsh and Craik, but he shows good judgment in the selection and arrangement of his materials, and his book is well adapted to the high school or academy. It will not satisfy the best informed teachers, but it fills a gap which has long been left open. Spalding's "History of English Literature" (Appleton) is a more elaborate treatise, occupying nearly the same field, but it is too comprehensive and minute for ordinary classes. It gives a much more thorough survey of the literature than the volume of Mr. Clark, yet, so far as our observation goes, it is wearisome to young persons who know next to nothing about many of the writers it discusses, and who tire of the hurried introductions to so many distinguished people. As a manual of English literature simply, Shaw's history is an excellent volume, and the lectures of Professor Henry Reed on English poetry and English literature are unequalled in their power of awakening in young minds the love of letters.

A most appropriate companion to either of these volumes is a book which in older classes a skilful teacher can make most interesting—"Five Centuries of English Literature," one of the well-known Tauchnitz series published in Leipzig (Leypoldt & Holt). At a moderate cost the young student has here at command the text of Wycliffe's version of St. John, one of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," extracts from Hawes, Thomas More, Spenser, Ben Jonson, Locke, and, finally, Thomas Gray. The careful perusal of this little volume would be no bad introduction to the history of English, presenting, as it does, the exact text of prolonged extracts.

As a manual of English composition, the very best which we have seen is the recent book of Alexander Bain, professor of logic in Aberdeen (Appletons). We are among the number of those who believe that the power of writing well is acquired by the study of good authors and by constant practice with the pen, rather than by the perusal of formal treatises on rhetoric and logic; but there are advantages in definite instruction on the principles of literary taste and the structure of sentences, paragraphs, and treatises. Blair and Campbell and Kames were once useful in this way, but they have long since been laid upon the shelf. Whately's essay on "Rhetoric," though never written for a text-book, has held its own against all rivals, because the author was not a maker of school-books, but an able and earnest man who wrote with all the freshness of a practised dialectician. His "Rhetoric" is a stimulating book to those who are learning to reason and argue; but for younger scholars and for those who would study other forms of composition the persuasive Bain's is a more useful manual. Day's "Rhetoric," in some respects, comes nearer to Bain's than any other work which we know. It shows a familiarity with some of the best German philosophical treatises on grammar and on æsthetics; but the style is too dry and technical for common classes. Bain is precise and philosophical, but not dry. He introduces an abundance of examples and illustrations, chosen, for the most part, with keen discernment both of beauties and of faults in composition. The treatise becomes in consequence a series of interesting critical remarks on the usage, good or bad as it may be, of distinguished writers. Moreover, its philosophy is good, and its opinions show common sense. Its study will tend to make accurate and vigorous writers, but not to make finical or sentimental critics. While the reader must not expect in this book much originality in the main course of instruction, he will not be disappointed if he look for acuteness of observation, freshness of suggestion, and an appreciative acquaintance with English literature.

There are two new aspirants for grammatical laurels. One of these, Mr. W. G. Tenney, has published a "Grammatical Analyser" (Appletons) which is a labored but not a successful attempt to exhibit the formation of words by the addition of prefixes and suffixes. The writer shows no acquaintance with modern linguistic investigations, and his scheme is by no means well arranged for showing the structure of the language, or for awakening a love of grammatical study. It would be easy to point out grave defects in the plan and execution of the work, but we forbear.

Kerl's grammars (Ivison, Phinney & Co.), of which there are three, First Lessons, Common School, and Comprehensive, profess to be original treatises putting the science of grammar "on a more simple, natural, and practical basis." The author is an enthusiast who goes about commending his own methods, and silencing, if not converting, those who differ from his views. There is a great difference of opinion among practical teachers as to whether he has really improved the art of teaching grammar or not. Some portions of his books have certainly the merit of simplicity, even to bareness of expression. Throughout the series there are copious illustrations of good and bad usage. Many of the technicalities presented in other grammars are omitted, and, by means of a variety of type, the essential and the subordinate remarks are clearly distinguished. But the author's use of English sometimes shows the stiffness which comes from studied brevity, and in general we think that he errs by too frequently employing definitions when illustrations and descriptions would be of more service. Thus, he defines a relative pronoun to be "a pronoun that generally stands in close relation to an antecedent and joins to it a descriptive clause." What idea will that convey to a young scholar? In the smallest book there are six tables for illustrating the plural forms of foreign nouns; but the simple rule for distinguishing between the nouns in y which make the plural in ies (liveries), and those which make it in ys (keys, monkeys, etc.), is omitted. His explanation of the use of the subjunctive is much better than that which is found in most school grammars, but it is too succinct to be easily mastered by ordinary scholars in the common school. Fuller explanations of its significance in English, and especially a history of its use and of its disuse, would seem to us desirable. On the whole, we have formed a favorable impression of the value of Kerl's grammars, and when some of the innovations become familiar to teachers, we are confident that their merits will be acknowledged.

We defer a notice of some of the primers, which are constructed on new and attractive plans.

NEW LAW PUBLICATIONS.*

THE value of a legal treatise must be determined by the practical test of experience in its use as a daily counsellor. Under this test many books of fair appearance prove worthless; and some which have an unpromising look to the hasty reviewer prove most valuable. With this preliminary warning to our readers, we proceed to express the best judgment which we have been able to form upon the law-books now before us.

Professor Parsons's treatise on "Partnership," like most of his other works, has the great merit of a more thorough citation of English and American authorities than can be found in any other book upon the same subject. From these authorities he deduces rules of law, which he states in the text with general clearness and simplicity of style. His arrangement of the different subdivisions of the general subject is very satisfactory, strongly contrasting with his arrangement of his great work on "Contracts," against which we shall never cease to protest until he is induced to put it into something like logical order. The treatise now before us proves that Prof. Parsons can discuss legal propositions in orderly sequence if he will, and will make the republication of his work on "Contracts" without revision on this point inexcusable.

The author first discusses the general nature of partnership; then defines who are partners; states their mutual rights and remedies, and the rights and remedies between them and third persons; states the law as to real estate held by a firm, and shows how the firm may be dissolved; what is the effect of a dissolution, and what proceedings are had thereafter. The last three chapters are devoted to the subjects of limited partnership, joint-stock companies, and part ownership of vessels.

One criticism that we are led to make, perhaps from local feeling, is that Professer Parsons hardly gives adequate weight to New York decisions. We do not claim exalted ability for our courts, but the rules of law settled here, whether they are right or wrong, are decisive of the rights of parties in an immense proportion of the legal controversies of America. As an example of what we refer to, we mention the questions of a partner's power to assign all the property of the firm for the benefit of creditors, and of the liability of the partnership property to be actually seized for the individual debt of a partner; upon both of which points we understand our law to be opposed to the general rule laid down in this treatise, though it does not so appear with sufficient clearness by either the text or the notes. The careful reader will, however, find enough New York cases cited in the notes to enable him to satisfy his own mind upon these points by an examination of the authorities.

Mr. Raff's "War Claimant's Guide" is a useful compilation of the laws and regulations concerning applications for military pensions, bounties, back pay, etc., with a large number of carefully prepared forms. The author has had considerable experience in this branch of business, and we think his book can be relied upon.

The "Law Review" for January opens with a well-deserved though very severe criticism of Mr. Wallace's reports of decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States, showing that he is unable to comprehend the points decided by the court, or to state the facts of the cases with clearness or dignity. Mr. Wallace's appointment was generally welcomed by the bar, under the impression that he was the author of some excellent criticisms upon other reporters, but he has been a deplorable failure, and we hope the court will no longer hesitate to supersede him.

Mr. J. C. Hurd contributes an able article upon reconstruction, which is well worthy of the attention of legislators, while it will interest all classes of readers. An article on "Estates upon Condition" shows the state of the law in this respect to be somewhat unsettled, and makes useful suggestions for reform. Eighty-four pages of digested decisions by the highest courts in England and America are alone worth the price of the whole magazine; while the book notices, summary of events, etc., are both interesting and instructive.

The New Gospel of Peace according to St. Benjamin. (New York: The American News Company. 1866.)—This satire is now republished as a bound volume, and will be purchased, we suppose, if by nobody else, by the collectors of the literature of the war. The preface and a not very large body of notes are new; the text remains, we believe, unchanged. The preface is devoted to an attempt at appearing to say, without in fact saying, that the work is not from the pen of Mr. R. G. White; to an account of the great success which it had when it first appeared, and to a defence of the work and of the style in which it is written against criticisms made in these columns. It was remarked in this journal at the time of the appearance of Book Fourth that a great part of the credit due such a performance was due to the writer who first employed the device of parodying the language of Scripture. This, it was said, the writer of the famous Chaldee manuscript had done, and it was further said that the biblical style was better preserved in that work than in this of St Benjamin. Whereupon Mr. Grant White replies, and his reply is a part of the preface, that he had never heard of the manuscript in question till after "The New Gospel of Peace" was published. It is to be inferred that if Mr. White had not heard of it, the author of the "New Gospel" had not heard of it. To this it is enough to answer that both of these gentlemen might have seen a copy, and that it was so widely read in this country years before the rebellion that a critic would have done wrong if he had assumed that, far asunder as Mr. White and the modest author may have been, both of them had not read it in the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." As to the respective claims of the two works in respect of accuracy in their imitation of scriptural language, we are clear for awarding the palm to the elder. A philologist would make sad work with the claims of either. But neither was addressed to philologists, and we are pretty confident that this passage, for instance, from "the Chaldee"—a description of snuff-taking—"and he took from under his girdle a gem of curious workmanship of silver. . . . . And he took from thence something in color like unto the dust of the earth,"—this, we say, we feel confident will to the general ear sound far more biblical, even though to the eye it may seem less biblical, than such passages as this from the "New Gospel." Let us remark, by the way, that the latter has its first solecism on its title-page; it calls itself a gospel, though its manner and its matter cause it very much more to resemble a book of the Old than of the New Testament. As for the manuscripts of the Chaldeans, we do not know that they were not much the same as those of the Hebrews. But to our promised quotation: "For Robbutleeh will surely be victorious, and then shall the city of Gotham and the province of Gotham be without defence against him, and the end shall come the more quickly and the gospel of peace shall prevail, and the bonds of this nation shall be dissolved and I shall be a satrap in my province," etc. The minuteness of criticism which Mr. White has learned in his Shakespearian studies he brings to bear on this subject, and after saying that the writer of "the Chaldee" seems to be unable to think in the dialect in which he chose to write, he pronounces quite out of keeping such phrases as these: "Whereunto I may employ you," "put your trust under the shadow of my wings," "and by these means you shall wax very great," "and he framed songs," "that had put such amazing words into the book," etc. To us, we confess, they seem not nearly so unscriptural as expressions like these which we find in the "New Gospel:" "and compromised themselves," "could not be conquered, no, not even by calamity," "ere they march," "a patriarchal land," "nether garments which are unmentionable," the word "satrap" in the passage quoted above, and two or three others which Mr. White himself discovered, as "a splendid despotism," "slavery," etc. But this subject had never any importance, and has ceased to have any interest. The work was often puerile, often bright, witty, bitter, and shrewd, but it was in its nature ephemeral, and is henceforth a book only for the curious.

Swingin' Round the Cirkle. By Petroleum V. Nasby. Illustrated by Thomas Nast. (Lee & Shepard, Boston.)—We have already spoken somewhat at length of the characteristics of Mr. Nasby's humor and of his title not only to literary distinction, but also to the gratitude of his fellow-countrymen for his powerful exposure of the late Democratic party. We said then, in reviewing the first volume of his letters, that, unlike most of his fellow-humorists, Mr. Nasby improved as he went on; and the volume before us, comprising the letters for the year 1866, is a proof of the correctness of our position. It remains to add, since these later productions are still fresh in the minds of most people, that they are much more elegantly printed than the former, and that Mr. Thee Jones must certainly acknowledge the superiority of Mr. Thomas Nast's illustrations to his own. Mr. Jones's "lait pastor" is a figment of the imagination. Mr. Nast's is a type derived from the study of very corporeal men, with the seal of strong drink and "Democracy" upon their faces and bodies, and shares the peculiar merit of the text which it illustrates—absolute fidelity to the life, caricature without distortion, humor rather of selection than of representation or misrepresentation.

THE CRETAN STRUGGLE.

THE Cretan question has enlisted the liveliest sympathy of the whole liberal press of Europe. It is recognized, at length, as not a merely abortive revolutionary movement, but as the energetic and powerful resistance of a nationality that is struggling for its rights, of a people who are every day pitilessly butchered under the very eyes of the representatives of nations that profess to be foremost in progress and civilization. It began with the burning of villages and the reducing of their inhabitants to the last extremity of destitution; it has ended with becoming a desperate struggle for life—in a word, a war of extermination. The English Government, moved by the recital of the atrocities committed by the barbarous hordes of Mustapha Pasha, is said to have instructed its consul at Canéa to draw up an exact statement of the cruelties perpetrated by the Turks in Crete as impartial as his long acquaintance with the people will enable him to render it. And, accordingly, he is reported to have transmitted to his government a conscientious account of all that has occurred in that unhappy island, painting, in very sombre colors, a sad picture of its present condition, and giving a full description not merely of the acts of barbarity that have already come to the knowledge of the public, but of the unheard-of atrocities over which the enemies of Greece have thus far succeeded in drawing a veil. And the recent voyage of an English gunboat to Crete for the purpose of taking off the starving women and children from the island, together with the formation of a very influential committee in London for the purpose of receiving and forwarding supplies to the insurgents, gives a certain confirmation to these reports.

The cabinet of St. Petersburg, also, as we learn by recent advices from Athens, is said to have addressed a note to the powers by whom the Hellenic kingdom was originally constituted and is still protected, proposing the annexation of Crete to the kingdom of Greece. The cabinet of the Tuileries is said to have accorded a favorable reception to this note; but, not wishing to be outdone by any other nation in the recognition of that emancipation from a degrading yoke which the Greeks are contending for with a persistency and a self-sacrifice that are in themselves a guaranty of success, the Emperor is thought to have gone further, and to have proposed the annexation to Greece of several of the Greek continental provinces of Turkey.

These reports may not be true, and we fear they are not, at least not accurate, but it is evident that the public opinion of France and England is setting towards the policy which they indicate; for even the most unreflecting minds are becoming rapidly aware that if France and England would not alienate from themselves the Christian nationalities of the East, they must do something more than they have done hitherto to prevent them from throwing themselves into the arms of Russia. "Greece awaits her liberator; . . . he will win a noble crown of glory," wrote Napoleon from St. Helena; and sympathy with the Greek cause and an ardent desire for the rehabilitation of a people so remarkable for the persistency with which it has clung to its nationality, to its religion and its language for so many centuries, has always characterized the French people. And the same is true with England. English scholars and English liberals from the days of Byron have taken and still take the liveliest interest in the fortunes of this long-suffering but still aspiring race. The recent cession of the Ionian Islands to Greece, so honorable to English statesmanship, was but a sign of what the heart of England yearns to see done. It is an earnest of what it will do when, as we hope, it becomes a little more enlightened and ceases to have its clear perception of the inevitable course of events in the Eastern Mediterranean so clouded by its fears as it is now.

At the breaking out of the war of the revolution which, after eight years' desperate fighting—fighting like that in Crete, of which all the records of antiquity furnish no parallel for its heroism and high resolve—a French statesman exclaimed that he desired no greater glory than that of writing the treaty of the deliverance of Greece with his heart's blood. And that sentiment has been the key-note, so to speak, of all liberal French thought ever since. But England and France, it must be remembered, have international alliances which hamper them. There are dark clouds on the European horizon of which, in our judgment of their conduct in this matter, we take, perhaps, too little account. There are difficulties in the question of Greek independence as it presents itself to them which we cannot understand, or rather do not make sufficient allowance for. Their policy, therefore, has been to civilize the Turk and liberalize Turkish institutions. But how shortsighted that policy is, the present revolution in Crete and the constant restlessness of the whole Christian population of Turkey sufficiently indicate. The truth is, Turkey is beyond civilizing so far as regards its rule over races as intelligent and progressive as the Greek. The time has come when the whole question must be looked in the face. England and France tried to look it in the face in 1852, and they brought down upon themselves the Crimean war. It is no wonder, therefore, that they shrink from interfering in the present struggle, the issue of which no man can foresee. They do not wish to repeat the terrible experience of Sebastopol, and therefore they hold off.

And nothing, perhaps, could be more opportune for the Greeks than just such a state of things. They are able to win their own liberty if left alone. It may seem extravagant to say so; but with Turkey steadily decaying as it has been in moral power, bankrupt as it is in material resources, the Greek race, energetic, quick-witted, with a splendid future to reward them and an invincible determination to sustain them, are to-day quite a match, if properly organized and properly encouraged by the friends of liberty throughout the world, for all the forces the government of the Porte can assemble. Even this comparatively small island of Crete, toward the close of the great struggle in 1829, had been so far successful, by its own almost unaided efforts, as to have driven the Turks to such extremities that in a week longer they would have been forced to abandon the island or to perish in their last stronghold, when, with a barbarity hardly paralleled in diplomatic history, the Allied Powers stepped in and gave the island over to Egypt, by whom it was afterwards restored to the Sultan.

What the Cretans did in 1829 they can do to-day. They had our sympathies and our aid then; let them have it now. They ask us to feed their starving wives and children for a little time until they can have closed with the Turk in one deadly embrace, without the sickening thought to paralyze their arms that all they hold dear are abandoned to the ruthless brutality of a foe that spares neither sex nor age.

England and France are restrained by considerations which can have no weight whatever with us. We are free to act as well as to speak. No international law forbids us to feed starving women and children who have taken refuge in a friendly country. And let us remember that in aiding the Greeks we aid in building up a free people, a people that, having bought its liberty with its life-blood, will know its worth; that we aid in organizing and sustaining free institutions in a region now abandoned to a tyranny more blighting than any ever known in Europe; and that in diffusing democratic ideas in the East we strengthen them immeasurably in the West.

We hope to see committees formed in every city throughout the country, and generous aid go forward at once to these heroic people. They do not ask for arms or ammunition, but only for bread.

WHY THE SOUTH CANNOT ACCEPT THE AMENDMENT.

WE publish in another column a letter from "A South Carolinian" which, though it contains nothing very new, puts some old things in a very clear light. The article which called forth his letter seems to have struck him as the revelation of some recently conceived and desperate designs on the part of the majority, inasmuch as it declared roundly that they would, in the long run, have their own way in the government, constitutionally, if possible; but if not possible, unconstitutionally. Now, that this should be news to any Southerner of education, we confess surprises us. This is the doctrine which John C. Calhoun and every one of his followers have been preaching for forty years, and which every politician in the South has for the last twenty years professed steadfastly to believe. Moreover, it was, according to their own account, because they believed this that the Southern leaders determined on secession. They said there was no security for the rights of the minority in the Union; that the numerical majority of the North had ceased to respect their constitutional obligations; and there was, therefore, nothing left for those whose interests were thus endangered but separation. So that "A South Carolinian" asks a little too much when he asks us to believe that he has now for the first time heard that there was some risk of the North refusing to be bound by the letter of the law in dealing with the revolted States. There is, undoubtedly, on the part of the Northern people, the strongest desire to do all things constitutionally. Respect for the Constitution has been, in fact, with the great mass of them carried to the verge of superstition. All through the war even, when everything had been in reality left to the arbitrament of the sword, their efforts to fight legally, to find a justification in the books for the various acts committed in the field, were amongst the most remarkable and interesting features of the struggle; and, finally, when everything had been done that could be done to make the Constitution meet the emergency, and the case still remained desperate, the "war power" was devised for the satisfaction of tender consciences, and under it the nation was saved after the lawyers and metaphysicians had licked it into a decent resemblance to a legal doctrine. In reality, however, the "war power" was nothing more, when put into plain English, than the determination of a nation not to be strangled—to save its own life at whatever cost. It was only near the close, however, that this was acknowledged, and the reluctance there was to acknowledge it at all was, perhaps, the most striking illustration ever offered of the respect of the majority for the forms of law.

The South seems to have expected, it is hard to say why, that it would be impossible to drive the Northern people to this extremity. When the Southern senators and representatives left Washington, they seem to have supposed that all that was necessary to secure the peaceful establishment of the Confederacy was proof that the Constitution made no provision for the coercion of States, and this little task they left to Mr. Buchanan and other Democrats, who did the work reasonably well; but it had about as much effect on the course of events as Dr. Lardner's demonstration that a steam vessel could not cross the Atlantic has had on ocean steam navigation. The States have been very thoroughly coerced without, we venture to say, one thousand of the two millions of men who took part in the enterprise ever troubling their heads seriously as to whether the war was a constitutional war or not. Every one asked himself, it is true, Is this lawful? but every one was satisfied if he was shown that it was necessary. What was necessary was done; and this, let us add, is the only mood in which a people can in supreme moments, when their all is at stake, achieve great things. Had they been animated by any other feeling, the Northern people would have bequeathed to posterity a ruined continent divided into warring states, an indefinite postponement of free government, the raw materials for a ferocious despotism based on the degradation of the poor and weak, and some fine editions of the Constitution and of the Federalist, with the commentaries thereupon of Mr. George T. Curtis and of the World newspaper, all of which would have remained to the remotest ages a lovely but somewhat ridiculous monument of the popular respect for legal traditions.

"A South Carolinian" expects, now that the war is over, the majority shall resume its old chains, and not only behave constitutionally up to a certain point, but agree to behave constitutionally under all circumstances and for ever. That is to say, he thinks the South ought to be bound by the Constitution when it suits it, but the North ought to be bound by it always. The South formally refused to be bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court, and appealed to the sword, and the sword having decided against it, it wants to get back into court and begin the old arguments as if nothing had happened. Now we have no doubt angels could carry on controversies in this way. Beings devoid of human passions and prejudices, and blessedly ignorant of the ways of this wicked world, might be willing to carry on a struggle with the South for the settlement of the organic law of the nation, even when they held in their hands overwhelming superiority of force, sometimes by fighting and sometimes by arguing, just as the South might find it convenient. But the Northern people are not angels; they are men governed by human motives and swayed by human passions. The South, it is true, is placed at their mercy by the result of a bloody conflict. The ordinary penalty of such a defeat is the execution of leaders and extensive confiscation of property. No such penalty has been inflicted. It is useless to say that this was not an ordinary rebellion; no rebellion is in the eyes of the rebels an ordinary rebellion. All rebellions arise out of a disputed title to sovereignty. It is true that "the armless sleeve," as our correspondent says, "cannot strike, and would not if it could." But a man's losing his arm does not involve the loss of his brains. He can still think about the terms he ought to make with a victorious enemy. The South, on its own theory, carried on the war as an independent power, and its armies surrendered as armies, on the mere condition of personal immunity for officers and men; the terms of political settlement have still to be made, just as they have to be made after any other war. The Confederate Government having disappeared, the negotiation has to be conducted with the separate States, and Congress has offered these States certain terms of peace and reunion which are now under debate. "A South Carolinian" says we may impose these terms, but we must not ask the Southern people to agree to them, because this would be asking them to be the instruments of their own degradation.

It is really difficult to treat this argument seriously. Were it sound, no treaty of peace would ever be made or have been made at the close of a war. Nearly all wars end in one of the belligerents getting the worst of it and having to ask for terms. These the victor invariably prescribes, and they are harsh or mild according to the extent of his victory. If the vanquished is utterly incapable of further resistance, they are such as humanity and sound policy may dictate. If the vanquished has still the means of protracting the struggle, he is usually allowed to make proportional modifications in them. When after the disastrous day of Novara, to borrow from the history of our own time illustrations such as all history abounds in, the Piedmontese found themselves with a ruined army, an exhausted treasury, and a defenceless capital, and the Austrians offered them peace upon payment of the expenses of the war, what would the world have thought of the Piedmontese Government if it had refused to pay the indemnity, told the Austrians to collect it themselves, and declared with fustian dignity that it would not be the instrument of its own degradation? Would not all Europe have laughed a horse-laugh? And when the Prussians the other day broke the Austrian power at Königgrätz, and had Vienna almost within range of their guns, and called on Francis Joseph to pay their costs, give up Venetia, and retire from the German Confederation, in which his house has for five centuries played the foremost part—does anybody suppose that he did not writhe and groan when he consented, and that the proud aristocracy who have bolstered up his power on so many bloody fields did not share his grief and humiliation? But what should we have said if he had replied: "Do your worst; I will sign no treaty. Drive me out of Italy and the Confederation if you please, but my pride will not allow me to retire; levy contributions on my subjects if you choose, but do not ask me to degrade myself by paying you a kreuzer out of my treasury"? Would not his own subjects and family on hearing talk of this kind have pronounced the Kaiser crazy, and deposed him? Who are the Southerners that they cannot, after defeat in the field, accept fair terms from the victor? What is there in their origin or history or character or achievements to make it impossible for them to do what the bravest, most accomplished, most famous, and proudest men of all ages have done without a murmur, and without a suspicion of disgrace or dishonor? What nation so completely defeated as the South has been has ever had as good terms offered it by the victor? And what nation is there which, under similar circumstances, ever refused terms half as good? Is there no common sense left amongst the adherents of the "Lost Cause?"

WHAT WE PREDICT AND WHAT WE ADVOCATE.

The Evening Post seems to be either troubled or puzzled or outraged by the opinions of The Nation on the subject of the powers and disposition of the majority as regards the Supreme Court and the Constitution. A weekly paper labors under heavy disadvantages in carrying on a controversy with a daily one, as the latter has the argument all its own way for five days, or, in other words, as long as the public cares anything about it; but nevertheless, at the risk of being once more saddled with an epithet next Friday afternoon, and having to carry it till the following Thursday, we shall restate our position.

We know as a matter of fact that there is a point of danger or difficulty at which a people will not be bound by a written constitution. There never has been a constitution drawn yet which has not been disregarded in times of great national peril. The Magna Charta even has been treated as a nullity as often as the public safety required it. The Federal Constitution was systematically disregarded during the war on the plea that it, by implication, provided for its own suspension in dangerous crises. For instance, Mrs. Surratt was illegally tried and illegally executed in defiance of the habeas corpus and of the courts. This is not our opinion only. It is the opinion of the Supreme Court, and the conduct of the Government in this illegal action had the approval of nine-tenths of the people.

We predict that the North, having fought for and won the right of reorganizing the Union on the sure and lasting foundation of certain great principles, will respect the forms of law and the decisions of the Supreme Court as long as there is a fair prospect of gaining its ends in the regular constitutional way, but that whenever it shall appear that there is no hope of reaping the fruits of the war by regular means, the majority will not be bound by the opinions of the court on great questions of public policy. We predict, for instance, that should the Supreme Court, in the Alabama case now before it, decide against the policy of Congress, or should it declare the Civil Rights Bill unconstitutional, its decision will be treated just as its dictum in the Dred Scott decision was treated. If anybody asserts that we are wrong in this, there is no use in arguing about it. A prophet cannot be refuted. The resource of those who do not like his prophecies is to disbelieve him.

We advocate, therefore, the speedy concurrence of the South and of the Northern minority in the passage, by regular constitutional modes, of such changes as the majority has evidently set its heart on, and has determined by hook or by crook to carry into effect, if these changes would really afford better security for personal liberty and for equality before the law, which, we beg leave to say, are the two things for which this nation exists. As long as there is the shadow of a hope that these things can be secured by regular constitutional methods, we are in favor of ordinary agitation; and we may add that our disposition would be to continue this kind of agitation until even the Evening Post got tired of it. But then there are large numbers of very influential people whose temperament is more ardent than ours, and who believe, which we do not, that they could frame, if they got on the Judiciary Committee of either House, a better government between a late dinner and an early tea than the wit of ages has ever imagined. Who these gentlemen are it is not necessary for us to say. But they exist and have a great following, and we are in favor of having all that is reasonable in their demands granted as speedily as possible, for the reason, amongst others, that we have a very high opinion of their destructive powers and a very poor opinion of their constructive powers, and that we believe that every day that the present "Conservative" resistance is protracted aids them in bringing courts, constitutions, and legal forms into greater and greater contempt. We rate Mr. Thaddeus Stevens as a legislator no higher than the Post rates him, but he holds in his hands principles which the country deems sacred, and as long as he holds them and asks in vain for their legal recognition, the masses will follow him, Jack-o'-lantern though he be, through any number of political quagmires. The best political friends of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Phillips just now are those, of whatever school of politics, who deride their claims and arguments. Their worst political enemies are those who urge the concession of their demands by regular constitutional process. If they should hereafter get tired of long waiting, break loose and smash a few "constitutional bulwarks," we shall, however, be no more responsible for the mischief they do than for the Cretan insurrection or the low price of wool.

THE MILITIA SYSTEM.

It is the opinion of certain writers that it is essential to the happiness of mankind that they be amused with some sort of humbug or other; that the great question is to furnish them with as harmless and inexpensive a one as possible; that it is of no practical importance what it is, so long as people do not actually believe in it, but only think they believe in it; and that the greater humbug it is, the more solemnly should it be discussed and the more tenderly treated by the few who know it to be such. Believers in this theory will be apt to have their faith confirmed by much that is said and done in regard to the militia system, which, in its present form, is a humbug peculiar to the English-speaking race. This, however, can be said in favor of it, that if, in times past, it has not done much good, neither has it done any particular harm. But now that in this State it is becoming colossal in size; now that it yearly gathers into its maw hundreds of thousands of the public treasure and constantly cries for more; now that men begin to talk and act about it as if they really had faith in what they were saying and doing: in view of all these things, it is high time to examine the nature and pretensions of this system which, not content with adding grievously to the burdens of the State, threatens now to add to those of the nation also.

The governor, in his late message, states that the effective strength of the National Guard of New York consisted, on the 1st day of December, 1866, of 104 regiments of infantry, 3 regiments of cavalry, 1 regiment of artillery, 1 battalion of infantry, 2 battalions of artillery, 3 batteries of artillery, 1 battalion of cavalry, 1 independent battery, 2 light howitzer batteries, and 1 squadron of cavalry. He makes the standard and approved remarks in regard to the advantages of a well-disciplined citizen soldiery, and takes occasion to say that had we been better supplied with such organizations at the beginning of the rebellion, its suppression might have been a work of months instead of years—a cheap phrase which, absurd as it is, has done more service since the close of the war than any militia regiment ever did during the progress of it.

Yet every one who has made but a superficial examination of this matter knows that this imposing force exists only on paper. Every one knows that outside of cities there is in it neither company nor battalion drill; and that even in cities there are but a very few regiments where either kind of drill is kept up with such spirit as to render their members proficient in the service. Every one knows that in time of war it is a very peculiar state of affairs when the rank and file of a militia organization can be got to take the field in a body for even a few weeks; that when ordered out, the places of a large number, unable or unwilling to go, are always filled by raw recruits. Every one knows that the penal provisions of the statute for securing the efficiency and discipline of the State troops are never carried out, and, moreover, that they never will be carried out. Every one knows that during the rebellion, when militia regiments were ordered to the field, their members, in manifold instances, refused to go, well aware of the fact that, so long as they were not mustered into the national service, they could not be tried for their conduct by United States officers, and feeling secure against the result of any court-martial managed by State officers. Every one knows that the money raised from the vexatious taxes and fines imposed upon citizens for not performing military duty has never added one dollar to the revenue of the State, has never furnished it the slightest aid in defraying the expenses of its military establishment, and, indeed, has never got beyond the pockets of the officials directly or indirectly concerned in its collection. Above all, every one knows that in case of war we should not, for the purpose of carrying it on, rely upon the militia regiments now formed or forming, but upon volunteer organizations that will then spring up of themselves.

Every one knows these things. Yet every governor in every annual message dwells in the stereotyped phrases on the necessity of a well-organized militia to the security of the country. Every newspaper takes up the solemn theme and calls for the adoption of some plan, it has no clear idea what, which will enable us to enter upon any future war with a vast, well-disciplined, and well-appointed force at our command. Every legislature appropriates money, and of late has begun to appropriate large sums of it, for the maintenance and increase of the military establishment of the State. Not content with this, a bill has now been introduced into Congress to add to the legitimate functions of the War Department the costly, cumbrous, and utterly inoperative machinery of a national militia system.

The popular delusion in regard to the value of this system has mainly sprung from the success of a few volunteer military organizations in some of our large cities. To such places such organizations are both important and necessary, because, however lacking they may be in themselves in discipline, matériel, or personnel, they are almost certain to be always far superior in all these points to the bodies of men against which they need at times to be used. But it must not be forgotten that such organizations are not indebted for their existence to the State, nor for their prosperity to its fostering care. They are not the result of enactments made by legislatures. They do not owe their efficiency to appropriations made in their behalf. They are simply the outward expressions of that inherent love of military life and taste for military pursuits which are peculiar to the people, and which always manifest themselves in some manner wherever large numbers of young men are massed together, where opportunities for meeting and drill are frequent, and where the rivalry of different bodies tends to give to every member of each one a personal interest in its success. They will flourish without the State; indeed, it may almost be said that they will flourish in spite of the State. It should certainly be the aim of every government to encourage and strengthen all such organizations, where they do exist, by every method consistent with a wise economy. But it should not fall into the common mistake of imagining that by the granting of privileges and subsidies it can create similar organizations anywhere. For though such organizations will succeed in cities if the State does nothing for them, they will not succeed in the country if the State does everything. For none of the conditions which conduce to the success of military organizations in the city exist in the country. There the situation is far different. Young men are comparatively few in numbers, and, moreover, they rarely remain long in one place. They live at distances too far apart to meet for frequent drill. In summer most of them are employed during the day in severe bodily exercise, which leaves them too much exhausted for any exertion at night. In winter, suitable and convenient places for assembling are usually procured with difficulty, and even if at all, are procured at an expense which the volunteers cannot, and the State would not and should not, be called upon to defray. The regimental organization extends at present by statute over an assembly district, and must, under any circumstances, extend in the country over a large tract of territory; and it is simple folly to say that there can ever be any battalion drill worth speaking of when the members of a regiment are scattered over an area of several hundred square miles. No esprit de corps, the life and soul of volunteer organizations, can possibly be infused into men who do not meet often enough to know their officers or to feel that they are either learning or doing anything of value to themselves or to others. Militia regiments, in consequence, have in the country always been a failure; practically they have never existed save on paper; and their nominal members can rarely be persuaded or forced into attending even company drill. It is not a matter to cry over. The people act with common-sense, however they talk; they have it, whether it finds expression in their laws or not. They see that in time of peace military organizations outside of large places are not desirable, and, if desirable, not possible; that in time of war no militia regiment ever takes the field for any but the most limited period; that if it apparently does so, it is only apparently, inasmuch as it is a new regiment which goes out under the old name, rank and file and officers of the line and officers of the field and staff being so completely changed as to leave visible scarcely the least trace of the skeleton of the original organization.

The delusion in regard to the benefits derived from the system has, moreover, of late been fostered in part by the exaggerated notions that prevail in regard to the operations of the militia during the rebellion. Without detracting from the real value of the work done by some of them, we say that in the main they were the most useless and expensive regiments which the Government ever had in its pay. Yet an imaginary importance has been attributed to what they did from the fact that they were usually called into the service at a time when the War Department was straining every nerve to increase the offensive strength of the army, and desired to withdraw all veteran troops either from places where there was no danger but where there might be, or from places where there was need to keep up a show of strength though not its reality. In addition to this, the exaggerated ideas of many of those who went out under such calls as to what they had seen and suffered increased the common belief in the value of what they had done. For it is a notorious fact that the shorter time a man has been in the field, the more terrible have been the hardships which he has endured and the greater the services which he has rendered. This is a natural feeling, and gave to many an unwarranted notion of what they and their regiments had accomplished which a fuller experience would have removed. The impressions produced in their minds they, however, communicated to others. And even now there are many persons who honestly believe that the victory of Gettysburg was in good part due to the timely arrival and heroic efforts of New York militia regiments hurried to Pennsylvania by Gov. Seymour; who cannot be persuaded that not a member of one of those regiments was within gunshot of the battle, or even within hearing distance. In truth, Gov. Seymour himself seems to be of that opinion; though it would be hard to convince of the fact any of the much-worn men who, while anxiously but vainly waiting during those long three days for the succor rumored to be on its way, felt that there existed no North save that which was under their feet.

Let us by no means be understood as advocating the giving up of the militia system entirely, or as denying not simply the importance but the absolute necessity of maintaining volunteer organizations in time of peace. But it is a useless and foolish waste of time and money to attempt to make that universal which from the nature of things can only be local; to spend millions in constructing elaborate machinery which at the first shock of war will all be thrown aside. It is not desirable to incur a vast expense in securing objects which can just as certainly be obtained for little or nothing; or to add to the already complicated labor of the War Department the unprofitable task of breathing the breath of life into that senseless model of a military establishment, a national militia system.

A BOSTON NOTION.

WITHIN the last thirty or forty years, and in Massachusetts even, many a youth thirsty for knowledge has had for his whole library not more than three or four books. And very likely many an elderly man can bethink himself—as his children, living in Boston, freely range over the hundred and thirty thousand volumes of the Public Library, not the least of that city's many glories—of the farm-house days when he used to count himself happy that the family Bible, besides the Old Testament and the New, contained the Apocrypha, unsuggestive of preaching, to delight him with the downfall of boasting Nicanor and profane Antiochus, and to charm him with the wonderful history of Tobit—a virtuous man indeed, but not in strictness a Bible character, and whose story was, perhaps, boys being rebellious, none the worse "for example of life and instruction of manners" that acquaintance with it was made not in Sunday-school, but on the floor in the Best Room. Now and then, as the eldest daughter of the house, week in and week out, brings home some blue and gold poet, or the "Flower-de-Luce," or Hurd & Houghton's "Lalla Rookh," perhaps he reminds himself of his garret readings in the one old canvas-covered volume, his grandfather's before him, an odd one of a set, which nourished his youthful mind with what succulence the age of thirteen could find in Dr. Edward Moore and David Mallet and John Dyer; days in which John Gay gave him "Æsop's Fables" in verse, for his benefit as well as the infant royal duke's, and applied the morals to the times of George the First; when Lord Lyttleton and Mr. Shenstone had, indeed, made him a sufficient Damon or Paridel or Daphnis, but he looked round the meeting-house in vain for any Phillis or Daphne, disdainful or kind, to whom he might apply the song he admired:

> "See Daphne, see, Florelio cried,
> And learn the sad effects of pride;
> Yon sheltered rose how safe concealed,
> How quickly blasted when revealed;"

when he knew by heart several versions of "The Death of Hercules;" when

Mr. Cawthorne addressed him in numbers such as the following, and taught "The Regulation of the Passions, the Source of Human Happiness":

> "Passions, like colors, have their strength and ease,
> Those too insipid and too gaudy these;
> Some on the heart, like Spagnoletti's, throw
> Fictitious horrors and a weight of woe;
> Some like Albano's"——

do something quite the contrary for a reason which his memory may probably fail to recall.

It is true that if he is philosophically inclined, and has a Bostonian belief in the great Emersonian doctrine of compensation, he may refuse to mourn that he was confined in that arid waste to browse on twigs so dry, and reflect that better food might have been put to worse uses and brought him calamity; that but for the chill penury of these forgotten bards, which repressed his noble rage, he might himself have been a writer of poems. Nevertheless, he will rejoice that such days as his are gone; that his boys and girls, if they know none of them by heart, can have dozens of Tennysons for one Akenside; that they may look, if they like, at stereoscopic views of which he could only read about, seeing them very dimly in "The Ruins of Rome;" that each subscribes to a magazine, and that he even has to sign a petition to the city school committee praying that pupils may not be required to study out of the regular school hours.

> . . . . "The Theban obelisk
> Immense along the waste; minuter art,
> Gliconian forms, or Phidian, subtly fair,"

We have seen recently a private letter of which our supposititious parent, in his childhood's days and famishing in his dearth of books, could have hardly dreamed. It was written by an influential member of the Examining Committee, which has just reported to the city of Boston on the condition of the noble library which we have already mentioned. It contains his view of the use to be made of libraries. He says that he is "every year more and more persuaded that people ought to give up the old notion of anxiously protecting books, in favor of the better one of getting as many books as possible worn out by fair use." For, in his opinion, to which our friend will now assent, though once he might have wondered at it, "the great difficulty about libraries, public and private, is to induce people to read the books in them, and that we must go out into the highways and hedges for customers. At any rate, we must get as far as possible away from the habits of the Middle Ages, when the manuscripts were chained, very properly I dare say, to the desks where they were to be used—just as they still are in the Laurentian Library at Florence."

The Boston people seem to be of his persuasion, for their fine collection of books, to which the year 1866, the fourteenth of its existence, added about nine thousand volumes and four thousand pamphlets, may be said to be absolutely free to all residents of the city. And if any reader entitled to the privileges of the institution desires a work not already among its stores, a printed notice in every book which he borrows informs him of the way to proceed in order to gratify his wish. He is urgently requested to fill out a blank form, which the librarian furnishes him, with the name of the work desired, and if there be no moral objection to its acquisition and it be obtainable, it is obtained and a notification of the fact sent to the person who asked for it. The published report says that during last year three hundred and six books were thus asked for, that forty-six of them were already on the shelves, one hundred and thirty were ordered and are now in the library, one hundred and twenty-eight were ordered and will arrive, and only two were not ordered. From the fact that two only out of three hundred and six were considered objectionable, and from the fact that in the list of newspapers kept in the reading-room we find the name of the Investigator, it may be inferred that no bigoted or sectarian standard of what is morally objectionable is applied by the committee.

The same anxiety to make the library fulfil the intention of its founders —"be what no other library in the world has either attempted or desired to become, a powerful and direct means for the intellectual and moral advancement of a whole people without distinction of class or condition"—is evinced in the pains taken to save the borrowers from trouble and expense and loss of time, and the library from loss of books. Every volume taken out may be kept twelve days, and as it is taken out the borrower's name and address are set down. The date of borrowing is stamped on the cover, that the book itself may be a reminder of the time when it should be returned. If it is kept out till the thirteenth day, the borrower is warned by mail that he is incurring a fine of so many cents a day by its detention, and that after the eighteenth day has gone a special messenger will be sent for it at his expense. During thirty-five days of which the report speaks, after this system was adopted, the whole number of books lent was 29,352; the delinquents whose cases were referred to the messenger numbered 82; the books recovered were 40 in number. This system will very greatly diminish, in the future, the likelihood of losses and injuries. Reliance must perforce be placed, unless the character of the institution is to be changed, upon the honor and honesty of the population of the city. At first, and for four or five years, the result of so doing was a matter of pride to every Bostonian, and though of late there has been a change for the worse, the state of affairs is not now in the least discouraging. The alcoves containing works of fiction are, of course, most exposed to misuse and depredation. In fourteen years they have lost 1,678, and the number which had to be condemned as worn out or as odd volumes was 1,029. Of those two classes 940 books have since been returned or had their places supplied by the purchasing committee. In other departments the losses are very much less; out of the Bates Hall, which contains 105,312 volumes of the 130,678 comprising the library, only 43 have been lost during the past six years, and a part of these it is said will be returned. A part of the remedy for this evil, as we have said, will be found in the new system of recording books and of providing for their return; the committee propose, further, that the Legislature be asked to apply some suitable penalty which can be readily enforced in all cases of gross and wanton abuse.

We have mentioned the reading-room. A change not long since made in the management of it has excited a good deal of comment among the Bostonians, but seems to be justified by the statements of the report. If we are not misinformed, even the sacred precincts of the British Museum, an institution not exposed to the inroads of a democratic population, have been invaded by persons whose behavior was incompatible with literary labor or with comfort. Pendennis, let us say, goes there to read up for one of those articles the erudition of which is to astonish his mother and Laura. By-and-by Miss Blanche Amory enters. Open flirtations, it is said, are carried on; love is made and small talk talked in the reading-rooms, and women constantly and unnecessarily come there for fictions, till the steady old habitués are bitterly exasperated, and the authorities are anxiously considering what can be done to restore peace and quietness to their disturbed domain. A like evil has afflicted the serious frequenters of the Boston reading-room. Worse than that—as anybody and everybody, strangers as well as citizens, boys and school-girls as well as men and women, could go in and out without question, it was found that periodicals were stolen and scribbled on, that peaceable reading was impossible, and that the room presented rather the appearance of a receptacle for refuse pamphlets than an orderly apartment for study and silent amusement. So of late the magazines, instead of being spread out on the tables, are stored in desks and placed in charge of an official, and whoever would read one, sends up a card with his name on it, and an attendant quietly brings him what he wants. The trouble, so far as the writing goes, must be very slight to the reader, and attendants in libraries are not always in the nature of necessary evils. We know of a library in Brooklyn, and there is another, a famous one, in this city, where the borrower is made to feel that the loan of a book is a great favor. Would that such grudging dispensers of a wisdom that is not theirs were willing—we use a metaphor which, though a vulgarism, he will not disallow—to take a leaf out of his book, the suavest and most courtly of men, whom we remember as custodian of a college library not very far from Boston! An attendant, it is possible, may be civil, and he may know something of the library, and he may be a help rather than a fussy hindrance. Of those in the Boston library we have pleasant recollections, and if they are still what they were, we are at a loss to know why objection should have been made by any reader to the plan of the committee. Opposition, if it still exists, will probably not last long. The statements of the report seem to furnish complete justification for the change. Readers can now find what they want, the superintendent says; the room is quieter, magazines are no longer defaced or purloined, and we are glad to hear that "the groups of idle boys"—"unknown quantities of idle boys" might be a fitter phrase—have been "eliminated." The making of love in the room, to the distraction of everybody's attention and the disgust of the right-minded and married, is not mentioned as having been among the evils formerly existing in Boston and now removed. But we should suppose that on either side of the water a policeman or two would be found efficacious, and we offer the suggestion to the management of the British Museum.

Turning over the leaves of the report, we find several facts of interest besides those which we have given above. The total number of lendings this year was 193,187, and as the number of days during which the library was open to the public was 278, the daily average of lendings was about 695. The circulation increases with each year. In 1866, the works lent belonging to the department of English history and literature were 18 per cent. of the whole number lent, a heavier percentage than is shown by any other department. The English Patent Specifications, which are not lent for home use but must be used in the Bates Hall, were called for by 187 persons, and the whole time of their use was 249½ hours. No record was made of the use of periodicals or of a collection of atlases, cyclopædias, dictionaries, gazetteers, and other works of reference numbering several hundred volumes.

Of course it is not possible to estimate with accuracy the value of an institution such as this, which does its work upon the minds and hearts of men. It is safe, though, to say that its results are immeasurable, not only because they are of a kind to elude estimate, but because they are so great as to be immeasurable; and the whole history of this grand public charity, if that name may be given it, shows that in Boston, at any rate, it is determined to trust the people and to keep them fit to be trusted. Certainly there seems little danger that the mediæval management or the mediæval use of a library will ever be in vogue there. When will New York have a free library? Or, to put the question in another way, When will Boston have free fights in her Common Council room?

PARIS, Dec. 28, 1866.

AT this present writing all Paris is doing its New Year's shopping. The crowding in the fashionable thoroughfares is as dense as usual; the broad sidewalks of the Boulevards, narrowed for the time by the rows of booths, ignoble but characteristic, erected along its edge, being well-nigh impassable. The representations of the Infant Jesus in the manger, life-size and lit up with wax tapers, have yielded their usual sum of delight to the children of the capital; the midnight masses, with their impressive and beautiful music ushering in the Christmas morning, have been followed, according to custom, by the festive supper of the Réveillon; and Christmas day has witnessed the usual concert of dinner parties, with imitations, more or less successful, of English plum-pudding, followed by the lighting up and rifling of Christmas-trees, borrowed from "the Germans' Fatherland," that is at last so rapidly developing into the long-dreamed-of Empire of Germany. The customary homage to tradition having thus been paid by the capital, its energies are now devoted, and will be so for another week, to the business of admiring the countless charming temptations so lavishly displayed in the shop windows, and which will be gradually appropriated by those whose purses enable them to purchase as well as appreciate, after being longingly stared at by those to whom fate has been less propitious.

To attempt an enumeration of the wonderful display of the season would be simply to make of this letter an abridged catalogue of an industrial exhibition; suffice it to say that, while the manufacturers of costly and elegant trifles seem to have surpassed themselves in every department of varied industry of this busy city, Susse, Giroux, and Siraudin, as usual, divide between them the palms of popularity. The Emperor and Empress have been amusing themselves with their usual Christmas inspection of the two renowned repositories of elegant trifles, and have bought largely at each; and the Prince Imperial has laid in a large store of the ingenious mechanical toys in which the second of those great houses is without a rival. Giroux's needle-guns, especially, are "the rage" of the season among the boys, as are his mechanical dolls among the girls. These dolls pronounce several words with tolerable distinctness, roll their eyes, cry, and work their legs and arms after the fashion of angry infants. They have beautiful long hair that can be combed, curled, and made up into a fashionable chignon; and they are provided with a house full of furniture, including beds well furnished with sheets and coverlets, and chests of drawers containing an ample store of all the elements of a fine lady's toilette. Some of these new-fangled dolls, with their accessories, cost several thousand francs, and find purchasers. The attention of the public is pretty equally divided between the gay little ladies of Giroux's grand display and the brillant collection of dolls at a neighboring establishment, got up in exact imitation of the various epochs and leading personages of French history.

As for Siraudin, the renowned poet, deputy, playwright, and inventor of marvels innumerable in the sugar-plum line, his establishment, under the auspices of his partner, Rheinhard, a kindred and congenial genius, comes out this year stronger than ever. No other confectioners come within gunshot of the achievements of these unrivalled makers, whose "creations" are works of art in their peculiar line. To say nothing of a hundred other wonders, their new bonbons, named after Goethe's "Mignon" as "done into music" in Ambrose Thomas's new opera, and those which have the exact flavor of fresh cherries (most fugitive of all fruit flavors, and hitherto the despair of confectioners), are melting marvels which it would seem impossible for even their skill to surpass. The coffers, cabinets, boxes, and baskets, in ivory, ebony, mother-of-pearl, and marquetry, in pearl-embroidered satin, cloth of gold and silver, and every other rich material, ornamented with carvings, incrustations, paintings, jewels, and destined to contain these sugary chefs-d'œuvre, are miracles of taste and workmanship, but, alas! as costly as beautiful. And as, in this city of display, gifts are apt to be prized in the ratio of their worth in money, the value of these splendid objects, for the offering of which the artistic sugar-plums form a convenient pretext, is often still further enhanced by the presence of a lace handkerchief, a Cashmere shawl, a bracelet, or other costly element of the feminine toilet, ingeniously hidden under the bonbons. As usual, the distinctive feature of Siraudin's display is a couple of great dolls, got up with an utter disregard of expense, and, as usual, all Paris is flocking to look at them, and forming a queue outside the shop, as is done at the doors of the theatres. The two little ladies who have thus succeeded to the honors of "The First and Second Empires" of last year represent "The City of Paris" and "The Exhibition of 1867." The busts of these dolls are by Talrich, rival of Mme. Tussaud in the world of wax-work, and are faithful likenesses of two of the most renowned beauties of the day, of whom one is said to be "la plus jolie de nos femmes galantes," and the other "la plus galante de nos jolies femmes." The dresses are by Madame Baron; that of "La Ville de Paris" is a perfect miniature, in rich brocaded silk, of the narrow skirt and long train in vogue just now, set off with a profusion of diamonds; that of "L'Exposition de 1867" is of white satin, spreading out to an immense width, and embroidered over with the arms of all nations of the planet. From the waist hang oriflammes of satin of all the colors of the rainbow, on which are embroidered, in gold and silver, the attributes of the various arts and industries. The head-dress, necklace, and other ornaments are composed of gold and silver medals.

Of the two other main "attractions" of the moment, viz., the Advent sermons of Father Hyacinth at Notre Dame and the masked balls at the Opera, it will suffice to say that in the last of the orations in question, having for subject "Morality in its relations to family life," the fat old monk launched out into such glowing and rapturous descriptions of the delights of "Christian marriage" as seem rather to have scandalized than edified his auditors; while the net profits of the last of the much-denounced orgies of whirling and folly in the vast enclosure of the Rue Lepelletier amounted to 25,000 francs.

That other popular favorite, Thêrésa, of the Alcazar, is preparing to rejoice the ears of her admirers by a return to the scene of her triumphs. The affection of the throat from which she was said to be suffering has subsided, or, according to another version, was merely a pretext to enable her to rest her voice in view of her engagement for the period of the Exhibition, during which the coffee-house diva will receive eight hundred francs per night. In acknowledgment of the chapter in M. Louis Veuillot's late book, of which she is the subject, Thérésa will signalize her reappearance not by Rogomme, not by La Pieuvre, not even by L'Etrangleuse, but by an entirely new ditty called Les Odeurs de Paris, composed for the express purpose of giving "tit" for the "tat" of the pious sledge-hammerer. The persistent preference of the usually fickle public of Paris for Thérésa and her songs, so excessively irritating to all who stand up for classicality and "respectability," is shared by many who, in the judgment of the latter, "ought to know better;" and, among others, by La Patti, who is one of Thérésa's most enthusiastic admirers, and is frequently to be seen in her box at the Alcazar, braving the clouds of tobacco smoke which fill it, and applauding with might and main the extraordinary ballads which Thérésa has brought into vogue, and which, whatever may be thought of them from a moral and philosophic point of view, and as a "sign of the times," are amazingly clever in their own low way. Which profound remark reminds me that the numerous company of scribblers belonging to the lighter divisions of the literary army are just now excessively indignant with the Academy, which, having to elect a new member, is said to be intending to name a respectable nonentity, M. Duvergier (de la Hauranne), author of an unreadable history, to the vâcant arm-chair, and with the Academy's "perpetual secretary," M. Cousin, who, when sounded in regard to the candidature of Jules Janin, "the prince of feuilletonistes," whom the writers of gossip, criticism, and fiction have long desired to see in the Academy as their "representative man," contemptuously replied, "Jules Janin! c'est de la basse litérature."

The culinary department is decidedly looking up in this capital of the universe. Baron Brisse's "Three Hundred and Sixty-five Dinners" is having a large and rapid sale; and that gentleman, with Alexander Dumas, Dr. Véron, the well-known editor of the Constitutionnel, Gouffé, considered to be the greatest living repository of "the traditions of the French cuisine," and eight other equally distinguished gourmets, have enrolled themselves into a club for the purpose of enjoying, once a week, the most exquisitely perfect dinner which the present gastronomic conditions of existence render possible. These worthies, each of whom contributes a minimum of 40 fr. to each repast, have just had their first collective feast. On this occasion sion the dinner was ordered and its cooking superintended by Gouffé, who was attired in the traditional costume of the French head-cook, all the other guests being dressed as kitchen boys. The members appear to regard this dinner as a sort of foretaste of the joys of a higher sphere, and have signed and published a declaration stating it to be their firm belief that no other cook of our day could have "created" a repast so every way perfect. The exalted authorities in question have, moreover, given it as their decided opinion that the enormous results of cramming just seen at the great annual poultry exhibition of the Champs Elysées, and over which an unenlightened public has been going into raptures, are mere monstrosities, overgrown masses of fat and oil, and that those who have paid a hundred francs for the great turkeys, half that sum for geese resembling large square pillows, and proportional sums for the fat and bloated fowls and pigeons, have shown an utter ignorance of what constitutes the true merits of poultry, and have contributed to the demoralization of the public taste.

LETTER FROM CRETE.—THE ARKADI TRAGEDY.

CANEA, CRETE, Dec. 11, 1866.

OF all the sad stories of the Greek struggle for independence, none is so completely tragic as that of Arkadi. It is three weeks since the affair, and we scarcely know the whole truth now ; but history rarely gets that, and we must, in all probability, be content with what we now know.

On the nineteenth of last month, Mustapha Pasha marched out of Retimo with 12,000 men, mostly regular Egyptian and Turkish troops, to attack the fortified convent of Arkadi, which was the headquarters of the insurrection in the district of Retimo, and a depot of gunpowder and provisions as well as the refuge of the inhabitants of the villages of the surrounding plains, whenever Turkish invasion menaced them. The head of the convent, a true fighting priest of the kind developed largely by the conditions of Cretan life, hearing that an attack was intended, and confident in the strength of the convent to resist, sent out for reinforcements, walled up the gates, and notified Coromos, the Greek commander of volunteers in that district. The chief of the neighboring district of Mylopotamo sent a reinforcement of about 30 men. Coromos was too far away to get there in time ; and on the 19th, in the night, the army of Mustapha suddenly enveloped the convent, cutting off all retreat. Two messengers were let over the walls, however, one of whom succeeded in penetrating the lines of the Turkish army and carried out the news ; the other was taken prisoner and killed. There were then in the walls of Arkadi about 960 souls, of whom a little above 300 were fighting men, the rest the women and children of the plain. Sixteen volunteers from Greece were included in the garrison, which, beside these, was composed of the 30 of Mylopotamo and the husbands and fathers of the women and children there, the personnel of the convent, and a few priests from convents in the adjoining districts. On the morning of the 20th they were summoned to surrender, and refused, upon which the attack began. The Turkish artillery, being small mountain guns, were advanced very near the wall opposite the great gateway, a magnificent specimen of Venetian military architecture, three hundred years old, and so extremely strong that it was found, after several hours, that their pieces would make no serious impression on it. The Pasha then sent to Retimo for heavier pieces and mortars, with reinforcements, which were sent him to the number of about 4,000 men. All the Cretan Mussulmans of the district and city were forced into the service if they did not volunteer. The heavy guns were advanced as near the gate as the deadly and incessant fire of the Christians permitted, and, after about 1,200 rounds of shot, the gate was breached and an assault ordered. It was received with such a hail of bullets that the troops recoiled out of its range ; another and another were ordered, and met in the same way, their bodies being piled several deep in the breach and on the ground in front of it. Barrels of powder, with lighted matches, were thrown down from the walls with deadly effect. A stone mill, which flanked the gate, was garrisoned by a party of Cretans—some say 10, others 30—who kept up an annihilating fire on the column, and the artillery was finally turned on it, and brought it down in ruins, burying all of its defenders but one, who, by the accounts of the Turkish officers, kept up his fire over two hours from the dêbris, until he was killed by a shell. Albanians, native Mussulmans, and regular troops alike recoiled from the fire the garrison kept up, until, finally, a battalion of Egyptians were driven in at the points of a file of bayonets pitilessly used on those who turned, and the breach was entered. The Christians then withdrew to the cells and chambers which surrounded the court, and kept up a fire of the same determined and deadly character on the masses of troops who poured in, for six hours. The Turks were obliged to bring their artillery into the court and batter in the cells, each of which was defended to the death of its garrison. Twenty-eight men in the great refectory defied all the attacks made on them. The Hegemenosos (head of the convent), seeing resistance hopeless and capture inevitable, blew out his brains ; several of the priests gave each other a farewell kiss and stabbed each other. In the great room of the Hegemenosos were gathered many of the families, with most of what remained of the defenders. Underneath the room was the principal magazine, and when the defence became no longer possible, a pistol was fired into the powder and all together finished their resistance and suffering. The refectory held out until all the ammunition of the Christians there was exhausted, when they surrendered on the oath of the Turks to spare their lives. They were all beheaded as soon as surrendered. Six men in another cell shared the same fate. Men, women, and children were massacred without mercy ; only thirty-three men and sixty-one women and children reached Retimo out of the nine hundred and sixty-six who were there. Others left Arkadi in the train, but, wounded, sick, faint, they were pitilessly killed when they could walk no further with the troops. One of the survivors says that he saw a woman, holding her infant in her arms, draw up to the wall as a Turk passed her, as if to get out of his way. He struck off her head and that of the babe as she stood with one blow of his sabre, and the body remained poised some minutes before death assumed all his rights. Many women threw themselves, with their children, into the flames, that now were raging all round the enclosure—the church, the chapels, the stables, and, in short, everything that contained combustibles being fired ; and three days after the attack commenced, the army set out on its return. Its losses, from the admission of Turkish and Egyptian officers and the evidence of the surviving Christians, as well as those who saw the hopeless combat from the hills and came down after the army had gone away, could not have been less than three thousand killed and wounded. The care of the latter and the losses suffered obliged the Pasha to return to Retimo, though Coromos was in sight on the near heights when the affair was over.

WILL THE MAJORITY RULE ?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION :

We have but little taste for any kind of politics in our State now, and this is the case throughout the South. Our ancestors led us into what has proved to be a frightful mistake, by declaring that all government derives its just power from the consent of the governed ; while, in truth, the majority claims to rule and does rule.

Your article on the "Lesson of the Crisis" attracts my attention for the reason that it is the first open declaration I have read that the majority shall rule, and that "constitutional forms will count for very little," etc., etc.

It is to be regretted that the Constitutional Amendment should be the means to the end of any further agitation, and it is more to be regretted that such a condition should be attached to the amendment as precludes an acceptance by the South. That prostrate section does not refuse the operation of the amendment when passed, if that shall be considered the proper adjustment of the difficulty ; it only begs that it shall not be its own executioner.

This is all. The South fully realizes that her sceptre has departed for ever, that her power is broken, and that, if restored to-morrow, she must, for this generation at least, wear her sackcloth and ashes in humble but, in the light of her teaching, honest poverty. For this generation, did I say?—yea, for ever; for in thirty years the great North will so completely overshadow the sparsely populated South as that the latter will be only as an election district. Why, then, trample on the crippled body? The sleeveless arm cannot strike, and would not if it could.

Is there not some middle ground upon which the rising generation of the South can take their place for the Union, or are the hot passions and teachings of 1860–65 to be perpetuated?

I have nothing further to say than that, if the minority are not to be considered at all, they should have at least their humble petition granted: that condition of peace and quiet which will at least aid them in restoring their own homesteads and rebuilding their waste places.

Will you do me the favor to give this a place in your paper, and oblige

A South Carolinian.

P.S.—Governor Orr and Senator Perry belong to that miserable, disgusting Democratic party, the cause of all our troubles. Their elevation is accidental, and grew out of the confused condition of affairs in 1865. Senator Campbell, recently elected for a six years' term, by an almost unprecedented vote, declared before his election that he had had enough of that party (see his published letter), etc.

He represents a large class in South Carolina who want new friends; but it seems we are to be for ever cut off by the heat of passion now ruling the North.

The work has received the most favorable notices from the leading English journals, and has already passed through five editions in England. The vast amount of fresh and authentic materials which the author has brought to bear on the periods of which he writes, gives his work an interest and value beyond any previous history of the same events.

Office of The Nation, 130 Nassau St., N. Y.,
December 15, 1866.

The Nation newspaper, now entering upon its Fourth Volume, was established as an essay towards creating a higher standard of public discussion and literary criticism than had been common, especially in the daily press, and while maintaining the fundamental principles of our republicanism, to be independent of parties and sects of whatever name. That it has been successful in this design is proved by the abundant and almost enthusiastic testimony of the most competent judges, and by the rank which it assumed and has held nearly from the start.

If the aim of its proprietors were self-gratulation, they might be content with this; but they desire to exercise a wider influence not only on the people at large, but especially upon the young, and, as auxiliary in both cases, upon those whose profession is teaching—in the school-house, the pulpit, at the bar, in the legislature. They have accordingly determined to offer an inducement to these classes especially, but not exclusively, to read The Nation themselves and to procure subscribers for it.

One week after the first day of July, 1867, they will pay a premium of

to the person who shall, between the present time and the date above mentioned, have forwarded to this office the largest number of new subscriptions exceeding one hundred;

Provided, that each subscription shall be for a full year (beginning with any number); and that there shall be at least TWENTY competitors for the premium.

If there be fewer than twenty competitors, but at least ten,

will be awarded to the most successful.

In case of a tie, the order of time of receipt shall decide; and nothing sent after June 30, 1867, or received after July 7, will be allowed in the decision.

☞ A commission of fifty cents, on account, will be allowed for each subscriber as forwarded, to be retained by the person sending the name and subscription price; and the first ten subscribers will entitle the canvasser to a copy of The Nation for one year, besides.

The attention of law, medical, and theological students in particular is called to this opportunity, which adds to positive reward for exertion the chance of a very considerable accession to their resources.

INSTRUCTIONS.

Every competitor should announce his intention with the first subscription forwarded, and should number each subsequent sending.

For $4 50, a receipt in full ($5) will be sent from this office directly to the person indicated.

Write legibly all parts of the address.

The address of the person awarded the premium will be promptly forwarded to each competitor.

The Week.

BEYOND the failure of Mr. Stevens's bill, nothing important with regard to reconstruction has occurred during the week, and the attention of Congress has been concentrated on the tariff. There have been nineteen new tariffs within the last forty years, and of these we have had eleven within the last five years. Nothing but the extraordinary energy of the people and richness of the soil has prevented these changes from proving ruinous. No other country could possibly have stood them. The tariffs of the last five years have steadily risen until, if the present one passes, we shall have an average of about seventy per cent. on all foreign imports. Now, the extreme protectionists—the prohibitionists—who would destroy all foreign trade, are an exceedingly small and not very influential section of the community. So, also, are the extreme free-traders, who would raise the revenue by internal taxation only, if that were possible. Those who would even raise it in the English way, by duties on a very small number of articles, are few in number. The great body of the people are perfectly willing that the greater portion of the revenue should be raised by customs duties under a moderate tariff, so distributed as clearly to give the native producer an advantage over, or at all events put him on an equality with, the foreign one. But the tariff of 1864 satisfied all these moderate protectionists. Since then the controversy before Congress has not been between free trade and protection, but between an importunate and unscrupulous lobby and the community at large; and the facility with which Congressmen are manipulated by the lobby is, in our minds, one of the signs that the Republican party is forgetting what are the conditions of long retention of power in a free country. No man of ordinary intelligence will venture to say that he believes the tariff which the Senate has been passing will, if enacted, last over a year; that it will not be found intolerable, incomprehensible, onerous, incapable of execution, promotive of fraud and smuggling, and that a desperate and successful attempt will not be made next session to modify it. Its promoters, too, seem to be losing the little sense they ever had, and their organ, the Tribune, last week displayed its contempt for the popular intelligence and the spirit of the age by holding up for our admiration and imitation the barbarous legislation of mediæval England.

MR. STEVENS suffered another defeat in the House on Monday in the reference of his scheme of reconstruction to the joint committee on that subject. This was certainly a proper disposition of the bill; yet we trust that the committee will not understand this reference as implying that they are expected to smother the project entirely. The central idea of the bill—reorganization of the Southern States as States by universal suffrage—is the only sound proposition before the country. It is intolerable that the South should drag or be dragged along for years under the present system of no-government prevailing there. It ought to be reorganized upon a constitutional basis, and that immediately.

WE may say that we have information which leads us to believe that while no decisive steps will be taken toward the impeachment of the President during the present session of Congress, it yet is the settled purpose of the majority to impeach him at the opening of the next session, and probably to insist upon his suspension from office during his trial. Mr. Wade, whose name has found a place in almost all the reports of this sort which have been put in circulation, is said to be the senator fixed upon for President of the Senate after the 4th of March, with a view to this contingency, which will undoubtedly require the presence in that position of a man of iron nerve.

THE Colorado bill has been vetoed, as every one expected. Some of the reasons assigned by Mr. Johnson are very strong against the admission of the new State; but nobody supposes that his real reasons are those which he sets forth. Nor will the reasons assigned by Congressional speakers for overriding his veto be those which really actuate them. The real motive on either side is a desire to increase or prevent the increase of the majority in the Senate. We do not think there is sufficient population in Colorado to make its admission desirable; but we do not know that the small States have ever done much harm, though it is easy to conceive of grave mischief to result from the increase of such small constituencies.

SENATOR GRIMES, of Iowa, who makes no pretensions to the name of an orator, made a speech in the Senate the other day which achieved a success not often attained by the professional orators of Congress; it actually seems to have shaken the opinions of some other senators. He showed by conclusive figures that the tariff bill before the Senate was not framed with any attention to the wants of the revenue; and that, by an ingenious and deceptive arrangement of its details, it was made to levy upon many articles of prime necessity duties of 100 to 250 per cent. ad valorem, which would never be sanctioned by the country if fairly placed before it. He dissected the little scheme by which the farmers were to be persuaded to assent to an enormous increase in the prices of everything which they consume, in consideration of a duty upon a single article which is raised by farmers; an arrangement which will cost the farmers, as a class, three times as much as they can make out of it. We are glad that a senator representing the original Republicans of 1854, and thoroughly in sympathy with the radical sentiment of the North, has taken so bold a stand on this question, which must be fought out within the lines of the Republican party. The grave rebuke administered to Mr. Grimes by the Tribune for the violence of his language is worth reading by everybody as a specimen of the way in which the pot can be outraged by the blackness of the kettle.

THERE are few incidents in diplomatic history more thoroughly disgraceful than Mr. Seward's correspondence with Mr. Motley, published yesterday morning. A cackling, and evidently vulgar busybody, whom Providence has afflicted with money enough to enable him to travel in Europe, has thought proper to forward a dish of worthless—no doubt in most cases lying—gossip about the opinions and conversation of American ministers in Europe, and in doing so charges Mr. Motley with using language about his own country and his own Government such as probably rarely is heard except from an English bagman in "the thread and needle line," and which, if true, could only have been revealed by Mr. Seward's informant through a gross breach of confidence. This wretched rubbish, which, considering who Mr. Motley is and what his antecedents are, Mr. Seward should hardly have stooped to light his cigar with, he makes the object of a grave and most insulting diplomatic despatch, which we hope, for the credit of the country, his successor will remove from the archives of the department. What makes the thing all the more discreditable is, that this same Mr. Seward published last summer, with great gusto, a piece of indecent abuse of Congress from another United States minister, and appears to have seen no impropriety in it, and his friends are now begging Congress to continue to pay the writer's salary. We have all along opposed impeachment, but if every official of the Government is to be converted into the creature of Messrs. Johnson and Seward, even the most moderate men will soon be reconciled to any measure, however desperate, which promises to relieve us of the odious burden of their administration.

General Thomas is neither a "Radical" nor a "Nigger-worshipper," and if there are half a dozen Americans in public life whose characters stand better before the country than his, we do not know who they are. He is in command, and has long been in command, of the military district which includes Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia. Moreover, he is a man of deliberation. In his examination before the Congressional Committee, which has just been investigating the facts of the well-known South Carolina murders, murders of white soldiers in Anderson and of freedmen who were burnt in the jail at Kingstree, General Thomas testifies that in his district there is no justice and no prospect of justice for the blacks before the courts. "A supervisory military power" is, in his opinion, necessary throughout all the States mentioned above. We have no reports whether or not General Thomas's opinion in regard to giving the negro the ballot was requested, but have no doubt as to what it would be. He would want a guard of United States troops at every polling-booth on every election day, and it would be a bold man who should say that this measure would not be a necessary one. Meantime, if Republicans like Mr. Greeley, who think universal suffrage a complete panacea for our political ills, find in General Thomas a disbeliever in their doctrine, so also do Republicans like Mr. Bingham, who regard the Constitutional Amendment as a sure cure. Mr. Julian or Mr. Stevens, however, would find themselves quite at home in General Thomas's company, and it is likely enough that we may yet see a working majority of the Republican party fixing upon Mr. Greeley's scheme for the future, and General Thomas's for the interval between now and then.

The Maryland Democrats are mercilessly using their victory in the late election. A bill has been passed enfranchising the formerly disfranchised rebel soldiers; the city government of Baltimore has been removed and a new election is ordered for Wednesday next; Judge Bond's jurisdiction is to be very considerably curtailed, and bills to effect this purpose are already passing; the bill which orders the holding of a constitutional convention bears hard on the liberal and loyal counties, and is unblushingly partial to the old slaveholding strongholds—Washington County, for instance, which is Republican in politics, whose population is thirty thousand, and whose taxes amount to $43,508 89, is allowed six delegates, but Charles, Calvert, Caroline, and St. Mary's Counties, which, in the aggregate, are inferior to Washington County in wealth, white population, and amount of taxes paid, are to have thirteen delegates. Until these little matters were settled, the Democrats kept the Johnson men hard at work and would pay out nothing. Governor Swann must have suffered agonies for several days. To have performed such services as he did is misery enough, but to have performed them and fail of the reward, would be too severe a punishment to be inflicted on an imaginative and reflective person. At last, however, he was made United States Senator.

Mr. H. Willis writes us a furious letter "stopping his paper" because we do not agree with him as to the expediency of impeaching Mr. Johnson. He says "he has no patience, nor will he take a paper that will defend so infamous a traitor as he is, a perfect low, mean blackguard at best;" and he invites us, if we or Mr. Johnson think Mr. Willis is severe in his denunciations, "to cast the odium on Mr. Johnson's own miserable, guilty soul, for giving him (Mr. Willis) an opportunity to thus truthfully cast it home"—a job which we respectfully decline. Finally, he cries, "Away with such limber-back, weak-kneed advisers as H. Greeley and The Nation, and others of like mushroom journalists!" We have considered this argument attentively, and cannot say we are convinced; but Mr. Willis ought to have forwarded his opinions to this office week by week, and then we might possibly have kept in the right track by "writing them up," as the reporters say.

The application of the artists for the imposition of a duty on cheap foreign pictures has, as we anticipated, created a great stir amongst the small fry of native novelists, historians, and poets, and they are sending on a powerful lobby to get a duty clapped on foreign literature, not on the paper and binding—the publishers are looking after that—but on the thought. They say that, with proper protection, they are confident they can before long furnish as good histories of any period or country, ancient or modern, and as good fictions, sonnets, epics, madrigals, and even conundrums, as any foreign authors—they care not who they may be—and they ask Congress to stop Tennyson, Swinburne, Mommsen, Merivale, Grote, George Eliot, and Reade, and others, from taking the bread out of their children's mouths. The free admission of the works of Shakespeare, Virgil and Dante, Spenser, Chaucer, Livy and Thucydides, and some other old masters, they say they have no objection to; but, as for the herd of their modern imitators who are now corrupting the taste and morals of the American public, they want to have them rigidly excluded.

If the managers of the Cooper Union lottery or Soldiers' Home lottery were honest in every detail of the drawing of numbers, some of their patrons must be excessively stupid good people. The chief manager of the drawing, having been asked by the reporters for the names of the most fortunate ones, made the answer that they could not be furnished to the press, as many holders of tickets "had conscientious scruples about letting their names be known." It is no wonder that a community which holds a great number of blanks should imagine it smells something like swindling in such an excuse for secresy as this; but we dare say it was offered in good faith. It hints a truth in regard to these lottery schemes which is well worth considering. The two great enterprises of the kind that have recently been carried through have had for their patrons thousands on thousands of respectable people, who would never have thought of gambling if that most unprofitable and at the same time most fascinating of all vices had not presented itself in a guise of such respectability. Not unlikely, many men who would never have thought of buying a Ben. Wood lottery policy, and would have shrunk with horror from a faro-table, have, by means of these "national" schemes, which have broken down the barriers of traditional hatred of gaming, got a taste of gambling which may eventually prove ruinous. The evil is a growing one, and certainly more stringent legislation is requisite; and as the laws at present practically give to any one State leave to render nugatory the prohibitory laws of any other, we do not know why statutes punishing holders as well as sellers of tickets would not be of some advantage.

"One of the Passengers" who, on the 17th of January, rode on the half-after four o'clock train from Philadelphia, on the New Jersey Railroad, writes a severe letter to the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin about the barbarous manner in which the several car-loads of human freight were used by the railway officials. The train seems to have got about three miles out of New Brunswick, N. J., when, the road appearing impassable, it was backed to within a mile or so of the hotel. Nothing, says the passenger, prevented the backing of the train to the hotel, instead of keeping it where everybody aboard was compelled to spend fourteen hours in the cars. The conductor, it is alleged, did not so much as visit the ladies' car to give intimation of what might be expected, and there was an entire failure on the part of any one connected with the road to interest himself in the comfort of the unfortunate persons who had trusted themselves to the tender mercies of one of these corporations, which, by a pleasing fiction, are said to be chartered for the public convenience. We wish there were some hope in steady grumbling. As a remote cause, at any rate, of the legislation of the future, we intend encouraging and disseminating it in all ways possible.

New England does not raise grain enough to feed its inhabitants. Virginia does. New England has but one hog for every ten New Englanders. Virginia has for each son of the sacred soil one hog and three-fourths of another. The prosperity of New England is dependent upon the extent of the Yankee commerce and manufactures. The extent of the Yankee commerce and manufactures was formerly great, because the South employed the New England shipping and kept the New England mills going. But New England with fanatic cruelty has destroyed slavery, and Virginia and the rest of the South will begin manufacturing for the Southern people. What can be clearer than that the grass will by-and-by spring up in the streets of Lowell; that Boston will soon resemble Tyre, Nineveh, Troy, Tadmor in the Wilderness, Charleston, South Carolina, and other unhappy marts once mighty but now dwelling-places of foxes? The Richmond Enquirer, which seems not in the least moved by the mournful truth, is our authority for these facts and deductions.

An ocean despatch from St. Petersburg asserts that the American portion of the Russo-American telegraph has been completed to Behring's Straits. We sincerely trust the work has received this extension, and that in autumn, as is now predicted, the line will be entirely finished. But it seems a little extraordinary that the present news has not reached us via San Francisco before it could make its way to the Amoor, thence to the Baltic, and so round to this city, and it may, therefore, perhaps be viewed as premature.

A correspondence has just taken place between H. R. H. Prince Alfred and Mr. James Gordon Bennett, Jr., which is of rather an amusing character; but, as it is held that the interesting sentiments which it conveys "tend to show the feeling of England towards the United States," we suppose not much is to be said about it. Mr. Bennett offers his yacht to the Prince as a gift from one gallant young yachtsman to another, and the Prince, with abundant courtesy, declines so costly a gift. We must say, however, that Mr. Bennett puts it rather strong when he asserts that the reception of himself and friends will always be remembered "with the warmest gratitude in the United States." Perhaps, though, he means after himself and Mr. Jerome and the other gentleman get back to this country. The race with the Viking, we hope, is not to be broken off by reason of this little affair.

In the season of storms our European intelligence by the cable is apt, as this last week, to come to us like the thawed tune from Munchausen's horn. What the restored land telegraph has at length transmitted to us has been symptomatic, rather than positive news. Prussia and the North German Confederation are evidently fast consolidating as Prussia wishes. The Elbe Duchies have been formally annexed, and the German Diet is to have its first meeting on the 24th proximo. The South Germans are said to be coquetting for a military union with the Confederation. Austria is showing her uneasiness by increasing her forces in Galicia and on the borders of Russia and Turkey. Telegrams from Paris and London represent great dissatisfaction in France with the new idées Napoléonniennes, reforms though they professed to be, and concessions undoubtedly were. As for Crete, the insurrection is suppressed for the hundredth time, but there are rumors of a triple intervention by the leading powers of the Continent; and it is certain that foreign war-vessels, American included, are removing non-combatants from the desolated island.

THE FREEDMEN.

Mr. J. W. Alvord, the general superintendent of schools for the Bureau, has just made his monthly report for November, in which are some items of interest concerning the number of schools, teachers, and pupils. There are 998 day and 358 Sabbath-schools officially reported, and 140 day and 96 Sabbath-schools not regularly reported. The number of teachers is 1,868, of whom 981 are colored; of pupils who attend only one school, viz., either day or Sabbath, 94,121. 302 schools are sustained wholly by freed people, and 244 in part. 260 school buildings are also owned by them. 10,419 pupils paid $10,109 30 for tuition during the month, out of $36,638 10, the total expense of the schools during the month.

Mr. Alvord closes his report with certain suggestions to the Commissioner relative to his department:

> 1st. He recommends strongly the employment of colored teachers. They can penetrate further than whites, and are tolerated better by the planters themselves. Gen. Armstrong, at Fortress Monroe, says he could secure the employment, with suitable pay, of fifty such teachers in South-Eastern Virginia.
> 2d. The proposals of the Southern people, which are coming in, to sustain these schools, should be cordially met. "Let the motive be what it will, under the superintendency of the Bureau, any experiment they may choose to make must be productive of good."
> He also recommends the encouragement of the appointment of Southern whites as teachers, as tending to disarm prejudice; the establishment of normal schools for the preparation of teachers of either color; and the teaching of adults as well as of the young.

—We said, in comparing Gen. Howard's estimated census of the Southern blacks with that of 1860, that the figure of half a million repressed or destroyed by the war "would undoubtedly be swelled from the statistics of Alabama and Kentucky." An official census has just been concluded in the former State, and it appears that there were 442,445 blacks at the close of 1866, against 438,770 in 1860. As the natural increase in six years would have been at least 10 per cent. (which is the rate we used in our former calculation), we should have had in Alabama at this time 482,647 persons of African descent—a charge upon the rebellion and its consequences of about 40,000 souls, dispersed or lost, but by all odds lost rather. The Tribune, it seems to us, has failed to appreciate this fact.

—Very serious troubles, fomented, it is said, by the colored lawyer who failed to get admitted to the Georgia bar, arose lately on the "Delta plantation" of Mrs. Cheves, on one of the Sea Islands on the Carolina coast. The negroes refused to contract with the new lessee, Capt. Barnwell, an ex-Confederate, who summoned the military to make them give place to willing laborers. But the small force sent was utterly inadequate to overawe the disorderly, who even assumed a semi-military attitude. Fortunately, the humanity of the officers deterred them from precipitating bloodshed, and a special visit from Gen. Tillson put the affair in the right way for settlement. Twenty acres of land on St. Helena had been offered the malcontents before his arrival. The occurrence is regrettable enough, but it flows, not unnaturally, from the conflicting orders and policies of the Government with regard to the confiscated property of the Sea Islands.

—The shocking murder of a negro coachman by Dr. Watson, of Lexington, Va., which was undergoing military examination when the President, conspiring with the Supreme Court, put an end to the trial, has received new light from a personal friend of the murderer, who writes to the Herald that the doctor refused to accept pecuniary or other equitable satisfaction from the coachman (who was merely obeying orders when the accident occurred), but sought him in the field where he was sowing wheat, and attacked him. The writer (soi-disant "Justice") adds:

> "Dr. Watson is one of the most respectable gentlemen in the county and one of the most popular. He is a man of kind and amiable manners, and his conduct towards the blacks since their freedom has been more than ordinarily good. He is near-sighted, and the plea advanced in his behalf is that by firing his pistol he intended to frighten Medley, and hit him only by chance. I believe that no one regrets the painful circumstance of Medley's death more than he does."

—The Maryland Legislature has repealed the distinction of the State codes between black and white offenders. This prevents Judge Magruder from selling more negroes into slavery, but it ought not to shield him from the penalty of violating the Civil Rights Act.

LITERARY.

Among recent American announcements of new books are "Good English, or Popular Errors in Philology," by Edward S. Gould, to be published by W. J. Widdleton. Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son announce a new book by Bayard Taylor, "Colorado, or a Summer Trip," being his letters to the New York Tribune last summer; "Natural Theology," Lowell lectures by Prof. P. A. Chadbourne, of Williams College; and a series of Irving's works in 16mo size, called "Railway Classics." Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will soon publish "An Enquiry into the State of Political Parties in the United States," taken from the papers of the late President Martin Van Buren. Messrs. Ticknor & Fields are about to issue the "Diamond Edition" of Dickens's works, each novel to be complete in one small volume. "The Pickwick Papers" is already published, and is quite handsome in appearance. As for the pictures, they seem not so much attempts at a fresh illustration of the text as echoes more or less faint of Cruikshank and Browne.

—Ex-Governor Andrew, Mr. John G. Palfrey, and some fifty others have published a letter to Gen. William Schouler, the late adjutant-general of Massachusetts, requesting him to write a history of the services of that State in the recent rebellion, deeming that his knowledge of the various sources of information and his official labors render him eminently competent for the task. Gen. Schouler replies that it has long been his intention to write such a work, and that he has already begun to make preparations for it. He hopes to be able to complete the work in a reasonable time, and says that as all the official correspondence of the commonwealth has been carefully preserved, he shall be at no loss for material. Gen. Schouler was at one time editor of the Boston Atlas.

—At a recent meeting of the Board of Overseers of Harvard College the Committee on the Library recommended that the library should be weeded out and its worthless books disposed of, and that greater facilities should be given the public for its use. They rightly held that the use of a library was to diffuse and not shut up knowledge, and therefore demanded a convenient reading-room and the opening of the library on every day of the year except Sundays and public holidays. The committee also thought that the library should have an annual income of at least $10,000; and that the first and chief necessity was a new library building. The friends of the college will, therefore, be called on to subscribe for two funds of $150,000 each, one to defray the expense of a new building and the other to furnish an income for the purchase of books.

—The report of Mr. A. R. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, tells us some interesting facts with regard to the state of the National Library on Dec. 1, 1866. One wing of the new library extension has been completed, measuring ninety-five feet by thirty, and the other wing will soon be finished. The total length of shelving at command in the library is now 26,148 feet, or nearly five miles, affording space for about 210,000 volumes. The whole library is now considered perfectly fire-proof. During the past year the library received 7,251 volumes and about 600 pamphlets; of the books 5,603 volumes were gained by purchase; 645, chiefly official documents, by gift; 167 by exchange, and only 836 by the operation of the copyright law. The library now contains 99,650 volumes, exclusive of the 40,000 volumes, more or less, of the Smithsonian Institute, which are to be incorporated with it as a special deposit. The librarian recommends a more stringent provision in the copyright law, since few owners of copyrights, excepting the leading publishing houses, comply with its provisions by sending a copy of the work to the library without notice.

—During the last year the "Historical Magazine" has come into new hands, and has been enlarged and improved by the present editor, Mr. Henry B. Dawson. It is now a valuable repository of many original papers reprinted for the first time, and of articles and notes relating to disputed points in the history of this country that find no place so proper elsewhere. The December number contains among other things a paper on the political relations of the early Methodist Church during the American Revolution; a defence of General Sullivan from Mr. Bancroft's strictures, by Mr. Thos. C. Amory, of Boston; some interesting and amusing correspondence relative to the reputation of President Reed, of Pennsylvania, and a reply by Mr. George H. Moore to the criticisms of a Boston paper on his "Notes on the History of Slavery in Massachusetts." In the January number, which will appear together with that for February about the middle of February, will be printed the paper on Governor Andros which Mr. Brodhead recently read before the New York Historical Society. The March and April numbers will appear together in March, after which the magazine will be published at the usual times.

—English papers announce the death of Mr. Alexander Smith, a poet who first appeared to the world in a volume of spasmodic poetry called "A Life Drama," in 1853. Later, he published "City Poems" and "Edwin of Deira." His poetical reputation having faded, he began to write in prose, first essays for various magazines and afterwards "Dreamthorpe," "A Summer in Skye," and a novel of some excellence which was published about a year ago, "Alfred Hagart's Household." He was appointed secretary of the University of Edinburgh in 1854. He died on January 5, at the age of 36, leaving a wife and a large family of children.

—A poetical translation of Ovid's "Fasti" into the heroic metre has just appeared in England, by Mr. John Benson Rose, who, not long ago, published a poetical version of the "Metamorphoses." A calendar is not a particularly interesting subject, and even by Ovid is a little wearisome. It is not to be wondered at, then, that there is no respectable translation of it into English, save the prose version in Bohn's "Classical Library." Mr. Rose's translation is, in many respects, very good, and if more care had been bestowed on correcting and polishing it, it would be hard to equal. One of his great faults is his constant use of the most daring Latinisms, so that in many cases verses are transferred rather than translated. Locks are "concussed," men's steps "titubate," "Bellice Mars" is translated "O Mars bellicé," which we might suppose was for the rhyme's sake, were Mr. Rose careful of it, and did we not have also "Germanicé" and "Ah! Romulé" not at the ends of lines. "Romanæ spatium est urbis et orbis idem." "The orb is 'urbs Romana' and our home," is very awkward. A question can easily be raised, too, as to the suitability of the metre.

—From one of the numbers of the Russian Book Intelligencer for 1866 we learn that in 1863 there were published in Russia 1,652 volumes and 1,836 in the next year. St. Petersburg heads the list with 951, and 1,097 volumes in the two years. Moscow comes next with 459 in the first year and 432 in the second; the provincial cities have smaller numbers, and many such as Irkutsk, Astrakhan, and Archangel have only two or three apiece. In 1863 there was published one book at Kiakhta, the furthest trading town on the Chinese frontier. In St. Petersburg are issued 143 periodicals, in Moscow 31, and 158 in the rest of the empire. The majority of the provincial newspapers are mere organs for local intelligence, and entirely devoid of general interest. The periodicals of St. Petersburg and Moscow are very different in character. Beside the newspapers and the Government journals, there are five or six literary monthlies, each large and containing more matter than the "North American Review."

—There has recently been published in the "Hildburghauser Bibliothek ausländischer Classiker" a translation into German of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" by Prof. Wilhelm Hertzberg. It is in the metre of the original, and of itself affords a valuable commentary on the text. But there are also added a biographical and literary introduction, and numerous notes and comments, which greatly enhance the merit of the work as a contribution to the literature of Chaucer. Prof. Hertzberg has before this been a successful translator, his versions of Ovid and Plautus being well known. In 1853, he published a German translation of Tennyson's poems, and in 1864 one of Scott's "Lord of the Isles."

—The publishers of Müller and Zarncke's "Wörterbuch der deutschen Sprache in den Mittelaltern" announce that it is now finished after a labor of twelve years. The preparation of Grimm's Dictionary has received a new impulse, and there is a prospect that the present generation will see the concluding numbers. Single copies of Grimm's "Sagen," published in 1816, and the earliest notable work of the never-to-be-forgotten brothers, have commanded over twenty thalers. After having been out of print over forty years, the Saga have been reissued in one volume at two thalers. Koberstein's "Geschichte der deutschen Literatur" is at last completed. Twenty long years have been given to this fourth edition. It is especially full in its history of the literature of the last century. Three-fourths of the entire work treats of the period between 1725 and 1830.

Immigration of Plants.—Whenever a new country is settled, the character and quality of the incoming settlers vary in accordance with a tolerably definite law of progression. The settlement of Rome, of Venice, and of Virginia all illustrate the working of this law; the building up of the towns on the banks of the Mississippi, the peopling of California, and of the metalliferous territories of the Rocky Mountains, are recent instances in point. At first, a generation of horse-thieves and desperadoes of every grade—men who have most emphatically left their own countries for their countries' good—rush in. These men are commonly, but unjustly, reputed worthless, even as first occupants of a wild territory. As pioneers, they are redeemed by their intense vitality; taken in mass, they can endure and live through vicissitudes and hardships such as are supported by no other human beings excepting galley-slaves. These first comers not only drive away or destroy the original native residents, but they bear the brunt of that inevitable warfare with an unfamiliar nature which is so harassing to colonists. Speculators, more or less honest and enterprising, follow quickly upon the horse-thief's steps, and these in turn make room for the commonplace farmer with his traditions of law and habits of morality. Thus the new land soon ceases to be a Vale of Gehenna for the human refuse of the world.

The United States are always cited as a remarkable instance of this admixture of all sorts of elements poured forth from other lands; to the average English essayists on America, this country is still a simple sink wherein are gathered the scum and offscourings of other nations; the American, on the contrary, likes to think of this mass of fragments as in the act of being shaken in the great kaleidoscope of nature, there to assume incessantly new forms of beauty. Meanwhile the naturalist finds in this unwonted commingling of diverse germs and atoms a new field of research, for it is not with human life alone that the new country is freshly stocked. With man come in a multitude of plants and not a few animals. As regards animals, the laws of immigration are obscure, for from the rats and mice in the first meal-bags up to the camels of the plains—from the huge elephant to the flea in the blanket—the imported animals are mostly mere parasites, hangers-on to man wherever he may be. Man purposely carries certain animals to his new home. It is quite possible that, in the course of time, house-sparrows, and even skylarks and red-breasts, may come to us from Europe, but in all cases of the importation of animals the direct, and usually the intentional, intervention of man is apparent. With plants, however, the case is different; their immigration is independent of man's volition. In the Eastern States of this country there have long been firmly established some sixty or seventy species of vile weeds, which have come over to us from Europe. A list of these weeds would include such questionable characters as the ox-eye daisy, the thistle, and the barberry bush. When shall we have the daisy proper and gorse as well? Besides the numerous representatives of pernicious classes of plants, we have a host of honest foreign grasses and clovers, and many imported flowering plants. It has been reported of late that the heather has come over to live among us, patches of it having been found wild in Massachusetts and Newfoundland.

Everywhere along the Atlantic border the indigenous plants of the country are rapidly yielding to the inroads of imported species, in the same way that the red man upon the frontier is disappearing before the advancing white. At the Natural History Society of Boston, Dr. Sprague descants upon the singular fact that the weeds which grow broadcast around the New Englander's door are all of foreign origin; the weeds of native growth being now confined almost exclusively to unimproved lands. At Philadelphia, on the other hand, Prof. Porter informs the Philosophical Society that foreign plants which were recently esteemed by botanists to be rare have already taken such complete possession of the valley of the Susquehanna that the time may soon come when a large part of the flora of that region will have an essentially foreign character. A specially noteworthy locality is mentioned by Prof. Porter as existing on a reclaimed portion of the bank of the Delaware, below the Navy Yard at Philadelphia, and within the city limits, where at least ninety species of perhaps seventy genera of plants have been discovered, belonging for the most part to the flora of the Carolinas, Florida, and other Gulf States as far west as New Mexico, and some of them being Western plants. This colony of plants is divided into two groups, growing upon the two banks of a narrow lagoon, one bank consisting of heaps of refuse dirt from the city, and the other composed of ballast thrown from vessels trading coastwise with the port. Some of these botanical waifs have been found also growing on similar accumulations thrown upon the opposite or New Jersey shore.

The ways and methods of importation by which the foreign plants arrive and the means by which they are disseminated are manifold. Botanists have remarked the growth of strange German weeds around the hovels of newly-arrived German immigrants, and many observers have noticed the introduction of plants from the dust and rubbish obtained in cleaning foreign rags and wool at paper-mills and factories. Railroads, according to Prof. Porter, appear to be one of the most active agents in the process of naturalization.

EDUCATIONAL.

The delegates of the Clarendon Press in Oxford have entered upon a school-book reformation which promises to be of service not only in England but in this country. There, as here, teachers seem to be conscious that the text-books in many branches of knowledge are unworthy of the present progress of literature and science, and especially unworthy of the most approved methods of teaching. There, we presume, as here, far too many books are simply "manufactures" made "to sell," by writers whose chief aim is a large pecuniary return.

The competitive examinations now in vogue in England, and the more recently devised "local examinations" held by the universities for the sake of testing the scholarship of those who wish to be enrolled as "associates in arts," have revealed in the clearest manner the deficiencies of the received manuals. The university authorities seem most impressed with the want of good editions of Greek and Latin classics, school histories, and simple treatises on physical science. Books illustrative of the English language are also needed.

Now, to supply this want several professors and fellows connected with the university propose to write and print practical school-books, each in his own specialty. Books prepared by other persons are also to be included in the series. Four volumes have already appeared—a chemistry for students, by A. W. Williamson, a new edition of Veitch's Greek Verbs, a treatise on heat by Balfour Stewart, of Kew, and a collection of specimens of Early English (A. D. 1250–1400), edited by R. Morris, Esq. There are also in preparation more than fifty other manuals on different topics. It is not to be expected that all these books will be equally good; but the aspect of the enterprise is most promising, and we have no doubt some of the treatises will be the best in the language.

NAPOLEON'S CÆSAR.*

The indifference with which the second volume of the Emperor Napoleon's "Life of Cæsar" has been received is in marked contrast to the expectant curiosity excited by the long-delayed publication of the first. This curiosity was speedily satisfied, and succeeded by—we will not say a feeling of disappointment, for disappointment there was none—but by a comfortable sense of satisfaction in not being disappointed, and of acquiescence at the conviction that the Emperor had very little to tell us on this subject, and it was well to know it. Naturally enough, therefore, the second volume was neither watched for nor, when it arrived, did it awake any general interest. The handsome but somewhat clumsy volume stands, no doubt, with uncut leaves on many a shelf, where it seemed a duty to place it in order to match the first.

* "Histoire de Jules César. Par S. M. I. Napoleon III." Tome Deuxième. New York: D. Appleton et Cie, Libraires-Editeurs, 443 et 445 Broadway. MDCCCLXVI. 12mo, pp. 552. "History of Julius Cæsar." Vol. II. Harper Bros. 1866.

And yet this second volume is by no means valueless or unimportant. The first and largest part of it, indeed (Book III.), has very little worth for us. It is for the most part a mere paraphrase of the "Commentaries on the Gallic War"—and a poor one at that—preceded by a tolerably good view of the condition of Gaul at the time of Cæsar's invasion—nothing to compare with what we have already in English, in Merivale, for instance—and accompanied by some minute and certainly very valuable notes on the topography of ancient Gaul, and especially of Cæsar's campaigns. These results of the extensive explorations and investigations which the Emperor has carried on are unquestionably the most considerable contribution which he makes to positive historical knowledge. It is worth while—and to a Frenchman very interesting—to have it decided whether Bièvres, Bruyères, Neufchâtel, Beaurieux, or Vieux-Laon is the modern representative of Bibrax; but to the reading public, and to scholars, too, in general, it is enough if we have it rightly placed on Kiepert's next map.

The text of this portion of the volume is incredibly meagre. It is, of course, a disadvantage to a modern historian, when treating of certain periods of antiquity, that he can hardly make anything but a paraphrase of or a commentary on some particular author. To do this with success calls for high qualities in an historian. Certain chapters of Grote, for instance, are hardly more than free translations of Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon, with a running commentary; but as commentaries they leave little to be desired, and are among the most valuable portions of his work. So, for the Gallic war, Napoleon had no choice but follow Cæsar; it is his own weakness that he follows him only blindly, almost without comment, criticism, or illustration. The motives, the internal history, the bearings of events, are all passed over; this is not a history: it is little more than an abridgment.

The second part of the volume, Book IV., is better. It contains a general history of events during the ten years of Cæsar's Gallic campaigns—beginning with his first departure for his province, and ending with the crossing of the Rubicon. It is indeed a continuation of Book II., in the first volume, which contains a similar account of the few years preceding the Gallic war, and in the same general style. These two books are much the best and most genuinely historical portions of the work, for the first Book contains only a rather poor summary of the earlier history of the city; and yet these cannot lay claim to any high historical merit. One is naturally led to compare these chapters with the two most conspicuous works—English and German—which have recently gone over the same ground, the histories of Mommsen and Merivale. We find in the French author, as we might perhaps expect, neither Mommsen's profundity, wealth of learning, and earnest eloquence, nor Merivale's easy and masterly development of political movements and situations; but neither do we find, what the eminence of the French in the department of historical literature might lead us to expect, a brilliant, graphic history. It is dull. It has indeed the French merit of système, and that is its one saving quality. It is perhaps the best accessible outline of the events of this disturbed period, fully and succinctly stated, and arranged by years. We shall not find in these pages, as in those of the other books we have mentioned, any new views, any subtle analysis of action or character, any powerful presentations of historical truths; but we shall find it easier to trace out the succession of events, and learn precisely what happened in each year, in this volume than in either of the others. Its merit is that of a chronicle.

Besides these chapters, which are the most valuable in the volume, we have some appendices containing important material, and prepared with great labor. They will be of great aid to the student in unravelling the complications of those disturbed years. Appendix A contains a harmony of the Roman dates of about twenty years (B. C. 64 to 44) with those of the Julian calendar. It is well known that the Romans before Cæsar attempted to correct the errors of their reckoning by an intercalation, once in two years, of alternately twenty-two and twenty-three days. Even with this clumsy contrivance, the dates fell so much behindhand that it was necessary for Cæsar, in reforming the calendar, to insert two intercalary months (Prior and Posterior) of sixty-seven days in all. Of course, with all this irregularity a Roman date gives only an approximation to the real time of the year—with a calendar at least sixty-seven days out of the way, and with so huge an intercalation in alternate years. This table will be, therefore, of the greatest practical service. That the dates should be absolutely exact is neither necessary nor to be expected. Mommsen, for instance, in his "Römische Chronologie," has made it at least probable that the intercalation took place not always after the Feast of Terminalia (Feb. 23), but every other time after the Feast of Regifugium (Feb. 24); the result of which would be that the intercalary months were always of equal length, 27 days; while these tables follow the commonly received opinion that it took place always after the Feast of Terminalia, by which the month of February would on the years of intercalation always be of equal length, 23 days.

Appendix B is shorter, but perhaps equally useful, containing a harmony of the hours of the Roman day and the modern reckoning for every day of the year B. C. 55, which, of course, will not be far out of the way for any year.

A reference on p. 340 (and one or two others scattered here and there) to Mommsen's "Römische Geschichte" led us, on taking up the book, to suppose that we might find here some of the results of this eminent scholar's researches, worked into a more readable form than he has himself given them. But we see no signs of this great work having been studied and digested—a task too formidable, perhaps, to demand of an emperor, and a French emperor at that; and we very much suspect the references to be thrown in for the look of the thing—the more so, as the one already mentioned is incorrectly given. The Senate, he tells us, professing to quote Mommsen, "qui gouvernait le monde, était impuissante à gouverner la ville." Now, it is not of the Senate that the "célèbre historien allemand" makes this remark; but of the "coalition" (that is, the so-called first triumvirate) in the absence of Cæsar. But apart from accidental slips like this, it seems as if the author were incompetent to appreciate and reproduce the spirit of Mommsen's work, or to draw from it any considerable inspiration for his own. Both these authors, as well as Merivale, study the career of Cæsar from the same point of view: that the monarchy came too late rather than too early; and that it was the peculiar good fortune of Rome which gave her a man of Cæsar's stamp for the founder of the empire. This identity of principle provokes still further comparison, in which the Emperor gains nothing. His treatment of the subject, in comparison with theirs, is cheap and superficial, neither calculated to impress nor to convince. The "Propos de Labienus" destroyed whatever influence his reasonings might have had by their own weight. But, leaving personal considerations of this nature aside, the unbiassed reader would find in these labored details of the corruption and violence that reigned at Rome no such vivid picture of the degeneracy of the times as is presented by the calm narration of impartial historians.

THE MAGAZINES FOR FEBRUARY.

"HARPER'S" for February is a very characteristic number, except that there is less than the usual amount of poor poetry. But it contains plenty of pictures of natural history, of travel, of politics, of jokes stale and fresh, and of those little tales of love without which "Harper's" would not be "Harper's," the whole medley being readable by the average citizen and his wife, and not absolutely unreadable by anybody. The opening paper, by Major G. W. Nichols, is illustrated, and is itself a picture of the wild life of frontiersmen, a race once commoner than now, which will follow the Indian westward, and, like the Indian, is soon to pass away. It will pass away the sooner now that slavery has perished—that social system under which, as Mr. Olmsted well remarks, all life was more or less of the frontier sort. Next after "Wild Bill" come two articles also profusely illustrated, and both of a kind that has pleased the readers of the magazine for many years. One is icthyological, and the other is a traveller's sketch of men and manners in Calcutta, the City of Palaces. For love stories we have the second part of "Old Aunt Matilda," who in the first part had a soul-lacerating misunderstanding with Nathan Armstrong, who wedded a city bride, and now this month returns to his former love to "kiss again with tears." Also, we have "My Lost Alice": "I know not why I should be so sad when I think of Alice Glendenning. It is truly no cause for sadness when one has fought a battle and gained the victory—when one has earned rest—when one has entered into life. Dare I affirm that I believe in the infinite joy of heaven and yet sit stranded on the shore of time weeping with vain human longing," and so on, all in the mournfulest manner, which it was her young man was the cause. "Old Mrs. Hunter" has in it love and the triumph of self-sacrifice. "Two Ropes" is hardly a love story; but, in its own way, it is very amusing. Mr. Carlyle, if it may be whispered, was once in the habit not only of bearing testimony against what he calls "Governess English" by precept and by his written example, but also by occasional bursts of oral English which might well make a duly proper governess stare and gasp. One can fancy his forcible expressions should the broken Carlylese of the end of "Two Ropes" ever meet his eye. It might have been written by a late London correspondent of the Tribune:

"No cock-fighting to-day for Fernando—add no inclination therefor—as you may well suppose. For a no-way-to-be-distinguished corpse, decently veiled by a heavy blanket, and a sister in so frantic case as the resuscitated Anita, did suffice to indispose for everyday disportings."

"Struggles for Life," a very pleasant talk about the animal life of our fields and woods, we take to be the work of Mr. John Burroughs. Now that Thoreau is dead, we know of no American who seemingly lives in closer intimacy with bird and beast than this agreeable writer. In this article he sets out with the assertion that "animals do not die what is termed a natural death." "Nature red in tooth and claw" might have been his text. Among the other articles, the more noticeable are a good review of Mr. Stillé's work on the Sanitary Commission, and one entitled "New York to Washington," which, we think, will be found to be one of a series which will systematically grumble at the treatment of travellers in this country. Harper's Weekly, we see, lays it down for true that constant grumbling at directors is our duty and our only resource. Our heartfelt good wishes are with the agitators. One element of success the new sect has in boundless profusion—the blood of the martyrs. The "Easy Chair," which is good-natured as usual in its talk on other topics, is very severe upon the railway depot in New Haven, the public halls there, and the halls and lecture-rooms in almost every other town in the Union.

The "Catholic World" this month is worth its price; it contains the sermon preached by John Henry Newman, on the 7th of October, 1866, the feast of the Holy Rosary of the Blessed Virgin, which is a day of prayer for the Pope. "The Pope and the Revolution" the discourse is entitled, and it contains the Roman—we had better say the Roman Catholic—view of the Italian question. Dr. Newman compares the Roman people to the Israelites, who sinned in asking Samuel for a monarchy, and attributes their disgust with the Papal government to the instigation of the devil. It is the weakest argument from this author's pen that we have ever seen, but is full of interest, both because it is his and because it is so characteristically Romanist. In several of the late numbers of the "Catholic World" we have read with pleasure some religious poetry considerably above the usual magazine level. Specimens of it, to be found in the February number, are the verses "On the Request of Herodias's Daughter" and "Pardon." In a footnote to another article, the editor states that he has received a letter from a member of the Guérin family, asking if it would be possible to interest devout souls in America in the reconstruction of the little church of Andillac, the parish church of Eugénie de Guérin.

In the "Atlantic Monthly" the article which will attract most notice is the one signed "Joseph Mazzini." It peremptorily raises the republican flag, and bitterly abuses the Italian monarchy, charging Victor Emanuel's government with shameful subserviency to the French Emperor, with not being allied to the spirit and tendencies of the age, with debauching the public virtue of Italy, and with being responsible for the reverses of the late war and for the national debt. One would suppose that republics were never wicked or foolish or unfortunate, and that the Italians never needed foreign aid, and, beginning to-morrow, could successfully carry on Mazzini's ideal government. This declaration of war shows all its author's high spirit and constitutional eagerness for reformation. It is formation, however, which Italy seems to need just now, and Mazzini has many years of fervid labor before him before he gets Italians to overthrow the kingdom.

At the end of his seventh chapter the author of "The Guardian Angel" contrives a real surprise for his readers. The story moves not very rapidly, which, in Dr. Holmes's stories, is not a fault; we go with him for what we get by the way. In this part, Byles Gridley, A.M., occupies a good deal of our attention. The old college tutor is a favorite figure with Dr. Holmes. We do not know whether other readers like it or not—and we know that an author is privileged to be a petty providence among his creatures; but to us Dr. Holmes, in enacting that character, seems even dreadfully omniscient. He anatomizes as if he was not only dissecting to get at the real structure, but as if the students on the benches were to admire the skill of the operator and he were admiring it himself.

Mr. Whipple's "Characteristics of the Elizabethan Literature" is unmistakably Mr. Whipple's, and contains with much that is not particularly fresh some very just remarks upon the genius of Christopher Marlowe, which are perhaps not very new either, but which it was very well to make, it being an impression on the minds of some who should be better informed that Marlowe's vices of style were attributable to an effeminacy of his genius instead of being the products of unregulated strength—an impression strengthened, perhaps, by what Lamb calls "the luscious smoothness" of some of his verse.

Two exceedingly pleasant essays are contributed, one by Mr. Higginson, who writes "A Drift-wood Fire," and one by Mr. Howells, whose "Forza Maggiore" is marked by the peculiar and delicate humor which is the chief among his numerous merits as a writer. "How Mr. Frye Would Have Preached It" is by Edward Everett Hale, and but for one thing is very good indeed; Mr. Frye never would have preached it so. Strange things are seen in boarding-houses, but no boarder—unless a boarder at the State's expense, as they say in Massachusetts—ever deliberately sat down and made such a confession of crime and meanness to his landlady and "the gentlemen and ladies of the house." Bishop Kip gives us "Recollections of John Vanderlyn, the Artist," a painter but very little known for a man so well worth knowing as he seems to have been. "The Standpoint of the Boarding-house" says "the kernel has its meaning, and so, too, has each of its husks, if you can fairly get at them"—a statement to which we call the attention of transcendentalists; and perhaps it would be the better for a little revision by Mr. G. Washington Moon. Professor Agassiz finds in Maine what seems to him unmistakable evidence that North America was once covered by the vast sheet of ice which figures so prominently in his science of geology. The poetry of the number is by Alice Cary, Aldrich, and Trowbridge, who have each done better than usual, and by an anonymous author, whose "Elizabeth's Chamber" is a poem of unobtrusive beauty. The remaining articles are Mr. Shanly's "Comic Journalism," more of "Katharine Morne," and the first part of "George Bedillion's Knight." If it is true that in the thing seen the seer discovers just what he himself brings; that when we say we have seen thus and thus, we confess what is behind the eye as well as report what is before it; then the "Author of Margret Howth" is not a person to be envied. "George Bedillion's Knight" is to be a powerful and, we fear, a repulsive story—a revelation of the meanness, selfishness, and vanity of some weak natures, the morbid heroism of others. We read such a story, and then turn to the men and women of our acquaintance with the feeling of one awaking from a wretched dream to the wholesome sight of the sun.

In "Hours at Home," Mr. Donald G. Mitchell, who, we believe, intends taking up the profession of landscape-gardening or landscape-architecture, treats of the laying out of grounds. Dr. Bushnell begins a series of articles, in the nature of sermons, on the "Moral Uses of Dark Things," and first discourses of "Night." Dr. Philip Schaff, who has been writing brief biographies of the early fathers of the church, has a paper on "Saint Chrysostom," and Mr. Paulding draws from his memory some readable recollections of New York when New York extended but a little way from Whitehall Street and the Battery. The article on Damascus is also readable; and altogether the February number of "Hours at Home" is the best that we have yet seen. When, however, we find such verses admitted as those which Mr. J. D. Sherwood seems to have written in his journal of travel, the doubt suggests itself if the goodness of any given number of the magazine is not in great part the effect of chance. This is how Mr. Sherwood's muse was affected by the recent battle at Kissingen:

"Guns flash and roar,
Balls, whizzing, pour
Their deadly hail
O'er hill and vale;
And rockets far
Upbursting jar
The solid ground
With wide rebound."

The "Galaxy," which was always handsome in appearance, has latterly discarded its chocolate and gold, and is now very gay. It maintains the standard of excellence which it set up for itself in the beginning, and wears a prosperous look. A "weird story," as an exchange says, which it is now publishing—"Tristan" is the name of it—seems to us the only very poor thing that it has lately had.

Of the many juvenile magazines "Our Young Folks" seems to us, who are not young folks, still considerably the best. But perhaps this is a matter in which, as in horse-trading, age is not entitled to respect.

ROBERT SEVERNE.[*]

It is frequently said that of all the learned professions the medical has given most pens to literature. But even if sermons are not literature, and if we refuse to admit polemical works into the list of "books that are books," this saying is probably false. As for legal treatises, we suppose lawyers themselves would make no question about their exclusion, and we believe no man of law has claimed for his brethren a pre-eminent place among the professional men who have distinguished themselves in extra-professional literary labor. But though every man knows that of the works produced by clergymen there is a most enormous mass to which Foster's savage description applies in all its fulness—"a vast exhibition of the most subordinate materials that can be called thought in language too grovelling to be called style"—nevertheless so many great names of clerical sermonizers and ethical writers, and religious poets and essayists, and historians and biographers, occur to the memory upon the slightest consideration of the matter, that we have no doubt that the case for the doctors could not be made out.

[*] "Robert Severne, his Friends and his Enemies. A Novel." Wm. A. Hammond. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Even in a region of the domain of literature, that of novel-writing, where one would have supposed the physicians would have much the better of the ministers, the advantage seems to lie with the latter. So far as concerns English novels, the names of Sterne and Swift balance if they do not outweigh the name of Smollett; Goldsmith is hardly so much to be called a doctor as Dr. Johnson a divine; the Rev. Charles Maturin may be set against Dr. Moore and his "Zeluco;" and in our own day Samuel Longfellow and Charles Kingsley are no bad match for Dr. Holmes and the young surgeon, if he was a surgeon, who wrote that excellent sea-story, "Tom Cringle's Log."

Physicians, however, though literary history rates them, we think, lower than the profession which, at least among modern nations, was in the literary field generations before them, may very likely yet attain the first place as novelists. They are men of more than ordinary intelligence; they are in the daily practice of close observation; they watch the mental and bodily health of men and women; they are better acquainted, at any rate in Protestant countries, and for novel-writing purposes practically better acquainted in all countries, than any other class of men can hope to be, with the comedies and tragedies contained in the histories and secrets of families; they are accustomed to penetrate beneath appearances and to reason; and, as we have said, one would suppose that their success would be great in a branch of literature where a knowledge of character, of the interaction of motives, of the influence of men and women on each other in the social relations of life, and the possession of a fund of incidents, are qualifications so largely contributing to success. Other things being equal, one would expect the novel of a physician to be more readable and better than the novel of a man who had not had a physician's opportunities for studying life. Dr. Holmes, consciously we suppose, and, at any rate, quite successfully, has used the advantages which his profession gave him, and is once again improving them, but besides him we know of no one who has done so. Smollett, who is always mentioned when physicians' contributions to literature are mentioned, seems to have laid off the doctor altogether when he took up the pen, and his profession apparently did no more for him as an author than to take him to sea and make him acquainted with seafaring men and with foreign towns.

Yet of this novel, "Robert Severne," we may say that whatever in it is not written by its author as doctor is not worthy of much attention. Dr. Hammond, once Surgeon-General, and who has the cordial esteem of all honorable men who know him, is very well known as a student of insanity. A little pamphlet recently written by him, entitled "Insanity in its Medico-Legal Relations," and containing his opinion upon the testamentary capacity of a Mr. Johnston, a North Carolinian recently deceased, whose will was contested by the heirs-at-law, shows his familiarity with this dreadful malady, both as it is described in the books of the authorities and as it is revealed in the sufferer himself under treatment. It is not out of place for us to remark in passing that the definition of insanity laid down in that pamphlet has been pronounced more satisfactory than any ever before given, and we are glad to lay it before our readers. According to him, the disease is "a general or partial derangement of one or more faculties of the mind, which, whilst it does not abolish consciousness, prevents freedom of mind or of action."

This exceedingly interesting subject having occupied so much of Dr. Hammond's time and careful attention, it is not surprising that when he came to write a novel—and "Robert Severne" is his first venture, we believe—he should allow insanity to make an important figure in it. The plot turns upon the act of an insane man. Severne, who is rich, a marvel of learning, handsome, not old, and an untiring student, injures his health by six months' unintermitting mental and manual labor upon a philosophical work which he is writing. One morning, going to the Astor Library, he sees walking before him a woman whom, by her dress, her gait, a chain about her neck, and at last by her features, he recognizes as his wife, whom he knew, or thought he knew, to be dead and long buried. He is horrified; for the woman had not only died, but she had given her husband every reason to be very glad that she had died. Thinking on the circumstance, his thoughts become morbid, and although his conduct to the woman while she lived had been forbearing to a degree almost faulty and disgraceful, he begins to accuse himself of having driven her to her death. She was a suicide. Plunging into his studies for relief from his thoughts, he can read nothing in the printed pages but accusations and curses; he begins to fear that he is insane, and he is sure that he is ill, so he attempts to write a note to his physician requesting him to call. Having written it, he reads it over before sending it away, and discovers that unconsciously he has written as follows:

> "June 28th.
> "My Dear Lawrence: It is said that an honest confession is good for the soul. I hope my soul will be benefited when I acknowledge to you that I admit myself to be guilty of my wife's death. I am her murderer. I no longer wish to make a secret of it. I am now suffering the torments of the damned. Yours, in utter despair,

Perceiving what he had done, he had the sense to know that he was a victim to incipient insanity, and ceasing from work he went to bed. Up to this time he had believed the woman whom he had seen was from the other world; but, on the morning after his confession was written, he was astounded by receiving a call from her, and by hearing her assert that she was still living. He took measures to settle upon her a great part of his estate if she would leave him alone, but she refused, and continued to come to his house, whereupon he called the attention of his servants to her, and directed them not to admit the lady again.

This is the story which Severne tells Dr. Lawrence, when that gentleman, who is fully cognizant of all the facts attendant on Mrs. Severne's death, pays his friend a visit. The doctor is talking when the lady in question knocks at the door. The servants are positive that it is the same person whose coming has on one or two occasions seemed to agitate their master. When she enters the room she is seen to be a Mrs. Wiggins, whom Mr. Severne had employed. The medical man advises foreign travel, and Severne sets out on a trip round the world. While he is gone, his legal agent Freeling, who hates him and has determined to ruin him, finds and steals, and is seen stealing, the insane confession, and when Severne arrives in England, Freeling is there, and a warrant is out for the murderer's arrest. He gives himself up to the officers of justice, is tried and triumphantly acquitted, while Freeling goes to jail.

"Robert Severne, his Friends and his Enemies," the book is called. Freeling seems to have been his only enemy after the death of his wife. For friends, he has Sarah Tompkins, one of the most moral and sweet-natured and simple-minded prostitutes and female pickpockets that can be found anywhere out of French fiction. She is an unpleasing impossibility. There is no danger, however, that hard-hearted men of the world will adopt and educate any Sarah Tompkinses, being led thereto by Mr. Severne's example; neither they nor any one else will ever find such a creature any more than they will find such people as the burglars with whom Sarah consorts, or the preacher to whose flock Mrs. Wiggins belongs, or Mrs. Wiggins herself, or the widow that Mr. Joshua Joshua was going to marry, or Mr. Joshua Joshua, or the Baron Ulric de Hutten. Grace, and Mrs. Langley, two other of the friends, may be found in almost any of Mr. T. S. Arthur's stories. John Holmes is also a friend of the hero's, and very wise in bibliography; the same may be said of Miles Standish Goodall; and Miss Margaret Leslie, granddaughter of John Holmes, becomes Mrs. Severne. These, we believe, are nearly all the friends and enemies, and the character of none of them is well drawn. Skilful delineation of character, probable incidents, valuable thought which reconciles us to many novels devoid of plot and not strong in respect of characters, natural dialogue, wit, humor—these we are bound to say we can hardly find in this book. But there is in it something interesting about insanity; the plot, if carefully worked up in its details, would be a good one; there is something in it—albeit lugged into it by the head and shoulders—about the black art, the mighty magic of the pentagram, and a tale which hangs thereby about Ulric de Hutten's vengeance, and there is something in it about John Holmes's search for the philosopher's stone, or, to speak more exactly, his endeavor to discover the elements which compose gold, and his barren success in the attempt. Whoever cares for a smattering of such lore—and there are readers to whom the names of Raymond Lully and Cornelius Agrippa are as comfortable and edifying as the pious old lady found the Scripture word Mesopotamia—will find a little of it here. The book is so evidently a first book, and written sketchily and in haste, that in spite of its shortcomings we are inclined to invite the author to write again. It is plain to be seen that he is an able man, and we suppose that, in order to produce a novel which shall be really very good, he has only to remember that literature is no more a pastime than medicine is, but a most laborious occupation.

Observations on the Genus Unio; together with Descriptions of New Species in the Family Unionidæ, and Descriptions of New Species of other families of Mollusks. By Isaac Lea, LL.D. Vol. XI., with 24 plates, pp. 143, 4to. Printed for the Author. (Philadelphia. 1866.)—In his earlier years, and in the intervals of the demands of an active business life, Mr. Lea always found time to devote himself to the study of natural history; and the eleventh volume of his "Observations on the Genus Unio," now just published, shows that, with his time more at his disposal, his zeal remains unabated. This volume contains the descriptions of sixty-two new species, which, added to those previously described, give to the "unionidæ" seven hundred and thirty-six species, making a seriously long list for a student to look at. The present volume contains purely scientific descriptions, well illustrated with plates, and here and there some general observations. It possesses unusual interest from the fact that it contains descriptions of species from the most widely separated localities; Texas, Lake Winnipek, Assyria, Siam, India, and the great African water, Lake N'yassa, are all represented.

As we look over Mr. Lea's descriptions, we cannot help feeling some forebodings. There was a time when naturalists felt justified in establishing a species of shell, insect, or other organic form, on the examination of a single specimen. Comparative anatomists have gone further than this, and have been satisfied with a fragment of a bone. But now, after so much has been revealed by the comparison of large numbers of the same species of different ages and sexes, and, after so wide a range of variation in species has been made manifest, we cannot see how any careful naturalist will again be satisfied with a single specimen of anything. Mr. Agassiz, by his extended comparisons of fishes, has shown that different genera, and even different natural families, have been made from the males and females of the same species in cases where the individuals of the two sexes were very unlike. From want of care the genera Mollinesia and Pœcilia were made of the males and females of one species of the last mentioned genus of fish, and in the study of fossil osteology the multiplication of species from fragments of bone of the same species is but too well known. Mr. Lea, as will be seen by any one who turns over his pages, has often compared numbers of individuals of the same species of different ages and sexes; he has even paid some attention to the embryos, and, so far, has conformed to the actual demands of science. But in too many cases only single individuals are described, and rarely does the animal itself appear in his descriptions. This circumstance, added to the inherent difficulty growing out of the constant running together of the forms of the shells of the unionidæ when arranged in series, will render the permanency of those species, established on limited data, in the highest degree problematical. If it be answered that only one specimen existed, and the best was done that could be done under the circumstances, we can only reply that, under such circumstances, it is the duty of the naturalist to wait. Whatever may be in store for the future, almost each day's progress in zoölogy shows that the time has not yet come when a single fragment of bone, a tooth, a shell, or even a whole animal, can be said to afford a suitable foundation on which to establish a species. That a species sometimes can be established on such data is not to be denied; but the chance of failure is far greater than that of success. As one looks back upon the immense number of species formed on insufficient data with which the literature of natural history teems, the amount of work to be done over again seems disheartening.

The Campaign of Mobile; Including the Co-operative Operations of General Wilson's Cavalry in Alabama. By Brev. Maj.-Gen. C. C. Andrews. Maps and Illustrations. 8vo. (New York: D. Van Nostrand. 1867.)—Brevet Major-General C. C. Andrews's "History of the Campaign of Mobile" is a handsome book, but as for its contents it is just what the shield of Achilles was not, for its material is far better than its workmanship. The author has collected a large quantity of apparently trustworthy information, from both Federal and Confederate sources. He has taken infinite pains to use it faithfully, and the result is a careful, impartial, circumstantial, and dull book. There is hardly a line of good description in it from beginning to end, not a single striking sentence or phrase, not an instance of a military proposition well laid down and ably illustrated. His usual method of description is to take a front of operations, and then, beginning at the left or right, as the case may be, to tell us what each company or each regiment did and suffered on a certain day, and so work through the line from one end to the other, and then repeat this process for as many days as the troops whose movements he describes were in front of the enemy. The result is what might be expected. There is almost a total want of ensemble in his description, and the attention is fatigued with the unceasing recurrence of statements that Private Brown was killed and Corporal Thompson wounded. The general writes with all the detail and none of the spirit of Kinglake. His book will be welcome to the rank and file of the army that operated against Mobile, for hardly a man who was killed or wounded there is without mention in it, but for the general reader it is almost absolutely worthless. He writes much more as if he had been a private than as if he had been a division commander, as he was. His descriptions are those of a man who heard the incidents of each day described by the men as they collected around the camp-fires at night; of what passed at division, corps, and department headquarters he seems to be altogether ignorant, and of the strategy of the campaign he knew very little.

He probably little thought how completely he confessed that he was no soldier when he wrote that some of our artillery was "only four hundred and fifty yards from Fort McDermott—so near, indeed, that the men could hear the music of a brass band inside that fort" (p. 78).

It is to be said to his credit that he has written in good taste and with the utmost modesty, and that he has increased the value and interest of his book by inserting in it several excellent maps and some good anecdotes. A good deal of interest also attaches to his descriptions of adventures on the skirmish line, and of the movements of assaulting parties, though this is owing more to the abundance of detail than to any dramatic quality in the author. His book will furnish many good bricks for the true builder; but it is of little worth except as a collection of material. His competency as a military critic and historian may be judged from a single sentence, which is found in the first paragraph of his description of the operations of Wilson's cavalry in Alabama, p. 241: "The operations of that column included results beyond those of a co-operative character, and they have hardly ever been surpassed even by the achievements of Alexander."

King René's Daughter. A Danish Lyrical Drama. By Henrik Hertz. Translated by Theodore Martin. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1867. 16mo, pp. xii., 100.)—There are, perhaps, a few cultivated Americans who have read some of the works of Henrik Hertz in the original Danish, but most of those who are at all acquainted with this author have got their knowledge from the German translation of this poem, or from seeing it acted on the stage, as it was some fifteen years ago, Mrs. Mowatt, we believe, taking the part of Iolanthe. "King René's Daughter" is a poem of such beauty that we are glad to see it made the first of a series of poetical translations projected by its publishers. It will greatly conciliate the favor of the public. Henrik Hertz is, with the exception of Hans Andersen, the most celebrated author of late years in Denmark. He was born in 1798, of Jewish parents, and, after studying law, turned himself to literature. His first published work was a comedy, written in 1826. After that followed, in rapid succession, comedies, tragedies, novels, and poems. In 1845 appeared the work of which the present is a translation, which at once met with great success. It has been translated four times into German, and four times into English, and also into various other languages, and has been acted in all the leading theatres of Europe. It is a drama on an event in the life of René, King of Provence, in the fifteenth century, celebrated as a troubadour. Yolande, his daughter, married Tristan, Count of Vaudemont, to settle a dispute about the succession to Lorraine between the two families. In the play Yolande, or Iolanthe, as she is called, is blind, and the plot turns on her being awakened by Tristan and informed of her blindness—of which, till then, she had been brought up ignorant—on the very day when such a proceeding was necessary to her recovery of her sight by the arts of a Moorish physician. The poem is full of the most delicate touches, which have been felicitously rendered into English by Mr. Martin, who has become since well known as the translator of Horace and Catullus. The impression which the beauty of the poem made on us when we first read it has not been effaced by the dozen years that have elapsed since then, and we have thus read this translation with a double pleasure. The passage in the fourth scene, in which Iolanthe first learns her blindness and is unable to comprehend what it is of which she is deprived, is exceedingly lovely; and again of equal beauty are the few lines in the fifth scene, in which she asks explanation of what Tristan told her:

> "What is it, then, to see?
> Can I, O father, see his voice, which touch'd
> My soul with joy and sadness? Can I see
> With these my eyes the nightingale's thick note,
> Whereon I've mused so oft, and vainly striven
> To follow it in thought, away, away?
> Or is her song a flower, whose fragrant breath
> I know, but not its root, and stem, and leaves?"

"King René's Daughter" is to be read, and not to be criticised. In the sense of delightful enjoyment its perusal gives, a critical testing of it is impossible. We hope its success will cause the speedy publication of the "Frithiof's Saga," by Tegner, and of the other books promised in the series, especially Pushkin's "Boris Godunoff."

A New Chemical Nomenclature. By S. D. Tillman, Professor of Technology in the American Institute of the City of New York. Pamphlet, pp. 23. (Albany. 1866.)—Like the interminable boxes within boxes of Chinese art, the system of nomenclature here presented is a marvel of ingenious compaction and painstaking elaboration. It is of value in so far as it illustrates what may be done with mnemonical systems, and what may reasonably be expected from such systems when applied to the exposition of chemical knowledge. The subject of mnemonics appears, in truth, never to have received from chemists a fair share of the attention which it deserves; patchwork names of interminable length are still coined daily as designations of the most inoffensive substances, and the tendency is ever towards an increase of jaw-breaking names. Ridiculous, however, as many of these compound names may seem to be in Mr. Tillman's eyes, the great fact remains that most of them have come into common use, have gained possession of the ground, and really represent, more or less fully and clearly, the habit of thought now prevalent in the science to which they appertain. A radical change of the existing system, or want of system, of nomenclature, can probably be effected only slowly and gradually, and by very general agreement among the devotees of the science. Mr. Tillman must not, therefore, take it too much to heart if he finds that the majority of the chemists of to-day esteem his essay as something possessing about the same intrinsic value as the Oriental toy with which we have compared it.

Our Boys and Girls. Oliver Optic's Magazine. January 5, 1867. Vol. I., No. 1. (Lee & Shepard, Boston.)—The ingeniousness of the several pretexts for establishing the various children's magazines which have blossomed with the New Year is very enjoyable, and children as well as adults may be permitted their embarras du choix. "Oliver Optic" says our boys and girls ought not to be kept a whole month in suspense over continued stories, so he publishes a weekly for them. And this is the chief difference between his magazine and "The Little Corporal," or "The Riverside Magazine," or "Our Young Folks." The reason is as good as another. There are two continued stories, one by the editor and one by "Sophie May;" a short poem by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe; some short antiquarian notes by Mr. William A. Wheeler; a humorous dialogue; a speech prepared for declamation; the usual collection of enigmas, rebuses, etc. The title-page bears a tasteful vignette, in which a young gentleman and a young lady are mixing base-ball with croquet in a merry manner.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

CONGRESS AND THE BAR.

WE should be sorry to see Congress admit the doctrine which the Supreme Court has propounded, that the legislature of the United States has no right to say what qualifications shall be necessary to enable a man to practise in the national courts. As long as the Senate does decide, and Congress may decide, what manner of men shall be judges in these courts, there is something unreasonable in declaring that it has no power to say what manner of men shall be professional pleaders before them. If it were once admitted that the Supreme Court had exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of determining the fitness of the lawyers who practise before it, it would be in the power of that body to convert the Federal bar into a close corporation, and give to a few men a most odious and dangerous monopoly of a very lucrative and important business, and the people would be without any means of redress. It is quite true that the possibility that a power will be abused is not by any means a conclusive argument against its existence; but as long as its existence is disputed on other grounds, it is a very strong reason for steadily refusing to concede it.

While claiming for Congress, however, the right to fix the qualifications for admission to the Federal bar, and while heartily approving of Mr. Boutwell's bill so far as it is merely declaratory, we cannot help saying that we think it is a great mistake to attempt, as Mr. Boutwell is attempting, to exclude men from practice in the Federal courts because they may have aided or abetted in the rebellion. Every argument which has been used in support of this measure is based on a mistaken conception of the relations of an advocate to the public and of the whole theory of his duties and rights. Whatever may have been or may now be the position of the bar in other countries, it is not true that admission to it in this country can or ought to be considered as in any sense a "privilege" which the Government has in its power to bestow or withhold. The bar in England, as well as in France, has come down from the Middle Ages as a close guild or corporation, like every other trade or calling, and in the former country admission to it has always been and still is saddled with restrictions, for the avowed purpose of reserving the profession for men in a certain social position. But the bar in America has no such traditions or antecedents. The profession of an advocate here rests on the natural and inalienable right of every man who seeks justice in a court of law to be heard in his own behalf; and from this, if by reason of ignorance or infirmity he cannot speak for himself, his right to be heard through the medium of some one better able to state his case, and chosen by himself, is an inevitable deduction. This right cannot be impaired or destroyed by any guilt or depravity, or the commission of any crime; in fact, the more heinous the crime of which a man is accused, and the more terrible the punishment which awaits him if found guilty, the stronger and more sacred does the right become.

Persons accused of treason and felony were, down to a very recent period, refused the assistance of counsel in England, on the ground that it was an indulgence to which they were not entitled, and by which the dignity of the king's courts would be impaired, and that the judge would take care of their interests; and one of the finest pieces of wit, sarcasm, and logic ever produced by Sydney Smith's pen was devoted to the demolition of this barbarous and inhuman fallacy. But neither the theory nor the practice has ever made its way across the Atlantic. It has never been denied here that a prisoner's or suitor's right to avail himself of the services of a clever brain and readier tongue than his own is part and parcel of his right to be heard in his own defence. When the state steps in to prescribe rules for admission to the bar, or to determine the qualifications of those who shall exercise the calling of an advocate, it does so not by way of granting a franchise, but for the purpose of protecting suitors and prisoners from being wronged or defrauded. The object of its interference is to guarantee to the public that attorneys and counsellors have a fair knowledge of the law and are of good moral character, and that cases may be entrusted to them without risk of miscarriage either through gross ignorance or dishonesty, and other qualifications than these we deny the right of the Government to insist upon. These restrictions may be imposed, because they are for the interest of the citizen; but other restrictions may not be, because they are not necessary to the citizen. The fact that a man has committed treason may be good cause for excluding him from the bar, if he has been convicted of treason in open court; but treason is not a crime which renders a man unfit to perform an advocate's duties faithfully. If so many persons have committed treason that it is impossible or inexpedient to try them for the offence, it is also inexpedient to expel them all from the bar on account of it. To exclude every man from practice in the Federal courts who has aided or abetted in the rebellion, is to exclude nearly every Southern lawyer of character or ability, or, in other words, to leave the whole Southern people without the means either of seeking their rights or defending themselves in courts of justice; and this penalty, we repeat, we have no right to inflict on any community, no matter what offence they have committed, though it were "the unpardonable sin" itself. As long as we keep courts of justice open, we must allow men to appear in them by counsel of their own choice and in whom they have confidence; but if we prescribe a qualification which throughout half the continent not one hundred lawyers can show, we practically deny people the right to appear by counsel.

What the North asks for, and what Congress is bound to provide, is perfect equality before the law for all classes, colors, and conditions, and such protection for life and property at the South as it is in the power of the Government to furnish or secure. For these things we go at all hazards. Whatever is plainly necessary to secure these great ends, the country is willing to do or have done, cost what it may; but bills like this of Mr. Boutwell's, which can serve no purpose but that of alienation and irritation—which, so far from hastening the restoration of order and law, will do much to retard it by shaking the confidence of the Southern people in the national courts, will not, unless we are greatly mistaken, command either the sympathy or support of the people. We must look at these questions from a practical point of view, after all, no matter what our feelings may be. We sympathize with Mr. Boutwell's indignation at seeing Bradley Johnson practising in the Supreme Court, but we cannot reconstruct the Union in principles of holy wrath. As long as there are four millions of traitors at the South, and we have to live under the same political roof with them, or else slaughter them, we must submit to much that tries our patience and wounds our patriotic sensibilities. But pray let us meet this necessity like men. "If, like children, we cry for the moon, like children we must cry on."

THE WISDOM OF OUR ANCESTORS.

WE have been profoundly impressed by some articles recently published in the New York Tribune, which eulogize the wisdom of the plan adopted by our British ancestors for the protection of domestic manufactures, and we were especially struck by the Tribune's enthusiastic praise of King Edward III. for his judicious care of the woollen manufacture. The writer commenced in this eloquent strain:

> "Edward III., King by that grace of God which gives nations rulers with sense and patriotism enough to develop the industry of their realms, summoned a parliament to make laws for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture of England. For five centuries, the system of protection to the wool-growers and wool-manufactures which this wise monarch inaugurated, was continued by succeeding British sovereigns and parliaments without a break. Monument of legislative labor in behalf of national industry, the abstract of the British statutes relating to the growing and manufacturing of wool enumerates three hundred and eleven laws, all tending inexorably to one object—the encouragement of cloth-making in England."

Some of these admirable statutes the Tribune cites as follows:

> "One of those statutes required that all black cloth and mourning material worn at funerals should be made of British wool exclusively. Another of them, thoroughly carried into effect for 130 years, and which was in operation close down to the present century, required that every person buried in England should be buried in a shroud composed of woollen cloth exclusively, and of British cloth. Talk of protection! On the application of the London and Canterbury woollen weavers, the wearing in Great Britain of Indian cotton calicoes was forbidden by law. Afterward, when the rising cotton manufacture gave cause for apprehension that the great national woollen industry might be interfered with, the use in Great Britain of British printed calicoes was restricted by statute to those of a single color —blue."

No wonder that the editor, a little carried away by pardonable enthusiasm, adds:

> "Yes, those British statesmen were great men and greatly in earnest."

The Tribune, however, has failed to do entire justice to these earnest statesmen. They not only protected woollen manufactures and wool-growers against the base competition of cotton and the importation of foreign goods, but with impartial hand also protected domestic buyers against the extortion of sellers or the competition of hateful foreigners.

By the statute 11 Edw. III., chap. 1, it was enacted that no wool should be exported from England, thus protecting the wearer of cloth from any increase of price, while, to give corresponding protection to the wool-grower and manufacturer, it was ordained that no foreign cloth should be imported, and that no person, other than one of the royal family, should wear any clothes made abroad. Any person violating this law was to be deprived of his garments; though whether officers were appointed to examine every man's doublet, and determine whether it was native or foreign, does not appear; nor is it clear whether foreign clothes were to be confiscated in the street, or whether the wearer was allowed to go home before being stripped. We trust that when Congress revives this excellent law, it will require these outlandish clothes to be seized wherever found, without delay, lest, going home to divest himself of the "accursed 'things,'" the culprit evade the pursuit of justice.

But it was not alone in respect of wool that this great king and his counsellors cared for the public weal. Finding, as we do now, that provisions were very expensive, they fixed the prices at which all articles of food should be sold. It is true that the result of this legislation was that food disappeared from the public markets, since farmers would not sell at all at the prices fixed; and thus the actual prices paid were much higher than they would have been had no attempt been made to regulate them. But this was surely no fault of the earnest legislators. They bore testimony against high prices, and cleared their consciences.

As an example of these laws—which, though framed with that profound wisdom which characterized our ancestors of five hundred years ago, and of which so little is left now, except in the columns of the Tribune and the mind of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, appear, for some mysterious reason, to have failed to produce all the benefits that might justly have been expected from them—we note a statute enacted by this most wise and gracious king to prevent the herring-fishers of Yarmouth from asking exorbitant prices; which for this purpose directed that no herrings should be sold after sundown, and that upon a sale being made, all merchants present should have an equal share of the herrings sold at the price agreed upon by the first purchaser. But such was the perversity of man and the obstinacy of natural laws in refusing to bend to the superior wisdom of Edward the Third, that his majesty was obliged to confess, in his "statute of herring," of the thirty-fifth year of his reign, that the earlier statute had almost ruined the herring trade, since a large part of the catch was taken in the night, and the delay of twelve hours sometimes made the fish unsalable, while the poor fishermen were perplexed and bewildered by the multitude of persons among whom they were compelled to divide every load of fish. Accordingly, the old statute was repealed; but an excellent saving clause was enacted by which merchants were strictly forbidden to outbid one another, it being provided that no one, seeing another making an offer for herrings, should make any higher offer. Such a law is urgently needed at this time, particularly for the protection of buyers at auction sales, where the law should imperatively require every article to be knocked down to the first bidder.

And here we must notice other wise enactments for the protection of buyers. By 4 Edward IV., chap. 4, all purchases of wool, before it was shorn, were prohibited in certain counties (including the larger part of England), while no one was allowed to purchase any wool at all in those counties for one year after it was raised, unless he was an English manufacturer of woollen goods. The statutes against speculative purchases were almost numberless. It was made a penal offence to buy goods on their way to market, or to buy them in market with intent to sell again in the same town. Especially was it a high crime to speculate in articles of food. This, indeed, was an offence at common law, but the punishment was made more severe by statute. Laws were frequently passed to compel innkeepers, bakers, butchers, and grocers to accept prices to be fixed, from time to time, by justices of the peace, who, as everybody knows, are peculiarly qualified for such a duty; being, as Dogberry justly said, "the most senseless and fit" men that can be found.

Nothing was better known to our sagacious ancestors than that their substance was devoured by "middle-men." We have shown how they protected themselves against the machinations of speculators in food. But in 1390 the Parliament of Richard II. (successor of the great Edward), seeing that the wool raised in the country was first bought by native merchants and by them resold either to retailers or to foreigners for export, determined to secure to the wool-grower the full benefit of dealing with the latter parties. Accordingly, "for to make higher the price of wools," as these great and earnest statesmen expressed it, they forbade all Englishmen from purchasing wool except for their own private use. This was to compel the foreign merchant to go into the interior and pay the sheep-owner the prices which he had been used to pay the English merchant. What a masterly conception!

The attention of these accomplished legislators was also frequently directed to the evil practices of foreign merchants. It was observed at an early day that foreigners often left the country richer than when they came to it. At first, in order to prevent them from thus impoverishing the realm, the simple and straightforward plan of depriving them of their wealth was frequently adopted. In 1306, Edward I. seized upon them and put them in the Tower until they gave security not to take anything out of the kingdom without the royal permission. But this method having for some reason the effect of discouraging foreigners from bringing money into the country, although no objection had ever been made to their doing so, these harsher measures were finally abandoned, and his majesty contented himself with prohibiting the exportation of coin and bullion; so that in any case merchants should be obliged to take out something besides gold and silver. When this order was relaxed, they were required to give security that they would spend at least half the proceeds of their importations in the purchase of English goods.

Nor was this all. Wisely jealous of the competition of foreigners, the British Parliament at one time forbade any sales to be made to foreign merchants otherwise than for cash down; at another time (1439) forbade them to sell to one another; then required them to sell only at wholesale; and for a while insisted that they should sell out their whole stock in forty days.

Space fails us for the production of more of this wisdom of our ancestors. We must, however, refer to their judicious settlement of the labor question, which has been adopted as a pattern by our Southern brethren since the close of the war. In this matter, too, the wise Edward III. led the way. By the statutes 23 and 25 Edw. III., for the better protection of masters against the encroachments of servants, who, as these statutes recite, were through "malice," "seeing the necessity of masters," unwilling to serve "unless they may receive excessive wages," it was enacted that all agricultural laborers should hire themselves openly, and should be compelled to serve any man who should offer them the wages commonly paid five years before. It was further enacted that none should pay haymakers more than a penny a day, mowers more than five-pence a day, or reapers more than three-pence, "without meat or drink, or other courtesy." No laborer was to leave his winter residence in the summer, if he could get these wages. And as a further wise precaution against the evasion of this statute, the constables were required to make every laborer take an oath twice in each year to observe these rules, and in case of refusal, the recusant was to be put in the stocks three days, and afterward into jail until he submitted. Similar provisions were enacted in relation to carpenters, masons, and mechanics generally, their wages being fixed by the paternal wisdom of his majesty and his counsellors. Those who should escape from one county to another to evade these statutes were to be pursued by the sheriffs, like fugitive slaves, and imprisoned until they submitted to work for the two or three pence a day allotted to them.

It seems to have been found hard to carry out these benevolent laws; and therefore, in a later statute, it was provided that not only should the laborers be punished for asking more than their legal dole, but that employers should be punished for giving more; and that any one who should say or do anything to encourage workmen against the statute should be "grievously punished by the discretion of the justices." In substance, these laws were continued until a comparatively recent period.

In recommending these statutes for adoption here, we should of course recognize the principles of democratic equality, which we fear were overlooked by the statesmen of five hundred years ago, and which have been also ignored by the Southern legislators. They only provided that every laborer should be compelled to serve any one who wished to hire him at the legal wages. We propose, while adopting this rule, further to compel every employer to hire all the men who offer themselves for his service at the legal rate of wages. Thus will justice be rendered with an even hand to both parties.

We have thus too briefly recapitulated some of the leading measures of these early statesmen, with a view to urging a prompt return to these good old paths. Let the manufacturer be protected by the exclusion of imports, and the purchaser by the prohibition of exports. Let us have no more of the ruinous fluctuations in prices which are now experienced, but let the law require everybody to sell at a certain price and everybody to buy at a certain price. Let all speculators be put down, and every consumer buy directly from the producer. In order to save interest, no loans of money should be allowed; to save commissions, no sales should be made by agents; and, above all, to save the enormous expense of freights, which eat out the life of farmers, no produce should be allowed to be carried more than ten miles from the place where it is raised. If our commerce needs encouragement, let there be a tax levied to employ sailors in navigating empty ships. A bounty to be paid to everybody who grows or manufactures anything should, of course, be paid out of the public treasury. We are about to pay, as a nation, some $70,000,000 a year to encourage the growth of wool, the whole annual value of our crop of which is $46,000,000. We rejoice at this "bold and comprehensive" policy, but insist that it should be extended to all branches of industry. Thus shall unbounded prosperity attend us, and our favored land realize all the bright visions of those great and earnest statesmen who framed the laws of England in the golden days of Edward the Third. If the tariff is to be so framed as to afford good protection to such branches of native industry as promise some day to be able to do without protection, do not let us, by any means, advocate this course in a sensible and reasonable manner. Let us have a brigade of abusive writers, mercifully bereft of the reasoning faculty, to roar daily for a return, in the middle of the nineteenth century, and in a model republic, to the mediæval legislation of a semi-barbarous monarchy.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION IN GERMANY.

The enthusiasm of last summer and the bright hopes entertained for the future of Germany have given place to a feeling of depression. Natural as this reaction may be, its keenness has been augmented by the severity of the Prussian officials, who possess the unenviable reputation of making themselves odious when odium can well be avoided, by involving their best measures in chicanery and petty annoyances, and who, within the last few months, have acted in a manner which fully deserves this reproach.

Notwithstanding this reaction and the vicious course of the Prussian Government, remarkable progress has been made in Germany during this time. The tumult of conflicting views and opinions, of vague ideas and impracticable theories, has been succeeded by a calmer appreciation of historical circumstances and of their results. Even the opponents of the present Prussian policy are animated with a certain national pride, perceiving that Germany is in a fair way to resume her former and proper position among the nations of the world of which she was deprived at the time of the Reformation.

The change in this respect most worthy of note has taken place in Southern Germany. Among the liberals few remain except the radical Democrats, who have formed an alliance with the Ultramontane Catholic party—or, more properly, who have been used as its tool in the interest of Austria against Prussia—who do not desire the closest union with the North. In Bavaria, the late minister Von der Pfordten has resigned, and his place is now occupied by Prince Hohenlohe, an avowed advocate of an alliance with Prussia. In Baden, a short time ago, the Secretary of State, von Freydorf, delivered a speech to both Houses of the Legislature, in which he proved that a small state could not live, and asserted that it was an anomaly and was dependent upon the favor or indifference of its neighbors, that it has no inherent stability, and that its existence should be terminated as soon as possible, and, in conclusion, he expressed the opinion that the best interests of his state would be subserved by a speedy connection with Prussia. We never before had an example of one of the ministers of a small state declaring its utter incompatibility with its rights and duties as a member of a great nation, and pleading against the encroachment of a petty sovereign. This same minister has been endeavoring, though thus far without success, to have the army placed at the disposal of Prussia. At Stuttgart, in Würtemberg, in November last, a meeting of the old liberals who are opposed to Prussia, under the lead of Welcker and Mittermaier, was convened to advance the project of the establishment of a south-western confederation; but it failed so signally of support that its leaders dare not publish their own resolutions. This faction of the liberal party occupies an inglorious position, somewhat similar to that occupied by the Union party in our own history whose existence was so summarily terminated in the contest of 1860. Even in Würtemberg, the centre of the opposition to Prussian domination, the portion of the liberal party favorable to annexation, or, at least, a closer union, is perceptibly gaining ground. Reinhold Pauli, a professor at Tübingen, a liberal of this class, incurred the displeasure of the Government by writing for the "Preussische Jahrbücher" an article expressing advanced liberal sentiments, and reflecting severely upon the course of his Government, and was deprived of his chair at that university and sent to a small theological seminary at Schönthal. In Hesse-Darmstadt the liberal party of annexation is now, and has hitherto been, opposed to the minister Dalwigk, and he was only sustained in his chamber by a bare majority, obtained by a coalition of the Ultramontanists with the radical Democrats of the school of the "Deutsches Wochenblatt" of Mannheim, who do not, indeed, openly profess a preference for the old state of affairs in Germany, but who do not hesitate to declare a choice for the division of Italy into many states to a united Italy.

In North Germany, the assembling of the new parliament, which has been convoked for the twenty-fourth of February, is anxiously awaited. It does not augur well that no official publication has been made of the plan of the new constitution agreed upon by the Prussian Government, and that the general features now carrying out are the same which were marked out in June of last year, before the victory in the late conflict; but what is already known does not exhibit any design of a liberal policy being pursued by Bismark. However, it is not our intention at present to speculate upon the provisions of this constitution, but we reserve its consideration for a subsequent article after the constitution has been agreed upon.

Those who concluded, from the adoption of the principle of universal suffrage in reference to the elections to the new parliament, that Bismark will pursue a more liberal course, and that that is an indication that he entertains more liberal principles, are grievously disappointed. This principle, liberal in itself, which the Prussian Government took to itself considerable credit in adopting, is one which it has embraced for the promotion of illiberal purposes, and one toward which that Government stands in marked opposition. Its policy, which in relation to internal affairs is conservative, from the nature of the case, in reference to the German question is revolutionary. In all its dealings with the latter it is under the necessity of preserving an apparently liberal policy. Its adoption of universal suffrage is not, as may at first appear to be the case, very unfavorable to the Government. Experience has shown that the great body of the opposition is composed of the educated class, which is capable of being influenced by publications, and that it is probable that the class now to be included among the electors will add to the conservative force. Besides, it is believed that the new parliament is designed as a mere show, and is necessary as evidence of a popular movement which will not need, in reality, any valuable privileges. In Prussia, the scheme for the erection of the new parliament is regarded with distrust. At Berlin an anecdote is current which represents Bismark as having threatened to destroy the parliament by the parliament. The liberals, not at all deficient in the national sentiment, are unwilling to see their duly constituted legislature rendered powerless, or to concede any of their rights until duly satisfied that it will be for the common good. The result is they regard with more favor the proposition that the old Prussian parliament should receive deputations from the other states, thus constituting a body which should legislate for the whole, and which, having control of the budget, would not be powerless under the encroachment of the Government. Whichever may be the national parliament, it is their desire that it should have all the powers of a central government, and that all the other parliaments and assemblies should merely legislate for municipal purposes. This would approach very nearly our system, and would make the general government more powerful while harmonizing the movements of the different parts. In Prussia the liberals have long been endeavoring to obtain the passage of laws making the civil and military officers responsible for their conduct before the courts. This reform, if effected, would afford a mode of redress for those many grievances which irresponsible officials delight in inflicting upon the people while satisfied of their perfect immunity from punishment. In regarding the struggle there for constitutional liberty, we should hold in mind the fact that Prussia has been a military government for two generations; that it is the aim of the present King and of Bismark to make her a strong military power, which is inconsistent with the demands of the liberal party, and consequently that those demands will be granted with extreme reluctance; and the necessary reforms cannot be obtained in a few months, but must be acquired, piece by piece, at long intervals, until a sound constitutional existence is gained. Viewing the matter in this light, it will be seen that much progress has been made.

The Prussian Government pursues the same short-sighted policy of wanton injury to its subjects in the recently annexed provinces as it now pursues in Prussia, notwithstanding the pretended reconciliation with its subjects. Thus the people of those provinces have cooled in their ardor for incorporation with their powerful neighbor, and many little demonstrations of discontent have taken place. The national sentiment among all, however, is unchangeable. While the Frankfort money-changers (mark these patriots !) engrave upon their letters a red eagle with the motto "Strong in the right" surrounding it, or in their invitations after the initials "U. A. W. G." (for "ananswer is requested") insert "O. P." ("ohne Preussen," without Prussians), or the Hanoverian children at sight of the Prussian eagle exclaim "Cuckoo," in reference to the bird which appropriates its fellow's nest, these are but harmless ebullitions, transitory in their nature, which, the moment a more enlightened path is pursued, will be succeeded by a cordial support of the government which will accept their lead to the realization of the national idea. In Germany there is now but one power, and that power is Prussia; and for any German not to see this argues wilful stubbornness to his best interests. Of the task of Prussia we can say as the First Consul said to the English ambassador who had refused to acknowledge the French Republic: "Acknowledge it or not. It is as the sun, and he is blind who does not see it."

THE PHILOSOPHY OF STOPPING ONE'S PAPER.

A WISE phrenologist might, perhaps, say that the chief obstacle to the progress of our race lies just behind its ears rather than in the length of them. It is the average man's bumps of "combativeness and destructiveness"—to speak after the manner of Professor Fowler—which are most in the way of his enlightenment. Criticism, without which progress is impossible or extremely slow—for are not two heads better than one ?—seems to affect his cerebellum first and his cerebrum only afterwards. Irrationally, he will persist in considering his antagonist his enemy. That "our antagonist is our helper," as Burke saw and said, the ordinary human being can in no way be made to believe; to any such whisperings of modern truth he is what you may call a Deaf Burke; opposition, because it is opposition, rouses in him all the prize-fighter. As the saying goes, knowledge has to be knocked into him; experience alone teaches him, and she has to teach with a ferule. It is from this intolerance of contradiction that we had the old-time stonings of the prophets—as regards which practice, at least, the ancient Hebrews were by no means a peculiar people; hence have we the noble army of martyrs, for there was never a religious persecution that had not at its root more of this feeling than of the better feeling that each of us is responsible for another's errors in faith; hence, also, the fact that the vocabulary of abuse is almost precisely coextensive with the wealth of gracious language which the painters and the poets have bestowed upon the fraternity of critics; and hence, not to attempt completing the list and compassing the infinite—hence nine in ten of the savage notes which so often so peremptorily direct the editor to "stop my paper."

Suppose a journal prints as its critical opinion of a certain author, that he is not a dramatic poet at all equal to Henry Taylor or Robert Browning, that certainly he is surpassed by William Shakespeare, that as a hymn-writer he must, for reasons given, be held inferior to seven or eight other American hymn-writers; that, in general, reasons being again given, he must be regarded as possessing no remarkable measure of the poetic faculty—then it will be really a wonder if the next mail does not bring one or two indignant letters from several gentlemen who say, in effect, this: "Sir, you have said so-and-so, which is shameful, for I think thus-and-thus (here almost always a hiatus); therefore, I desire that you stop my paper immediately." The suppressed sentences might, we suppose, be written out in some such words as these: I take a paper to read; but I want to read nothing that I did not believe before. I should be stupid to read and to pay for reading anything that disagrees with the opinions I have already formed, and of the truth of which I am convinced and intend to remain convinced. Besides, I intend to punish you for contradicting my views. Therefore—and so forth and so forth, as above.

As for the anger which is almost sure to breathe from this sort of communication, some enquirers make that more difficult to be accounted for than the existence of the letters themselves. Probably the editor who has to endure it instinctively falls back on the old definition, ira brevis furor est—the man is non compos. But this method is too comprehensive for philosophical purposes, and appears indeed to be a mistaken one; and although the entertaining of it may be excusable in the editor, it would, at all events, even if it were true, be desirable to find, if possible, some solution less discouraging to the friends of humanity. As the Count Joannes has feelingly said, insanity is a malady, almost always incurable, which is transmissible to the insane man's offspring. If, now, each child of each man who ever stopped his paper is to be considered to be a lunatic, we have, indeed, "a mad world." It indicates and it nourishes a sort of extreme and wicked misanthropy to bring, even indirectly, by definition, so sweeping a charge of insanity, especially when there is another accusation which is truer and answers every purpose. Insanity may be incurable, but every human being who has passed from infancy to man's estate is a standing proof that imbecility, or at any rate most of the innumerable degrees of it, may be remedied by education and patience, though, perhaps, in all cases the cure is but partial, and in many cases the lapse of several centuries is required to effect it. For example, the grandfather or great-grandfather of the last enraged subscriber to THE NATION may very likely have been a very stupid person and helped to mob Abolitionists or Quakers or Mormons or Temperance Lecturers or Missionary Baptists; but his grandson or great-grandson or more remote descendant may be a man such as would put to shame the Stuart Mill of our day by the greatness of his love for freedom of discussion and thought and action. It is at any rate more cheerful, and we think, in view of past experience, more reasonable, to hope so than to set down the unborn innocent as a probable maniac. A crazy man we must give up; but a contemporary fool, as the wisdom of our ancestors teaches, may come to something in his posterity.

The view which we have already suggested is a true one. The people who fight with coolness, dispassionately, without anger, are not nowadays extant. A Berserker fought from the tumult in his blood, from his pride of life, in joy of battle; but he is defunct, and his descendants cannot support the prize-ring. The Irishman at Donnybrook used to do something similar, and all in friendship break bones; but Donnybrook Fair was, and is not. The British tar as he rolled about the stage, and the bold light-weight or heavy-weight as he appears in the ballads, used to stand up to their acquaintances and friends, and had their little breezes and skrimmages, and visited each other's conks, and caught it on the ivories, and went into mourning as to their peepers, and turned on their claret, and in other highly metaphorical and apparently savage ways showed their real loving-kindness and manly affection for one another. French gentlemen, in French novels, fight duels with gayety, and destroy the foes of their house with a nonchalant courage and impassiveness which the people of other lands may emulate but must not hope to equal. But as for us, we live in a world of police courts and prosecutions for assault. We can exclude anger neither from our quarrels nor can we disguise our anger. We are as far from the deceptive suavity of the French marquis of a hundred and fifty years ago as from the bare-sark Northman of four or five centuries after our era. Engaging in a contest of any sort, we are very apt to feel and to show anger with our antagonist.

Let us now adopt the method once common among itinerant preachers, and try to get at the meaning of our text by throwing the stress of voice first on one word and then on another, we may, perhaps, get at some hints suggestive of such truths as we are seeking. We shall not need to dwell long on the first word, "Stop." It illustrates the principle already laid down: the subscriber conceives that he has found an enemy; naturally, he strikes out; he has been attacked, and, by way of defence, makes a counter-attack and ejects the defender. But emphasizing "my"—"Stop my paper"—we get, as it seems to us, something that does throw a little more light on the state of mind in which these correspondents very generally are when they take pen in hand. They are not only angry because contradicting, going into action; they seem to have a notion, none the less influential that it is perhaps never put into words, that they are the victims of a breach of contract. They subscribed to a journal; it has taken their money. By this consideration it is bound to be their "organ" and express their minds. The contract was only implied; but they are just as much cheated when it is broken as if it had been expressed in writing, and have just as much right to be angry with the offender. "It is my paper," these gentlemen say each to himself,—"it is my paper, and here it is opposing Johnson's impeachment, though I hate Johnson, and my paper ought to denounce him;" or, "It is in favor of a villanous railroad round Hoosac Mountain, although I've got money, and for years I've had money, invested in a road that is to go through the Hoosac tunnel;" or, "It opposes protection; and I'm an iron-master! My paper, too!" Some such delusion must, we think, have lodgment in the brain of our letter-writer, or he would hardly take the trouble to sit down and write out his extreme displeasure.

The very frequent absurdity of the letters in question, even when they are not vituperative, it is hardly worth while to dwell upon. Sometimes the writer appears perfectly astounded that the journal to which he writes does not perceive that a course which displeases him must be a ruinous course. He frequently forgets or seems to forget that to be long worth anything, or ever worth much, the opinions of any journal must rest on the conscientious convictions of its managers, and not opinions dictated to them to-day by one, to-morrow by another, till soon even the agility of the Herald, which seeks to follow the opinions of the mass of men in America, would be infinitely too little for the needs of a journal which should attempt to satisfy the prejudices or opinions of each individual of the mass.

Of course we are not saying that no man has ever a right to show his disapproval of the course of his newspaper by refusing to continue his pecuniary support of it. Last summer and fall three of the leading newspapers of New York opposed themselves to the opinions of patriotic duty held by a majority of the Northern people. The Times preached the somnolent platitudes of that melancholy convention in Philadelphia; the Herald's buffoonery was astutely directed against the side that was to win, which to the Herald's managers, whose sagacity appears to be wise for an inch and foolish for an ell, seemed to be the side that was going to lose. As for the Evening Post, it was in a four or five months' maze, and confined itself to repeating the letter of the Constitution—an instrument for which it appeared to think the American people were created. The result was that the three of them, perhaps it would be as well to say the first and the last mentioned of them, no doubt lost a good many of their subscribers. The Tribune, at any rate, gained about 40,000 at about that time, and it seems reasonable to suppose that they were citizens who had been taking a paper before and whose political opinions were opposed to the policy of Mr. Johnson. Now, the persons who thus transferred their allegiance we do not pretend to blame. If you say that they were of the intolerant and stupid kind who kick at correction and criticism and despise instruction, there are half a dozen replies that can at once be made. In the first place, there is hardly a paper in the country, from the Boston Advertiser down to the New York Daily News, which does not allow its news to be more or less colored, with one color or another, in order that the news may match the editorial columns. This is a truth so notorious as to be trite and a truism. Again: among the readers of the Evening Post or the Times there was not in August, September, and October of 1866 a single person who had not been made familiar, almost to nausea, with the wearisome, old, old arguments on the reconstruction question. At this present moment there is no topic in the world so worn out as reconstruction, and at that time the arguments had long been exhausted and were valueless; it was impossible to put complete reliance on the news of any of the opposing journals; a man, then, would have been more than human who, under such circumstances, did not prefer to read the opinions that coincided with his own and the news which corroborated their correctness. Again: the fight between the two parties was then hot, and its event by no means certain; a question of duty was involved, and each man believed the one cause or the other to be the right cause and to have claims upon his support. Support, therefore, was given by many men with the deliberate intention of spreading doctrines in which they believed and the preachers of which they wished to encourage. And some men may have even been philosophic enough to have withdrawn from the offending journals their support with the view of making them take up a new position. If this seems like attributing too much philosophy, we may reply that we attribute it not to the majority of the forty thousand above mentioned, but to the minority; and that if it were a pleasant thing to say, we might add that such tactics have very frequently been successfully brought to bear in the world of newspaperdom.

We go even further; it would be folly to deny any man the right at his own sweet will to give up reading what he dislikes. We agree that it is not a privilege; we admit that it is a natural right of every American citizen to stop his paper the moment it becomes disagreeable to him. But we are decidedly of opinion that more often than otherwise it is rather a foolish thing to do, and that, at any rate, the gentleman who does it has no right to be abusive and does ill to be angry.

SOMETHING ABOUT NEW BUILDINGS IN NEW YORK.

II.

THE huge and costly building of the New York Stock Exchange, fronting on Broad Street, on New Street, and on Wall Street, but reaching to the corners of none of these streets, has been for nearly two years a finished building. It is especially worthy of remark as a typical example of the generation of large buildings which is coming into existence in this unfortunate city—a city which has never yet known how to use its wealth, its energy, and its shrewdness except for the production of more wealth. These new buildings are not more ugly or more absurd than many of the old ones. But they have two faults which are peculiar to themselves: they are enormously expensive and they are fire-proof and practically indestructible. The heinous character of the latter fault must be immediately evident to every one who looks with proper abhorrence on the building we are about to consider or on any of its dozen confrères. But the former fault is many-sided, and all the sides are not perceptible at the first glance. Not only is the good money used in vain, having changed hands without producing any good result in its passage, which is bad economy for a business community, but the buildings are almost sure not to be torn down, at least for many years; they are important enough to influence more or less the character of future buildings; and their influence is felt in still further dulling the public taste, which is always slow to perceive weaknesses and absurdities in buildings which are large and showy and which represent wealthy associations. It cannot be said that anybody loves or admires, for instance, the Broad Street front of the Stock Exchange. But it has an influence over many people, over their opinions, and over their possible future action; over some by making them careless as to what they have, so long as it seems expensive (for is not the rich and powerful Stock Board satisfied with a building that has no other merits than cost and solidity?); over others by making them despair of getting any good architecture out of this generation; and over others by making them believe that this, after all, is the true nineteenth-century architecture. This latter class, a hopelessly unreflective one we cannot but think, is yet larger than people would suppose who have not watched the signs of the times. There is always such a class of true conservatives in the day of every attempted reform. The efforts themselves that are being vigorously made to raise architecture from the slough in which it has stuck and struggled so long, have given courage and voice to the always existent and now awakened reaction.

The building which has been the immediate cause of these remarks is principally known by its Broad Street façade. The lowest story of this, raised only three or four steps above the sidewalk, but very high in the ceiling, has its front of cast-iron of the same character as the cast-iron lowest story of the Herald building, mentioned in our last number. This is, perhaps, worse in detail than that, as nothing can exceed the naked ugliness of the projections which would be keystones of the window-arches if of stone, as they pretend to be; or the overdressed ugliness of the things that would be modillions under the same circumstances; or the poverty in design of the castings, which are meant to look like marble capitals; or the general badness of proportion and form of the three-centred arches, the parapets under the windows, or the prominent and over-conspicuous porch of four big cast-iron columns and a cast-iron pediment. But as nothing but weakness, or worse, can be expected of all ornament which, in cast-iron, is meant to look like carved marble, so these iron shells which mask the real construction are entirely beneath criticism; they are neither architecture nor good building, nor even building at all. But there is one distinction which we may allude to here, the distinction between iron construction where it is needed and where marble would have done as well. In the case of those buildings, stores on narrow streets and the like, where all the light and window space is wanted that can possibly be had, and this especially in the lowest story, the uprights of the lowest story, and perhaps of those above, are rightly made of cast-iron. But in such buildings as those of the Herald and of the Stock Exchange, the piers of the rez-de-chaussée are large enough to be quite safe if built of marble. And why they are not is to us inexplicable, except by the supposition that some iron-casting firm wanted a job and had influence enough to get it.

The façade of which we are speaking is of marble above the first string course. This upper part of it presents the singular and almost unique spectacle of three stories precisely alike in design. We distinguish no difference whatever, except in the slightly flatter curve of the upper than of the lower pediments of the central windows. The design is awkward and feeble, and the detail wholly worthless; but none of it is unusually bad except the cornice, which has a striking deformity wholly its own. It ought to be observed that there is no classical or other good authority for the details or for the proportions of this building. The architects of Renaissance are guiltless of its sins; and there is nothing to palliate them in the practice of any school of revived classic which is generally held worthy of study. What is called, in New York builders' slang, the Corinthian style, is wholly of New York devising. To find an equally flagrant misuse of the revived classical architecture, where all its faults and shortcomings exist without the gracefulness of design which has almost made them seem virtues, we have to go to the semi-savage buildings of St. Petersburg. All over Europe there are very impure pseudo-classic designs, built since the demand for originality has been loud and constant; but they have been built by men who felt, and could not but show, some regard for the beauty of Renaissance or else of Greek detail; and therefore their parts have been good even when their general design has been irrational, or ungraceful, or in every way bad. It is in New York and, as we have said, in Russia that costly and grandiose buildings are at once mean in mass and vile in detail.

The narrow front on Wall Street, consisting of an entrance doorway on the ground floor and two stories of one window each above it, has even less pretension than its larger neighbor to classical correctness of design, and is as "original" as the nineteenth century can ask. It is unusually clumsy, because of the great solidity and largeness of its parts, which yet add nothing to its apparent importance. Thus, the huge pilaster at each side, the heavy brackets of the cornice and pediment, too large and twice too many, the size and character of the mouldings, the elaborate construction around the windows—all are the parts of an architectural Black Dwarf, a stunted giant. The ornament itself is very poor and meagre, and belongs to the worst and coldest school of módern machine carving.

The front on New Street is only two stories high, but the second story contains the Board Room, so that the building holds its own in size. This face, because built of red brick, with plain, square windows, is not so bad as the elaborate façades we have been considering. It is pretty well spoiled, however, by the shapeless and too heavy window heads and sills; and the cornice, which would redeem the whole by its comparative plainness and by its better proportion, seems to be of metal. On this front nearly all that is not plain brick wall is cast-iron imitation of marble, and needs no further consideration.

It is matter of regret that there is nothing about this building that one can praise, for uniform censure is tiresome to writer and reader, and is apt to fail as criticism. But with the heartiest desire to relieve the monotony of blame, we cannot find anything admirable or pleasurable as the result of all this expense and display. There is one thing in the Broad Street front which is pleasant to see at the first glance, the division of its width into three parts, the arrangement of three windows in each story, the middle one the largest; better, one thinks, than four would have been; not a surprising or unusual merit even in a modern design, but still good. But acquaintance with the interior shows that this very grouping of windows, which has seemed the building's one virtue, is, indeed, another architectural sin, for it contradicts the arrangement of the interior and the construction of the building. In the ground-story a girder, and a row of columns to support it, splits the entrance door, while the great staircase is exactly opposite a window; in the second floor the middle window is similarly served; above this a partition divides the building, and the middle windows are divided, half of each in one room and half in another.

The plan, indeed, is very faulty, or rather there is no plan at all beyond what seems a wholly fortuitous concourse of parts. Every staircase, passage, route of every description, is indirect and hard to find; goes somewhere off to one side and out of the way. There is no succession of rooms, no correspondence of openings, no opportunity to see a "vista" or a "suite of apartments" anywhere; the whole building seems to have been planned without any reference to symmetry or centre lines. There are many buildings where this shortcoming, though always a shortcoming, may yet be excused, but in this case there is nothing to atone for it; and stateliness and symmetry of plan once gone, the building becomes what it is, a complete and hopeless failure. The parts within are as bad as the whole; the stairways, doors, and windows (except the mosaic-pattern windows of iron sash and small lights of rough plate-glass in some of the halls), the plaster cornices and centre-pieces, are all of patterns taken from second-class private houses, made large, and yet not always even that. The castings, too, are of the poorest quality and entirely unfinished; for an accessible example, go in through the Wall Street doorway and look at the newel and handrail of the staircase there. There are some good floors of white marble and red slate, and there are the windows above mentioned; and that is all we can find worthy of praise in the inside of this enormous and expensive building. It is probably the worst large building in New York, and one from which we can safely take a departure, assured that everything else will compare favorably with it.

MAN AND GOD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the article on "Popularizing Science," in The Nation of January 10, what seems a singular and extreme position is taken concerning the knowledge of God and his works which is possible to man. The popular books of pious science and scientific piety may, no doubt, contain a great deal of nonsense, for which I have no desire to apologize; but is it true that the creature cannot in any degree apprehend the Creator and come into conscious and intelligent relations to him? If so, let us know it at once. If (as the teaching on page 34 seems designed to prove) man can know nothing of God, if such reason and experience as we have can take no hold on the Giver of both, then we may as well throw up our Bible and our Christianity and sink into a dreary deism, or, what is the same thing, a practical atheism. All this may be answered by Mr. Mill's argument and the comments upon it on page 29 of the same number. If God is a being of attributes, simply inconceivable, neither to be tested nor approached by our standards, he is no God at all for us; and if faith is not founded, however remotely, on reason and knowledge, it is not faith, but superstition.

The position which we are disputing is maintained in the article mentioned, on two grounds: First, that the earth is a very small fraction of the universe, and man a proportionately minute object among created beings. Very probably. There may be in the universe a million other races of rational and immortal creatures, half of them superior to us; they may have unfallen natures; or, if they too fell, redemption may have been provided for them as sufficient as that which is furnished to us. No one will dispute these possibilities; but we have simply nothing to do with them. God says to man, "You are my child; I have made you and redeemed you, and your duties are so and so." The road between earth and heaven is just as clear and open—a Jacob's ladder, as of old—as if between there were not ten thousand unknown planets, peopled, perhaps, with "distant brothers" of our own. The universe is one thing, the earth another; and the earth's economy, though it may be an infinitesimal part of that of the universe, is yet complete in itself as far as regards the moral relations of the dwellers on it. Even in the universe man can scarcely be considered so unimportant as the barnacle in the ocean, at least so long as it continues to be supposed that man has a soul and the barnacle has not. But though in the assembly of worlds he may be comparatively insignificant, on his own planet he is supreme. If we may believe an ancient record, "God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. . . . And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it ; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." If the existent order of facts were not conformable to this plan, we should have discovered it before now. As it is, man has, to a great extent, gained dominion over wild beasts, over winds and waves, over the visible and the hidden powers of nature. And in view of all the facts of experience and statements of revelation, it seems not so utterly absurd to say that, counting out the universe and considering merely this planet, which is all that ordinary men, not savans, have to do with, man is the centre of the scheme, the capstone of creation, with reference to whom, finally and chiefly, the earth was made.

If it be profane to exalt man too high, it is useless and pernicious to sink him too low. We have had nothing truer than that trite line of Young's:

> "How poor, how rich, how abject, how august."

He is what he is ; and if, in the constitution of things, that be not something ideally magnificent, the matter cannot be remedied at present. Within his sphere, such as it is, he must live as he may. After all, he is God's son ; and what a monstrous system of creation that would be which prevented the child from getting at or even enquiring after his father!

The second reason is, forsooth, that investigation is improper, because it often discovers difficulties and produces doubts. Exactly similar is the Oriental philosophy : walking is better than running, and sitting than walking, and lying down than sitting, and sleep than waking, and death than life. That may be ; but since we are alive, we might as well make the best of it. What are we put here for but to live and learn, to investigate, to overcome difficulties, to endure doubts, and by them attain a manlier, more rational, better grounded faith? Every earnest thinker, every intelligent believer, knows that the appointed path is, in one form or another, from night to light, through the darkness of mental conflict to the day of enlightened and enduring faith. The vile dogma, "He that doubts is damned," is by this time put away with the other tools of mediæval torture. What sort of system is this for grown men in the nineteenth century that says, "You must not go out of doors, you might be struck by sun or lightning; you must not travel, the boiler may burst or the stage upset ; you must not go among men, your purity might be corrupted or your pocket picked; you must not think on serious subjects, you may get into difficulties and doubts." Popes nor Puritans ever laid a heavier yoke on free thought and conscience. Professor Cooke is right. "It is not true that the material universe manifests a God of unmixed beneficence." The book of nature shows benevolence indeed, but it shows the contrary too. "Frightful conclusion," is it? There are some people who believe in something which they consider better than the book of nature ; one easier to read and plainer in its teachings, which, without contradicting the other, solves some problems which that had left dark. It tells them to walk by faith and not by sight. Having previously found that walking by sight is impracticable, they take to this counsel kindly, and so ascertain that it is possible to believe in the divine goodness without either pretending, on the one hand, that it can be perfectly proved from a consideration of the material universe or from any experience of this life; or, on the other, that faith excludes investigation—that one can believe the better the less he knows. There are two spurious sorts of reverence afloat, each having or professing in its own way a zeal for God that is not according to knowledge. The one is credulous, gaping after novelty, eager to find a complete system of theology in every clam-shell and tadpole, somewhat as the High Anglicans propose that the church building should by its shape indicate the doctrine of the Trinity. The errors of this are properly enough exposed in the article on "Popularizing Science." The other error, into which the article itself seems to have fallen deeply, lies in saying, "God is so great and you are so small that you can know nothing of him, and have nothing to do with him. To mention his name is to incur the risk of profanity; to study his works, that of unbelief. You respect him best by keeping out of his way; and the only faith you can have must be founded in wilful ignorance." Of these two modes of belief the first is juvenile and unadvised, but commonly sincere; the other has a tendency to drive religion utterly away from a man's words, thoughts, feelings, life. B.

[The answer to the above is that "B." does not truly state the positions of the article in question, and therefore does not confute them. It did not maintain that "the creature cannot in any degree apprehend the Creator, or enter into conscious or intelligent relations with him." It did maintain that naturalists have not discovered, and cannot discover, by the study of the physical universe what was God's object in creating it, and that if they pretend they have discovered this, they impose on their audience.

When anybody tells us that, by the study of plants or animals or rocks, he has discovered something new or certain as to God's purposes in creating and maintaining the universe, he becomes subject to the criticism in the article on "Popularizing Science," but not otherwise. We have never asserted "that God was a being of attributes simply inconceivable." This would be a close approach to nonsense. What we asserted was that he was a Being whose designs were inscrutable, who cannot be found out by any amount of searching. It is only by believing firmly that his designs are inscrutable that we can hold fast to the faith that he is infinitely good. If we know the whole range of his purpose, we must conclude him to be the author of evil ; we do not know the whole range of his purpose, and we may, therefore, still conclude that if we knew all we should see that what appears evil here is, on the whole, really good.

We have not compared man to the barnacle ; man's relations as an animal to the physical universe we have compared to the barnacle's relation to the ocean. But the comparison is not strictly accurate. In comparing the barnacle to the ocean we compare two known quantities ; in comparing man to the universe, we compare a known quantity to one not only unknown but inconceivable. It is only with man as an animal that naturalists have to do. Of man as a moral being naturalists can tell us nothing new, and it is only the moral being who has intelligent relations with his Creator, and the study of these relations is the business of theologians and moral philosophers, and not of naturalists. With the nature of man's soul, or its relations to God, the naturalist has nothing to do. On this subject his science tells him nothing, and what we ask him to do is to desist from pretending that it does. No examination of our physical organs, and no theory of our physical origin, whether by development or instantaneous creation, sheds the least light on our moral relations to God, on our own aspirations or our destiny. All these belong to a different order of ideas—a field in which Agassiz or Darwin or Huxley walks with as uncertain a step as many a man who does not know what the word "vertebrate" means.

Finally, the scientific man has nothing to do with "the useless or pernicious" any more than with the useful. His business is to discover scientific truth, and to declare it; and there is no truth he is bound to declare more faithfully than the exact limit of his own knowledge. Moreover, it ought not to be forgotten, though "B." apparently does forget it, that there is a certain amount of absurdity in our discussing what is and what is not insignificant in God's sight. It is not necessary that man's enjoyment should be the chief end of creation, in order to make him important in God's eyes. To infinite capacity there are no degrees of importance. To our finite capacity there are degrees of importance, because we cannot grasp all the relations of everything we see. We have to select a certain number of these relations for our attention and let the others pass unnoticed ; but it is absurd to suppose that an Almighty Being judges things in this way, or, in other words, that God measures his care of man, or his concern for him, by the smallness of the place he has assigned him in the physical universe. It is only those who hold this doctrine who have a right to be shocked with our dwelling on the exceeding minuteness of the sphere assigned to man and his habitat, and the exceeding smallness of the part they play in God's cosmos. A thousand years may be in the Creator's sight but as one day, and the solar system as but a speck, but yet not a sparrow falls to the ground without his knowledge.—ED. NATION.]

The Week.

THE impeachment business apparently makes progress, though the formal investigation has not yet commenced. Mr. Ashley is presenting his primâ facie case, but we believe nothing or next to nothing is known of his proofs. The reports as to the probable action of the House are very conflicting. Business men who come back from Washington, as a general rule, say there will be no impeachment; while politicians are generally satisfied that there will; and the press is very silent. Meanwhile, the President is giving what the reporters call "state dinners," which, we presume, are something very fine, and has, it is said, invited Messrs. Ashley and Boutwell, having come upon them in their alphabetical order.

THE Senate Tenure of Office bill has passed the Senate and gone to the House, where it has been amended by subjecting cabinet officers to its operation, and making them, as well as all other functionaries, removable only with the advice and consent of the Senate. This bill is undoubtedly one of the most valuable of those of which Mr. Johnson's folly has furnished the occasion, and, coupled with Mr. Jenckes's, would do all that legislation can do for the purification of our politics. The provision with regard to cabinet officers does not make them responsible to the Senate, because as long as the President is responsible they need not be, but it gives the Senate the revision of the President's reaons for removing them. The cabinet officers in America are, in spite of the importance of their duties, clerks of the Executive, and not, as hey are in England, the constitutional advisers of an irresponsible uler; so that the arguments which have been put forward in some quarters in favor of their having seats in Congress in order to defend hemselves or explain their conduct, seem to us to have much less force han is claimed for them, even in view of the pending change. The proper weapons of an American official, when assailed, are pen, ink, and paper. A secretary who cannot confound his enemies on a quire of foolscap, may fairly despair of doing it on his legs in either branch of the legislature. The exception in the bill is said to be made for the enefit of Mr. Stanton, but whatever effect the measure may have on his olitical fortunes, it will hereafter render the desertion of his party by President all but impossible.

THE Tariff bill has got down to the House, where the Senate "amendments" are now under consideration. We hope it may pass with a considerable increase of all the imposts, because we are satisfied that nothing but actual experience of the effect of this kind of legislation through several years will rouse the country into resistance to it. After what has occurred since 1864, we do not believe argument is of much use. We now venture to predict, and we beg our readers to keep it in mind, and if we prove wrong to throw it in our teeth, that the condition of trade and industry will be in no way improved by the present tariff; that during the coming year it will, on the contrary, grow steadily worse, and that next spring and summer all, or nearly all, the interests for whose benefit the present tariff has been framed will be clamoring in the lobby for still higher duties. We are, therefore, in favor of having the experiment fully tried. We feel just as sure of how it will end as we do of the position of the earth in the solar system, although Cardinal Cullen has on several occasions, in a Roman literary journal, exploded the popular Copernican ideas on this subject.

THE bill punishing certain offences in relation to the currency has been passed, but we fear it will prove inoperative, to a great extent at least, owing to Mr. Johnson's tenderness for this species of crime.

MR. JOHNSON, Mr. Sharkey, Mr. Orr, and some other gentlemen are reported to have been hard at work lately devising a plan of reconstruction—we beg their pardon, restoration—which is to become the successor and heir of the President's late policy, and to take the place of all constitutional amendments and other Congressional schemes for giving us national peace. Only hints of what the plan is to be have as yet escaped; but apparently the North is, at any rate, to admit by implication that the South is in a position to treat with the Government, and there is to be no extortion by the United States of irrevocable guarantees of any kind from the States of the former Confederacy. It remains to be seen whether the proposition will even be entertained. For that matter, it remains to be seen whether it will ever even be made. It may be a weak invention of the reporters.

GENERAL GRANT is said to have called a meeting of army officers to consult together upon the necessity of maintaining garrisons in the Southern States. General Grant, it is understood, would like them to be withdrawn. Mr. Williams, of Oregon, offers a bill providing that each State which has been in rebellion shall constitute a military district, in charge of a major-general or brigadier-general, whose duty it shall be, in brief, to exercise an authority paramount to that of all courts in the State. The bill further provides that United States courts may issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of prisoners in military custody in the South only when some commissioned officer on duty in the district where the prisoner is held shall endorse upon the petition a statement certifying that he believes the imprisonment wrongful. To us it seems that the question which of these two plans shall be adopted, is answered when an answer is given to this question: Shall the United States protect from tyrannical abuse, from the most galling and open injustice, those citizens of the South who were and are loyal, and who alone are loyal, or shall it give them over helpless into the hands of people like this man, for instance, who writes in the Richmond Times, the most popular newspaper in Virginia? It is one expression of opinion out of a million similar, or only different in being worse. Texas is the subject of eulogy:

> "There the negroes have not been demoralized by the Freedmen's Bureau and the school-marms. The climate, too, of this magnificent State, although salubrious in the extreme, has been found unhealthy to the few straggling Yankee letter-writers and meddling negrophilists who have ventured there in quest of mischief. They have, in many instances, when they > have stirred up ill-feeling between the races, been mysteriously devoured by wolves and bears, or scalped by the Comanches. The settlers in Texas have bitterly deplored those accidents, but they have not been able to prevent them."

The passage of the bill would, of course, be in effect a declaration of the opinion of Congress that the state of war is not ended, and for that, as well as the other reason, we are free to say we should be glad to see the bill pass.

A FRIEND of Mr. Sumner's thinks we have misrepresented that gentleman in saying, as we did in a recent number, that he had declared in the Senate "that the whole North was eager for impeachment." We only seek to give in our weekly summary the impression which the speeches on which we comment make on an average understanding. Mr. Sumner, in his speech on the Tenure of Office Bill, accused the President of "usurpation in the interest of the rebellion." He said also: "The President has usurped the power of Congress on a colossal scale, and has employed these usurped powers in fomenting a rebel spirit and awakening anew the dying fires of the rebellion. This is the great and unpardonable offence for which history will condemn him if you do not," and so on. As to the remedy for this state of things, he said: "There is not a mail which does not bring letters without number supplicating the exercise of all the powers of Congress against the President. There is not a newspaper which does not exhibit evidence that you are already tardy in this work of necessity." Now, when an orator says that every mail brings innumerable letters asking Congress to use "all its powers" against an usurper in league with the public enemy, and that every newspaper shows that Congress ought to have sooner begun this work of necessity, we think it is not unfair to conclude that the speaker meant in plain English that the great majority of the Northern people—or, to use the common exaggeration, "the whole North"—wanted to have Andrew Johnson impeached. If, however, Mr. Sumner did not mean to say this, we can only express our regret for having imputed it to him.

THE Evening Post seems to think that we have in some way changed our opinions on the reconstruction question since last summer. We are afraid this insinuation indicates want of that familiarity with our files which every good citizen ought to possess. We have maintained ever since THE NATION was started that reconstruction was the work of Congress and not of the President, and that Mr. Johnson, in assuming it, was guilty of usurpation; and we take leave to say that we drew attention to this fact, so far as we know, before any other journal in the country, and when a good many Radicals, who now want to impeach him, wanted him to play the dictator. We have maintained that the negro ought to have the franchise, if, for no other reason, for his own protection, and that the franchise ought to be accompanied by education; that all men are entitled to equality before the law, and that the General Government has no right to collect taxes or exact allegiance of a people whom it cannot or will not protect against violence or oppression; that all attempts to take vengeance on the Southern people, or inflict on them any disabilities which were not clearly necessary to the restoration of order, the security of the Government, and the establishment of justice, are impolitic, unstatesmanlike, unchristian, and inhuman. It is not possible to lay down this last doctrine in stronger language than we laid it down in THE NATION of July 12, 1866, and we have never ceased to reiterate it when the occasion offered. All these positions we still hold and shall continue to hold, but we have never "screamed" about them; in fact, it is our invincible repugnance to "screaming" about political questions which has caused most of whatever obloquy THE NATION has incurred.

AMONGST the memorable things which the pressure on our space prevented us from noticing in our last number was the confession of the New York Tribune that calling a man a "liar" in political discussion was a "gross indecency," "an outrageous offence against the common decency of society," and that "to refuse to censure such a breach of decency is in effect to sanction it." There has been no worse offender in this particular in the civilized world than the Tribune; no journal of equal literary and moral character has done as much to teach those who read it and admire it that coarse and vulgar abuse of a political opponent was harmless; and thus far, therefore, its influence has been decidedly barbarizing. This sudden conversion is the most important triumph the friends of decency have achieved for many a day, but we have always felt it was sure to come sooner or later. The world does not go backwards, and Rome was not built in a day.

ON the 1st of this month, at Hoboken, peace was declared between the Camden and Amboy and New Jersey Railroad Companies. The public at large may expect war more vigorous than ever. For twelve years, more or less, these two great corporations have been fighting—the Camden and Amboy for the completion of its road at the end nearest New York, the New Jersey for the extension of its road at the Philadelphia end; neither having absolute control of a through route between Philadelphia and New York. Uniting their forces whenever it was necessary to carry a scheme beneficial to them both through the Legislature, jointly making and unmaking governors and U. S. senators, even so closely connected in respect to other things as to seem to the general public almost one corporation, the two companies have, nevertheless, been at daggers drawn. The good name of New Jersey has suffered from the vassalage in which the State has been kept; the travelling public has been shamefully abused and imposed upon; but there has hitherto always been the consolation that the one tyrant kept the other in check. The treaty of Hoboken has taken away that comfort. Hereafter both the two will work in union; and their powers are not simply added together, but multiplied many times. Competition has utterly failed to protect us, and Congress is the only source whence the people—for a new road from New York to the southward is a matter of national concern—can expect help. That Congress has all the necessary power to act, we have already, as we think, shown conclusively.

A WRITER in the Boston Advertiser has recently taken occasion to point to the prize offered by THE NATION to the person who shall, under certain conditions, send us in the largest number of subscribers, as proof that we are resorting to a species of lottery in aid of our business. We acknowledged some time ago that the Advertiser's philosophical method was capable of great things when applied to social phenomena, but remarked that it required very delicate handling. In this instance it has left the investigator in ignorance of what, even to the feeble mind of the general public, seems a very obvious distinction. The essence of a lottery lies in the fact that the purchaser of a "ticket" gives nothing for it but a small sum of money, and that whether he will get the prize or not depends, literally, on blind chance—the drawing of a number from a revolving wheel by a blind man or a child. Neither skill, industry, foresight, nor intelligence can affect the result in the smallest degree. The moral and social objections to lotteries are, therefore, the well-known ones which are urged against all gambling. What we have done, however, is to apply to the ordinary practice of paying commissions to persons who send us in subscribers the principle on which all competitive examinations are based. All we ask of a competitor is that he shall do a greater amount of hard work for our benefit than a certain number of other people. There is nothing in the matter of which he may not make sure except the amount of work or the measure of ability possessed by other competitors. Now, this is exactly the plan which is followed at all competitive examinations for prizes in colleges or places in the public service, in the case of prizes offered for essays, and architectural drawings, all over the world. Each candidate is required, in utter ignorance both of the number of those who will appear against him and of the nature of their qualifications, to do his best, and does not know until all is over what others have accomplished. Without uncertainty there would, of course, be no competition for anything. Most of the good things of life, wives included, are won in this way; and we know of no way in which this sort of lottery can be abolished except by the encouragement of a good breed of fortune-tellers, who, by letting everybody know what is going to happen to him, will save him the necessity of all useless exertion.

TWENTY-TWO of the Fenians captured in Canada have been tried and convicted, twenty have been acquitted, forty-nine escaped by rea son of insufficient evidence or because no bill was found, three are awaiting trial, and twelve have been discharged upon bail. Stephens is one day said to be here and another day there. We believe, however, that the truth as to his whereabouts is that he is now at sea in a steamship of the French line between New York and Havre, having been escorted down the harbor about a week since by a party of friends who accompanied him from Brooklyn, where he spent the last of his stay in America, and who returned to this city in the pilot-boat when the steamer's voyage was fairly commenced. The ways of Fenianism are past finding out, and we attempt no explanation of the fact that the accompanying friendly party was in part composed of persons instrumental in the deposition of the C. O. I. R.

The laconic Cable has announced in a single line such social revolutions as the actual abolition of capital punishment in Italy by the National Parliament, and in France the speedy prospect of abolishing imprisonment for debt. Italy is, we apprehend, the only country in Europe in which the death penalty is not employed with more or less frequency. Russia, with a singularity quite remarkable, was for many years a shining example to the contrary, though the substitute which she offered for the gallows would probably seldom have been the free choice of the culprit. It was one of countless contradictions in a nation which cherished at the same time the knout and tolerated slavery everywhere but in the dictionary. We may perhaps concede to the opponents of capital punishment that crime diminishes when the punishment is removed; but we shall still desire to be assured by an experiment in which the commutation to imprisonment for life shall be certainly and inflexibly enforced, and when the criminal whom to-day we think worthy to be hung, and to-morrow to end his days in prison, shall not, on the third day, by Executive pardon, be let loose upon the community.

There is the greatest distress prevailing in England and on the Continent. The bad harvest of last year, the monetary crisis in England, and the extraordinary severity of the winter, are combining to produce an amount of suffering unknown since 1847. Thousands of skilled laborers in London, who are ordinarily able to earn two or three pounds a week, are breaking stones for bare food. Much the same phenomena are witnessed on the Continent. The political effect of this state of things in England is likely to be favorable to reform; and, in fact, the Queen's speech at the opening of Parliament on Tuesday, both announces a commission to enquire into the organizations of workmen and employers, with a view to improvement of the existing laws, and commits the Derby Government to a "free extension" of the elective franchise.

The resignation of Count Belcredi, its acceptance by the Emperor of Austria, and the appointment of the foreign minister, Von Beust, to be president of the council of state, signify a victory won in behalf of a more liberal statecraft over the party of tradition and the status quo; and the credit of this, we suppose, belongs to the promoted minister. The development of his policy has been curiously, perhaps in some quarters of Europe anxiously, awaited, and thus far there has been little to show of achievement and little of promise on the part of Von Beust. But to have separated Francis Joseph from his idols is a monument of labor, at least, if not of high ability; and we shall soon see what the new favorite can accomplish for Hungary, and what he proposes to do to brace the empire to meet the impending "Eastern question."

The Papal Government is, characteristically enough, abusing its last shred of power, in the last days of its wretched existence, by prohibiting Protestant worship in Rome, even in the houses of the foreign ministers. The act has, of course, called forth the strongest denunciations from the press of all civilized countries; but, as might have been expected, it has found defenders in the Fenian organs of this city, who claim for the Pope the same rights in the whole of Rome that Catholics have in their cathedral here; that is, a man may have a right to live and earn his bread in a place where he may not have the right to worship God in his own fashion. We commend this incident to the Tribune and General Banks as a good thing to praise for the sake of the Fenian vote.

THE FREEDMEN.

The result of the investigation of Gen. Sewall, Bureau Inspector, and Hon. W. S. Mason, of Raleigh, into the alleged illegal apprenticing of colored children in North Carolina, is, that the facts warrant the charge; that the children were bound under unlawful indentures, without consulting their parents or allowing them to protest in court. The commissioners recommend the repeal of such provisions of the law of apprenticeship as make discriminations on account of color. A bill to this effect has been introduced into the Legislature, and Gov. Worth is said to favor its passage.

—There is considerable mobility among the laboring population of North Carolina. Scarcity of work and abundance of destitution have induced many of the freedmen to emigrate under contract to Texas, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Tennessee. A movement has also taken place between Roanoke Island and the mainland, that colony having been reduced one-half since last September. This is in consequence of official orders, and is accomplished gradually, that the colonists may not suffer. The New Year dawned upon 118 schools, 122 teachers, and 3,941 pupils in North Carolina.

—The disturbance on the Cheves plantation, South Carolina, culminated on the 30th ult. in a collision in which a lieutenant of the Bureau was shot in the arm and one negro killed. The immediate causes have not transpired.

—The freedmen of Florida are seemingly prosperous, and are very generally renewing their contracts. Their number is constantly increased by arrivals from the adjoining States. The blacks among the Indian tribes of the Everglades are still held in servitude, and have appealed to the military for assistance.

—On the 31st January, the Alabama House of Representatives passed a bill to establish a public-school system, applicable to blacks and whites alike, except that the schools are not to be in common.

—The demand for labor in Mississippi is sufficient to attract immigration. Wages of $10 to $15 a month, with rations, quarters, and medical attendance, are the temptations to freedmen. The latter are industrious, and would be quite contented, except for their being prohibited by law from holding or owning real estate and from carrying fire-arms. Their schools are in good condition. Joseph Davis, a brother of Jefferson, is said to have written a recommendation of his late chattel, Mr. Benjamin F. Montgomery, to the office of postmaster at Davis Bend, he having "discharged the duties of that place from 1855 to 1861, a white man holding the appointment."

—The freedmen in Texas are unrestricted in making contracts. Military officers, in districts where there are no sub-assistant commissioners of the Bureau, are empowered, by a recent order of Gen. Griffin, to act as such. In this way the authority of the Bureau has been greatly extended.

—Obion County, in Tennessee, continues to be the scene of great lawlessness and savagery. In Logan County the blacks are miserably persecuted by "regulators," who plunder, beat, and assassinate at their infernal pleasure. The following is a copy of one species of their torments—a handbill posted in various localities:

I AM COMMITTEE.

1. No man shall squat negroes on his place unless they are all under his employ, male and female.
2. Negro women shall be employed by white persons.
3. All children shall be hired out for something.
4. Negroes found in cabins to themselves shall suffer the penalty.
5. Negroes shall not be allowed to hire negroes.
6. Idle men, women, or children shall suffer the penalty.
7. All white men found with negroes in secret places shall be dealt with, and those that hire negroes must pay promptly, and act with good faith to the negro. I will make the negro do his part, and the white must, too.
8. For the first offence is 100 lashes—the second is looking up a sapling.
9. This I do for the benefit of all, young or old, high and tall, black and white. Any one that may not like these rules may try their luck, and see whether or not I will be found doing my duty.
10. Negroes found stealing from any one, or taking from their employers to other negroes, death is the first penalty.
11. Running about late of nights shall be strictly dealt with.
12. White men and negroes, I am everywhere. I have friends in every place. Do your duty, and I will have but little to do.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Some hitherto unpublished letters of Lord Chesterfield have been lately printed in the Athenæum, all but one of which are addressed to his niece Gertrude, the wife of Mr. Welbore Ellis Agar. They put in no more favorable light Lord Chesterfield's morality, which has been the subject of so many diatribes, but are filled with pleasant, easy gossip on the people of the time, many of whom were distinguishing themselves in unenviable ways. One of these letters shows us that the earl's sobriety, which has been so much praised by his eulogists as an exceedingly great virtue in days when drunkenness was positively in fashion, was less owing to a religious disposition or good taste than to a weak stomach. He made a virtue of necessity, and gave up wine in order to cure himself of the vertigo.

—Victor Cousin, one of the most distinguished of modern philosophers, is dead, at the age of seventy-four. He was born in Paris in 1792, and early distinguished himself at school. In 1812 he was made assistant professor of Greek in the Normal School; in 1814, master of the conferences; and in 1815, deputy professor of philosophy in the Sorbonne, to succeed Royer-Collard. In 1820 his lectures were suspended on account of the supposed anti-monarchical tendencies of his views on free-will. After the revolution of 1830 he was restored to his chair, made a Councillor of State, a member of the Council of Public Instruction, was decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor, and was elected a member of the French Academy. He was subsequently made a peer of France, and director of the Normal School, in which capacity he reorganized the whole system of primary instruction in France. In 1840 he sat in the Thiers cabinet as Minister of Public Instruction. His works are very numerous. He translated Plato, and Tennemann's "History of Philosophy," published many series of lectures on philosophy, and a series of studies on Jacqueline Pascal, Mme. de Longueville, Mme. de Sablé, and other great Frenchwomen. Translations of several of his philosophical works have been published in this country.

—Mr. Henry Bradshaw, of the Cambridge University Library, has made two noteworthy discoveries in that library. He has found some fragments of a Troy Book, written by John Barbour, the Scottish poet, intermixed with Lydgate's poem, in all about 2,200 lines. The evidence leaves not the slightest doubt of the authorship. Subsequently, in a MS. at Oxford, Mr. Bradshaw found 1,200 lines more of the same poem. The other finding is 40,000 lines of "Lives of the Saints," also by John Barbour. Were all librarians of English libraries as industrious as Mr. Bradshaw, many more valuable relics would doubtless be brought to light.

—Mr. R. Morris has done a very useful work for students of the English language in the book which has just been published as one of the Clarendon Press series, "Specimens of Early English, selected from the chief English Authors, A.D. 1250–1400; with Grammatical Introduction, Notes, and Glossary." A book of this kind has long been needed for our colleges and higher schools, and even advanced students have never before had the results of late study on the earlier English writers thus compactly set forth. Mr. Morris has noted and classified with great care the specialties of the early dialects, arranging them under the three heads of Northern, Midland, and Southern. The outlines of the Early English grammar are, however, based on the Southern dialect only. To each declension and conjugation is added the Anglo-Saxon one from which it was degraded, so that its origin is clearly seen. After treating all the parts of speech, Mr. Morris introduces a set of sentences as exercises on the grammar, and then begins his specimens. These include passages from every important work of the period, and are very fully and correctly annotated, with a complete glossary. It is proposed by the Oxford University Press to issue as a companion volume to this of Mr. Morris's a series of extracts illustrating the manners and customs of Early England. The idea is to make another chrestomathy of Early English, which shall give the boy or student the fullest possible picture of English home-life in the Middle Ages.

—Memoirs, even if they bring to light no new historical facts, are always interesting, because they are animated by the life of the time of which they speak, and reflect its character and paint the peculiar views of an actor in them. History rectifies their errors of detail, but the general impression remains in the mind, and we cannot thoroughly understand any epoch and its men unless we have studied them both in the historians and in the memoirs. The writer of the memoirs may not have genius, but he is not less troubled by the agitations of his age, and even if he does not write with art, through the brokenness of his style, or even the dryness of his narration, we catch sight of the man, and can reconstruct his individuality itself, independent of the details the book contains—a new index of the times gone by. It is for this reason that there is great interest in the "Journal d'un curé ligueur de Paris, sous les trois derniers Valois," which M. Edouard de Barthélemy has unearthed and annotated, and published by Didier, at Paris. It gives useful indications of the time, and especially expresses well the feeling of intolerance which was its most salient characteristic. Its author, Jehan de la Fosse, was priest of the Church of St. Barthélemy, in the centre of old Paris, just opposite the Palace. He was attached to the League and followed it with approbation in all its excesses. Zealous and ardent, he set no bound to his fanaticism and his hatred of heresy, and was opposed to every compromise or movement towards conciliation. He approves of and finds a sort of comfort in the numerous executions. He relates with a visible satisfaction the death of Jeanne d'Albret, and he does not neglect to tell us, letting it be thought an instance of divine punishment, that the Queen of Navarre died after having prevented the procession of the Fête-Dieu from passing her windows, "la maladie luy prit," he adds, "et en mourut le lundy d'après." The massacre of St. Bartholomew seems to him a very ordinary event, and there is reason to suppose that in the general excitement and trouble this horrible day did not have the importance that history has since so justly given it. Jehan de la Fosse speaks of it as a simple episode of the disturbed times: "Il y eust ce jour là, qui estoit le jour de Saint-Barthélemi, plusieurs grands seigneurs tués, lesquels avoient faict la mesme faulte que l'amiral. . . . Il y eust en ce jour beaucoup, tant hommes que femmes, tués et jetés à la rivière." The death of Coligny he relates in its minutest circumstances, plainly showing that he was an eye-witness of the indignities offered to the body. His fury continued through the reign of Henry III., opposing all that king's mild measures, and thus records his death: "Le 1ce doût fut tué Henri de Valois, par un simple religieux des Jacobins nommé frère Jacques Clément, natif de Paris, et ce par permiscion divine, consideré que ledict de Valois estoit de son naturel fort cruel et vindicatif, ne respirant aultre chose en son cœur que mauvaiseté et vengeance, principalement contre la ville de Paris dès le jour des Barricades." These terrible twenty-seven years taught him nothing; he refused to recognize Henry IV. as king, and was expelled from Paris. Here his journal ends, and all other trace of him is lost.

—The new German Christmas publications have not been so noteworthy this year as usual. Of the illustrated works the best is the "Journey in Pictures," a series of eighteen well-executed chromolithographs designed by Hermine Stilke. The traveller, starting in spring-time from an imaginary lake in Germany, is conducted by his pleasing courier through the Hartz and along the Rhine to Switzerland, thence through Italy by way of Rome and Naples, back towards Salzburg and Prague, returning home in the depth of winter. The name of the "Düsseldorf Artists' Album" has been changed to the "German Artists' Album," as the present volume (XVI.) of that well-known annual contains contributions from many artists who have never been connected with the Düsseldorf school. The two books which are attracting the most attention are the "Dörchläuting," a narrative in the Mecklenburg dialect by Herr Reuter, and Freytag's "Mittelalter." The first is one of those books of which one can give no idea except by quotations. Absolutely without plot, it is only a series of pictures, to which the quaint dialect in which it is written has given a pleasing vividness. The "Mittelalter," by Gustav Freytag, is introductory to his already published "Bilder aus der deutschen Vergangenheit" and "Neue Bilder aus dem Leben des deutschen Volkes." As these are being translated into English, we shall soon have an opportunity of reading them and of forming our own opinions. It is to be hoped that their English interpreter will do his work more skilfully than the one who rendered "Soll und Haben" into "Debit and Credit."

—A new edition of the "Compendium der vergleichenden Grammatik der Indo-germanischen Sprachen" (Compendium of the Comparative Grammar of the Indo-Germanic Languages), by Professor Schleicher, of Jena, has just been published. To be out of print in less than two years after publication is a rare honor for a scientific book in Germany. Professors Kuhn, Curtius, of Leipzig, and Meyer have assisted the author in the preparation of this new edition, which contains quite material alterations, especially in regard to the word formation of the old Bactrian and Persian languages. The first volume of Professor Bopp's new edition of his "Sanscritum Glossarium" is out; the second will appear early next year. The great advances made in the study of Sanscrit during the twenty years that the old edition has been in use have, of course, demanded an entire revision of the text. A new impression of his "Comparative Grammar," translated into English by Mr. Thomas Wright, and into French by M. Bréal, is also promised. The interesting fragment of Bhagavatî, discovered by Prof. Weber, is said to show that the Jaina religion differs from the other Indian religions in toto. A number of Roman inscriptions has been uncovered at government expense at Tria, on the Rhine. That they are not original, and that their forger knew so little of Latin that he has made many grammatical mistakes, has been quite conclusively shown by Professors Mommsen, of Berlin, and Brambe, of Freiburg (Baden). The latter has just published a very readable "Sammlung der römischen Inschriften im Rheinland" (Collection of the Roman Inscriptions in the Rhine Countries). The latest text-books are two Latin grammars, by Professor Neue, of Dorpat, in Russia, and by Professor Bücheler, of Greifswald. A new edition of Professor Curtius's "Griechische Etymologie" is in press.

—The small remnant of the past generation of Berlin men of the town read lately the announcement of the death of Herr Kranzler, whose café, during the quarter of a century preceding 1850, was their rendezvous. Situated in the most frequented part of "Unter den Linden," and protected, by the standing of its customers, from all intrusion of lewd fellows of the baser sort, Kranzler's conditorei was even as far back as 1820 the favorite resort of the beaux and wits of the city. While they sipped their coffee or chocolate after dinner, outside in summer and behind the windows in winter, they discussed till 1830 the merits and demerits of Roman Catholicism and Protestantism. About 1830 literary matters began to supply them absorbing themes; then a new opera, a new play, or even a new song, or a new ballet dancer, was sufficient to arouse them all. About 1837 it became à la mode to talk of Hegel, and to puzzle one another with questions suggested by his subtle theories. Kranzler's friends had become weary of this unsubstantial pabulum when '48 came with its queries and suggestions. After the uprising in 1848, political discussions were tabooed in open places, so the pleasant corner was resigned to the officers of the guard, who have passed it over to bankers and merchants. Every now and then some old gentleman revisits the place, and, as he comes away, speaks with a sneer of the conversations he now hears of stock companies and of inventions, of which the old habitués never spoke or knew. Those pleasant reunions are things of yore, and though many could be found willing to take the mantle of him who did so much to make them pleasant, none could wear it now.

We have read with more than common interest the third annual report (1866) of the Superintendent of Free Schools in the State of West Virginia. Extraordinary difficulties beset the establishment of a good school system in this newly-organized commonwealth. The war, the deranged currency, the poor schools already in existence, the scattered population of many extended districts, the absence of books and newspapers, and the general apathy in respect to intellectual culture, were a part of the obstacles which embarrassed the friends of progress. Judging from the report, the lead has been taken by the right sort of men. Three hundred and fifteen school-houses were erected during the year, and two hundred more are in progress. A normal school, teachers' institutes, an educational journal, and a State board for the examination of teachers, are demanded. To induce teachers to establish themselves in the less attractive districts, it is proposed to offer teachers homesteads at low prices. The greatest difficulty of all is to secure local school officers competent and efficient.

The city of Wheeling has for some years past stood well in educational matters, and its example is likely to be of value throughout the State. We wish every one of the Southern States could show as good a beginning in the way of public instruction as this rising State. The boldness with which the phrase "free schools" is made a part of the official title of the department, instead of the more usual terms "public schools" and "common schools," is a significant sign of "the freedom" now enjoyed by a community long fettered.

—The sixth biennial report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Illinois presents the statistics for 1865–6. The expenditures in these years were above seven and a half million dollars, nearly four and a half million having been spent in 1866. The number of pupils in the schools, in proportion to the whole number of persons between six and twenty-one years of age, was a little larger in the latter year than in the former. The re-employment of male teachers in schools which, owing to the demands of the war, were put under charge of women, accounts for an increase of 653 in the number of masters, while the number of female teachers became less by 389. Private schools have decreased thirteen per cent., while graded schools have increased twenty per cent. The number of pupils in public and private schools is about 635,000 for 1866. The number of districts is a little less than in 1865. The Superintendent, Hon. Newton Bateman, strongly urges the adoption of the township as the unit for school affairs. Thirty-eight thousand officers are required to carry on the present system. The need of added help in the Superintendent's office (no deputy has ever been allowed in that great State), agricultural colleges, the relation of colleges to public schools, the Normal University, are among the topics here vigorously discussed.

BAYARD TAYLOR IN COLORADO.*

Mr. Ross Browne, we believe, is afraid, at any rate he represents himself as being afraid, to return on his old track of travel and go back to the people of Nevada and other Rocky Mountain districts. Another and greater Browne, A. Ward, is, if we are not mistaken, persuaded in his own mind that it would be highly inexpedient for him to revisit the Land of the Honey Bee or to ride again across the Plains. We fear that the population at various points along the route of Mr. Bowles look on that excellent traveller as a calumniator and regard him with undissembled hostility. For our far Western people hotly resent the telling of harsh truths about them and their domain, and would have none but good accounts of them go forth to their fellow-countrymen and the rest of mankind. This desire, said to be strong in all Americans, is in the breast of the Western man particularly strong. He loves the place of his residence—too often "he loves and he rides away"—with a proud fondness, a fervor of affection that seems nearly unaccountable. Among us of the seaboard, only the Bostonians, we imagine, can be compared in this respect with the more permanent residents of Chicago or Cincinnati, or St. Louis or Buckskin Joe, or Black Hawk or Golden City or Central City, or whatever other cities are "bound to be the biggest in the whole West, sir." The reasons for this state of feeling we do not propose to seek. As for Mr. Taylor, the latest traveller into those parts, we should say that if he wants to live honored and die happy, he could not do better than fix his future abode in Colorado or any other point west of the Mississippi. He displays an admiration for that region which must make him a host of friends there. For instance, the liberality of sentiment displayed in the following passage ought to procure for him, from every journal in the mining districts, the encomium of being "a most genial critic and acute observer" of Western life and manners:

> "The people pointed out to me a tree to which some of them had hung a Mexican, last week, on account of an attempted assault upon two ladies of the place. The criminal was taken from the sheriff's hands and lynched; and the few remaining Mexican residents, who appear to have had no fellowship with him, are ordered to leave the place. Affairs of this kind make an unpleasant impression."

About "square meals," which appear to consist mainly of pork-fat fried brown, coffee black and strong, and biscuits described by the Colorado landlords as being "sad"—that is, we presume, heavy to a melancholy degree—he is very outspoken, and he is wonderfully disgusted with what he considers the "vulgar and snobbish" habit prevailing between Illinois and California of calling every little collection of houses a "city;" but on almost all topics of which he treats he is enthusiastically commendatory. The scenery, the soil, the air, the mineral wealth, the glorious prospects of these Rocky Mountain territories delight him. As vision after vision of beauty unfolds itself to the eye of the traveller, he pays them compliments which the pleased frontiersmen will, no doubt, accept as eagerly as an ordinary Congressman the editorial article which likens him to a patriot of Plutarch's or the mother of the Gracchi. Naturally, they will rejoice on being told that Lawrence and the country about it reminded Mr. Taylor of a picture from Europe; that another part of Kansas recalled to his memory the valleys of Epernay; that Pike's Peak seemed to him to resemble that of the Jungfrau; that, save the hills of Palestine in May, he had seen nothing to equal the immense prairie gardens of natural bloom; that the average height of the Rocky Mountains exceeds the height of the Alps; that the fresh, delicious air of the Plains rivals the breeze of the Sahara itself; that in Colorado there are ledges resembling the Apennines of the Old World; that the best hotels of New York are no better than the Pacific Hotel in Denver City; that ladies accustomed to the air and scenery and society of that town return to Denver with joy after an absence in the East; that, finally, the wonders of Colorado have never yet been half explored, and the mineral riches of that territory and its neighbors are beyond computation; that the western portions of Iowa and Missouri and the States of Nebraska and Kansas constitute the largest unbroken tract of splendid farming land in the world, and that Colorado is so rapidly increasing in population, and shows herself so well able to support population as fast as it comes, that neither the veto power, nor any other power, will long be able to keep her out of the Union.

* "Colorado: A Summer Trip. By Bayard Taylor." New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1867. 16mo, pp. 185.

All this is encouraging, and, judging by the glimpses Mr. Taylor gives us, we are disposed to agree with him in holding a very high opinion of the future of these regions as parts of the Republic, and of their present excellence in point of natural wealth and beauty. The volume is composed of letters written for the New York Tribune by Mr. Taylor during a summer's trip, and is now republished, he informs us, chiefly for the use of Colorado readers. For them it will have an interest by reason of its many local details which for us here it does not possess. There are some facts in it not known before, and, as such, worth knowing. But the fact is that any book which shall be written now about Colorado, in order to be of any great or permanent value, must be written in a way the reverse of desultory and hasty. It would be possible to prepare now a valuable, probably a pretty nearly exhaustive, report on the fauna and flora of Colorado, its mineral resources, its climate, its soil and productions, the advantages it offers to immigrants, and so forth; but such a report would have to be prepared by accomplished and laborious scientific explorers and observers. Any description of the present state of society there a very few years, we may almost say a very few months, would render obsolete. The remaining thing possible to be done now is to give a vivid description of the existing civilization and a very general account of the region, its scenery, soil, and the rest. This well done would be entertaining, if not particularly useful, reading. Two months' travel, however, would hardly fit a man for doing it, and the book before us seems to us not a great success in that direction. We do not regard the failure as a thing much to be regretted; Colorado can wait.

In conclusion, we may add that Mr. Taylor's known abilities in the way of description, often before exercised on subjects we dare say more to his taste, have not failed him. It is true at any rate that in this case they seem to have been employed more sparingly than would have been agreeable, somewhat too infrequently to relieve the rather tiresome journal of travel. We append a graphic description of a sudden storm on the Plains:

> "The green of the Plains here began to be varied with belts of dark purple, which we found to be what is called 'bunch grass,' a very fine and wiry growth, but said to be excellent forage. At a distance it resembled the heather bloom on the English moors. Over these brilliant green and purple tints the snowy fortresses of chalk started up with a dazzling effect. There is not the least approach to monotony in the scenery of the Plains; but continual, inspiring change.
> "We were to have another new experience that day. Our route, for some distance, lay over an elevated plateau, around which, for an hour or two, dark thunder-clouds collected. Out of one of these dropped a curtain of rain, grey in the centre, but of an intense indigo hue at the edges. It slowly passed us on the north, split, from one minute to another, by streaks of vivid rose-colored lightning, followed by deafening detonating peals; when, just as we seemed to have escaped, it suddenly wheeled and burst upon us.
> "It was like a white squall on a tropic sea. We had not lowered the canvas curtains of the coach before a dam gave way over our heads, and a torrent of mingled wind, rain, hail, and thunder overwhelmed us. The driver turned his mules as far as possible away from the wind, and stopped; the coach rocked and reeled as if about to overturn; the hail smote like volleys of musketry, and in less than fifteen minutes the whole plain lay four inches under water. I have never witnessed anything even approaching the violence of this storm; it was a marvel that the mules escaped with their lives. The bullets of hail were nearly as large as pigeons' eggs, and the lightning played around us like a succession of Bengal fires. We laid the rifles in the bottom of the coach, and for half an hour sat in silence, holding down the curtain, and expecting every moment to be overturned. Then the tornado suddenly took breath, commenced again twice or thrice, and ceased as unexpectedly as it came."

DRAWING-BOOKS FOR SCHOOLS.*

THE two books whose titles are given below belong to a class which seems to have nearly superseded the "drawing books" of our childhood, with their gates and churns and cottages in coarse outline, followed by the same things "shaded." There are, fortunately, but few teachers of drawing now who still teach "drawing from the flat," as the euphemistic expression is for making bad copies of worthless lithographs. Not that there is actually no sale for drawing cards and the like; they still go off rapidly enough, and there still are schools where such things are used, but it is almost confessedly as a means of using up unoccupied time. Children who have six hours to stay in school, but whose lesson-getting capacity is gauged by four hours' recitation, may as well play with lead-pencils and paper as with anything else for the rest of the time.

The "object-lessons" of these and similar books are open to the suspicion of being used very often in the same way. The young children for whom such lessons are intended are sent to school rather to be kept out of mischief than to be taught; and the earlier lessons of both these books seem meant for innocent pastime rather than instruction. There is always a certain nonsensical look about these great machines for producing small results. We dimly remember that in one of the "Rollo Books," Mrs. Holiday teaches little Thanny to "take notice" by exhibiting oranges and the like. But the necessity of such a system is hardly obvious, because, whether "to read and write comes by nature" or not, the faculty of observing certainly does, and that betimes. It undoubtedly needs culture; and learning to draw is undoubtedly the one specific for cultivating it aright. But then it must be learning to draw in earnest, by trying to represent things which exist, as they exist. Now, let us look at Mr. Goodison's book. The first lesson will pass; it is a good first lesson and rightly put, the dialogue between teacher and pupils intelligently contrived to attract the pupils' attention. A slate is to be abstractly rendered by two parallel lines for top piece of frame, two at right angles with these for the left-hand side, and so on; and the space within the supposed frame is to be shaded a little to suggest the dark slate itself. This is good. The children are taken right "to nature," so to speak. A well-defined solid object is offered them, and they are shown how to seize some vital points of it, straightness of sides, rightness of angles, and even something of what a painter would call its "local color." Then, for fifteen lessons we find alternately such object-lessons as the fires, school-room doors, and windows to be represented, and, alternately with these, exercises of parallel lines, etc.; passable practice. In Lesson XVI. we are told to draw a room end, which is described. In Lesson XVIII., a building, also from description. And then follow similar lessons, in which things are to be drawn from memory, from rules given, and even from pasteboard models. The teacher is instructed to make models in pasteboard or shingle of a board fence, picket fence, a ladder, a pair of shears, a clock, one side of a wagon. Now the difficulty with this sort of work is that the pupils are directly led away from nature and facts. The good start given by the first few lessons will be soon lost to the class who go on with such trifling as this. To make the children put down lines from your vague description or vaguer pasteboard model of a somewhat complicated object is not drawing at all; it is not even object-lesson teaching. And, just as the first lesson led children to observe the essential facts about a slate, so these lessons will teach them to ignore the essential facts about an ox-yoke or a bucksaw, which are represented to them as flat silhouettes (for so we understand the idea of pasteboard models) and not as solid bodies. The tendency is always farther and farther away from the nature of things and from the appearance of things—which are the two lessons to be learned from practice in drawing—and nearer and nearer to the system of drawing

* "Drawing from Objects. A Manual for the Teachers and Pupils of the Common Schools. By Professor John Goodison." New York: Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co. 1866.

"Principles of Linear and Perspective Drawing for the Training of the Eye and Hand. Adapted for the use of Public and Private Schools. By William B. ~~Towle~~." New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1866. Fowle which the author truly says in his preface is vicious, copying representations and descriptions of things instead of things themselves.

In the second part the bad tendencies of the first part are carried farther, although, still like the first part, it begins well. The pupils are shown how to prepare geometrical solids for themselves. But the next step is not going to work to draw them carefully, but learning a long lesson on the first principles of perspective. And these principles are not clearly stated. Insufficient and trivial as they are in themselves—the principles of a pseudo-science, useful to know a little of, but a terribly dangerous staff to trust to, used by workmen like a pocket-knife, which will do a few things that no other tool will do so handily, but very limited in its uses—slight as these rules are, they are mixed up with a number of arbitrary directions not needed in this place, and these pages of the second course are little more than a burden upon the memory. The best perspective, as we have said, is a very ignoble thing—art, or science, or whatever it is—but the book before us gives to its students page after page of a false kind of perspective, a sham perspective, which is of no use whatever. No method of mathematical perspective drawing which is in common use gives actually true results in all cases; but this is a process which cannot by any possibility ever give a true result. Every student of drawing will understand what this is when we say that it consists of drawing in elevation one face of the object under treatment, and showing other faces as bounded by vanishing lines. One diagram showing this plan may be useful in a treatise on perspective. And once, in the course of a tolerably long familiarity with all the tricks and changes of mechanical drawing, we found this way of drawing a machine, though wholly false, yet handy. But it has no business whatever in this book. It is doubtful if any word about perspective has, though without it the book would be of noticeably smaller size. Three-quarters of it are devoted to rules and problems of perspective. And in all this we have found only two or three hints at that real perspective which has the value of producing approximately truthful results.

We need hardly say that the author's praise of perspective drawing in the beginning of the Third Course (p. 38) seems to us wholly misapplied and wrong. In learning "drawing from objects," the laws of perspective are about as useful as the laws of optics—that is, very seldom of any use at all.

Mr. Towle's book is almost entirely a treatise on popular applications of geometry. The first "class" has to do with squares, triangles, rhombs, etc., not as things to work out theorems with, but as things to draw on the blackboard from description. The second class is devoted to prisms, pyramids, and the like; the third class, to circles and their tangents and divisions; the fourth class, to solids of circular section. All this is well; it can be rapidly gone through—and much time ought not to be spent upon it—but it is a very good way to teach children a little about geometry while they also use pencil and ruler with increasing dexterity. With the fifth class we begin to find trouble. A number of profiles of architectural mouldings are given, and, although we do not accept the author's nomenclature, that is of small importance. But there follows these a "pedestal," then a vase, an ewer and basin, a bowl, etc., which figures are all in outline and shown as flat, though carefully described as round, and whose outlines are reduced, as far as possible, to circles, ellipses, and straight lines. The drawings are wretched, and cannot be used as models to copy from, but it does not seem meant that they should be. "The body is formed of a half ellipse, surmounted by a fancy curve," is said of a soup tureen (here called a Turenne, as if named after the Maréchal, "a highly merited compliment," as Holmes would say); it appears that something is to be made to suit the pupil, or perhaps the teacher, which must, however, be semi-elliptical below and "fanciful" above. These words, fancy and fanciful, are favorite words with the author, and describe every form not to be mathematically classified.

The sixth class introduces four of the dear old five orders, which are named, and then briefly described in words of which the ignorant brevity is delicious. And we are told that these orders of architecture are "modes of arranging the parts of a building;" that "each has three principal parts," of which "the pedestal is often omitted and its place supplied by a plinth only;" that in this latter case "the order is reduced to two parts only," and so on for two pages. There is an essay on modules, and some extraordinary statements therein contained, as, for instance, that in the Ionic order "the intercolumniation, or space between the bases of two columns, is 4⅔ modules!" That is excellent, and there are a number of such funny things throughout this brief treatise on classical architecture. It ends with a plate of the four favored orders, from which, like Macbeth's face, men may read strange matters and get strange ideas of Mr. Towle's architectural authorities.

Those who remember that famous Western high road which tapered off to a by-road, a cart-track, a horse-trail, a footpath, and finally ended in a squirrel track and ran up a tree, will be able to form an idea of the way in which this book descends from its architectural flights to various empirical maxims for the drawing of ellipses and sham ellipses made up of areas of circles; then to perspective, for a dozen pages, with no more than usual success, that is, no success at all; and ends in very simple problems in arithmetic applied to geometrical forms. But the squirrel track is the best worth following, for it is well to learn how to find the area of a square or the solid contents of a cube, and these final pages are a sort of appendix to the school arithmetic books, some of which works have nothing of the kind. The author's inaccurate way of using words and treating his subject follows him even here, as when he calls a cube a "solid square," as when (p. 81) he leaves his pupils to extract the square root as they can or if they can, not even hinting that it is sometimes harder to do than in the case he gives (25), and as when this astonishing problem is stated—to find the circumference of a circle when lengthened out into a right line!

It is a crying evil that such worthless school-books as these should find publishers, and in the regular way of trade should be advertised and puffed until they are adopted in schools, and begin to confuse and distract the minds of all the good scholars. The idle ones take care of themselves, and at twenty are healthier than the good ones, and have not lost much by giving such books as these the go-by.

THE MAGNOLIA.*

THIS is not the magnolia grandiflora; Wordsworth's towering

. . . . "magnolia spread
High as a cloud, high overhead."

It is rather, as the device proclaims which adorns the cover of the volume, the beautiful sweet-bay, as we have heard them call it in the Carolinas, which hides itself in remote spots and fills with delicious breath the places where it blooms half concealed. The book is a collection of some twenty or thirty poems by Dr. Thomas W. Parsons, whose true rank among American poets is far higher than his recognition as a poet is widespread.

But his merits are not such as have ever commanded popularity; indeed, they are not of the highest order, although it is true that some of them are of the rarest order. The essential poetical quality, imagination, which has been defined as having a two-fold operation, that of giving feelings, thoughts, and sentiments embodiment in sublime and beautiful poems, and on the other hand that of clothing the material universe with spiritual meanings which the soul furnishes—this highest power he possesses, but he does not possess it in full measure. And perhaps, too, he feels in himself that lack which, in his latest poem, one printed in the last number of "The Galaxy," he seems to attribute to another, when he says:

"And something rough and resolute and sour
Must with the sweetness of the soul combine,
For, although gentleness be part of power,
'T is only strength makes gentleness divine."

There is nothing in his verse that positively indicates this weakness unless we assign that character to some mild little jests that may be found here and there; but negative indications there are. Strength and justness of thought are not wanting, and no weak nature ever attained such precision of thought and such mastery of language; the words, nicely chosen, exactly fit. But such mastery may be reached by a nature not very strong, but which, well balanced, cultured to a high degree, marked by modesty and reserve, has learned the limitations of its strength and wisely refuses tasks beyond it. Scholarly, then, thoughtful, rich in delicate, melancholy sentiment, models, in their somewhat limited range, of the right use of English; delightfully calm, full of goodness, but without heat of passion or high flight of imagination or great force of thought, these poems please rather than stir the soul, and it is no wonder that the circle which they please is small. And it is for us, and not for the author, to be sorry that half a dozen names of poets—half a dozen of whom would not make one like him—overlay his name and keep it hid from the eyes of most. We could wish for room in which to lay before our readers some of Mr. Parson's longer poems, that, for instance, "On a Bust of Dante," to which the best judges give the highest praise, and which would deserve a place in the most critically selected treasury of American poetry. But here is a brief strain of graceful poetry, which the last line mars, that we copy from some stanzas addressed to spring lilacs:

"Thy perfume, like a flageolet
That once by dark Bolsena's lake,
  What time the sun made golden set,
  I heard (and seem to hear it yet),
A thousand memories doth awake
  Of busy boyhood's vanished powers;
    Of young ambition flushed with praise;

> Of old companions, and of hours
> That had the sunshine of whole days!
> Of Italy, and Roman ways;
> Of Tuscan ladies, courteous, fair,
> And kind as beautiful—forbear,
> O Memory!—those impassioned eyes!
> Beware! for that way madness lies."

An allusion in another stanza of this poem leads us to observe that, owing to the way in which the materials for this volume were gathered, it affords not so good means of judging the poet as other volumes of his which were originally intended for the public eye. We close with the following fine poem, "Her Epitaph," finished—except that it is unliterary and marked by a most natural ease—almost as Gray himself might have finished it; in which grief is tempered and colored and made beautiful by imagination; in which resignation is so sweetly expressed that the poem ought to become a classic:

> "The handful here, that once was Mary's earth,
> Held, while it breathed, so beautiful a soul
> That, when she died, all recognized her birth,
> And had their sorrow in serene control.
> "'Not here! not here!' to every mourner's heart
> The wintry wind seemed whispering round her bier;
> And when the tomb door opened, with a start
> We heard it echoed from within—'Not here!'
> "Shouldst thou, sad pilgrim, who mayst hither pass,
> Note in these flowers a delicater hue,
> Should spring come earlier to this hallowed grass,
> Or the bee later linger on the dew,—
> "Know that her spirit to her body lent
> Such sweetness, grace, as only goodness can;
> That even her dust, and this her monument,
> Have yet a spell to stay one lonely man,—
> "Lonely through life, but looking for the day
> When what is mortal of himself shall sleep;
> When human passion shall have passed away,
> And Love no longer be a thing to weep."

The volume in which these pieces are bound is a beautiful one. It was prepared by friends of the poet as a gift to him, and has the thick paper, the immense margins, the careful printing (and whatever else makes books handsome), which in a volume designed to answer such an end seem entirely fit. As may be supposed, but very few copies are on sale—some at Little & Brown's, in Boston, some at the store of Mr. Francis, in Broadway.

NOTES ON THE NEW EDITION OF WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

NUMBER XI.—STATISTICS OF THE VOCABULARY.

In entering upon this fruitful subject, I think it right to repeat the declaration, that I do not seek for errors or omissions, but point out only such mistakes and defects as accident has brought under my notice. At the same time, in order to count and classify the words composing the vocabulary, a somewhat careful examination of the word-list must be made, and in this process imperfections which have not yet betrayed themselves to me will doubtless be detected. All such will be noted in the order in which I fall upon them, without attempt at any more systematic arrangement.

Some of the difficulties in the way of making an actual enumeration of the words in any given dictionary have already been mentioned. It is probable that others will arise as I proceed in my task, and as I must go quite through the letter A before giving results, it seems to me that I shall make myself best understood by discussing questions as they come up in the course of the enumeration, and thus illustrating the principles and rules I follow by showing the application of them in actual practice.

The problem proposed is to determine the number of words rightfully introduced into this vocabulary as English, to point out the proximate etymological sources from which they have been taken, and to distribute them into grammatical classes. For a complete census of the vocabulary many other points ought to be considered; but we must stop somewhere, and there is room for the fear that what I have already proposed will overtask the patience of the reader.

To begin, then, with the first page of the dictionary. The separate titles or articles are as follows: A, Aam, Aard-vark, Aaronic and Aaronical; Aaron's-rod; Ab, Latin prefix; Ab, noun; Abaca, Abaciscus, Abacist; Aback, adverb; Aback, noun; Abacot, Abactor, Abaculus, Abacus, Abaddon; Abaft, preposition; Abaft, adverb; Abaisance, Abaiser, Abalienate, Abalienation, Aband—twenty-four in all; for the editors rightly treat the two forms, Aaronic and Aaronical, as a single word, and group them under a common definition. Now, how many words entitled, as English words, to a place in an English dictionary are contained in this list? First, is the letter A a word at all? It is the name of an alphabetic character and may be used as a nominative case, thus: "A is the first letter of all the European alphabets;" or as an objective, thus: "The box was marked with an A." Hence, though in certain cases the letter A is a mere element of words, in others it is a part of speech, and therefore a word. Again, A is used as an indefinite article. In this sense it was originally the Anglo-Saxon numeral adjective an, one, and has been contracted to a single vowel for euphonic reasons. The article is a part of speech, a word. Further; to their definition of A as the indefinite article, the editors add: "In such expressions as 'twenty leagues a day,' 'a hundred pounds a year,' 'a dollar a yard,' etc., it denotes each, every." It is true that in these and other like expressions the particle A may be said in a loose way to "denote," or rather to imply, "each, every." But the editors evidently consider A in these cases as identical with the indefinite article, and the passage I have just quoted is intended to illustrate one of the uses and meanings of the article. This is an error. In this use A is a preposition, and the observation of the editors belongs, if anywhere, to their fifth specification, in which they trace what they call the prefix in afoot to a prepositional origin. That in the examples before us, A is not an article, but a preposition, might be inferred, analogically, from the usage of the cognate languages. Thus, in Mœso-Gothic, Luke's Gospel, xvii. 4, we read: "Jah jabai sibun sintham ana dag fravaurkjai." The Mœso-Gothic ana corresponds in meaning, as well as in form, nearly to the Greek ἀγά, as also to the German an, and the Anglo-Saxon on, and is, in the phrase just quoted, certainly a preposition. So in Danish: "Tlan faaer ti Daler om Dagen, om Maaneden, om Aaret;" he receives ten dollars a day, a month, a year. "Han kommer kun eengang om Aaret;" he comes only once a year. Om is unquestionably a preposition. The French also has the same construction: "Il gagne six francs par jour." "Il ne mange que deux fois par jour." He earns six francs a day; he eats only twice a day. But we have better evidence still. The Anglo-Saxon Gospel of Luke xvii. 4 has: "And gif he on dæg seofensithum syngath." If he transgress seven times a day. So in Aelfric's Colloquies: "And melce hig tweówa on dæg;" and milk them twice a day. Nobody will dispute that in these cases on is a preposition, and every Anglo-Saxon scholar knows that in the phrases a-foot, a-sleep, a-hunting, and the like, the a is simply the Anglicized modern form of the A.-S. preposition on. A dæi occurs in "Layamon," Vol. II., pp. 224, 401, and a dai in the "Owl and Nightingale," v. 89, in the sense of by day, where, of course, it can only be from A.-S. on; and in Chaucer's "Court of Love," stanza 50, we have "twenty sithe aday." Upon the whole, there is no doubt whatever that in the modern a-day, now-a-days, a-year, etc., the a is the A.-S. preposition on; and thus we have the first word in our list, A, in a third meaning and third grammatical category. Under the third specification, the editors notice the use of a for I, he, and even have, as a barbarous corruption. Examples of this last vulgarism occur in Lord Berners' Froissart, and even in Sir Thomas More; but they are probably to be ascribed to the ignorance of the printer rather than of the authors, and as, in those uses, it is a mere corruption, it should not be treated as really a word in our enumeration. A is also the name of a tone in music; it is the first of the seven dominical letters in the Julian calendar, and it is often used as a numeral instead of one. In these three, and in other analogous cases, it is merely the first letter of the Roman alphabet employed to indicate the first place in other series. The meaning is substantially the same in all of them, and there seems to be no good reason for making A, in any of these last uses, a distinct word from the alphabetic A.

To sum up: We have A as the name of a letter, a noun; as an indefinite article; as a preposition; and again as a noun indicating priority of position. Counting the first and fourth meanings as properly but different applications of the same vocable, we find in A three words distinct in meaning, distinct in grammatical class, distinct in origin. It is plain, therefore, that A must be treated not as no word at all, or even as only one word, but as three; and from our examination of the title A we appear to be safe in laying down these rules:

First. Words identical in form, etymology, and grammatical class, though more or less differenced in meaning, are to be counted but once. This rule is exemplified in A, the name of the first letter of the alphabet, of the first tone of a musical scale, of the first dominical letter in the Julian calendar, and of the first in any series—all identical in form, all one letter in the Latin alphabet, and all nouns.

Second. Words identical in form, but different in etymology, should be counted separately; exemplified in A, the name of a letter, from the Latin A; A, the indefinite article, from the A.-S. numeral adjective an, one; A, a preposition, from the A.-S. preposition on.

The next word in the list which raises any question of principle in regard to enumeration is Aaronic, Aaronical. First: Do these two forms constitute two words, or are they too nearly identical to be fairly distinguishable? They do not appear to be discriminated at all in actual use, and it is probably a mere point for the ear, not for the intellect, to determine whether, in a given case, the one shall be employed rather than the other. Both are adjectives ; both are derived from the proper name Aaron. They are, therefore, the same in grammatical class, the same in etymology, and they are nearly identical in form. This case suggests rule

Third. Words identical in grammatical class, in etymology, and in meaning, but varying in termination according to the euphonic taste of the person employing them, are to be counted but once.

This rule, it must be admitted, is wanting in precision ; but at the moment I cannot substitute a better. Perhaps some improvement in the formulation of it will suggest itself as we proceed.

But behind the question we have just considered lies a more radical one still. Are Aaronic and Aaronical justly entitled to a place at all as English words in our vocabulary ? This is a difficult point, and I am by no means clear as to the proper answer ; but, as at present advised, I incline to reject them as, though English grammatical forms, not truly English common words. They still retain the quality of the proper name, and in their use they are limited to things belonging personally to, or derived from, Aaron. They have not become generic epithets, like Ciceronian, for instance, which, in such phrases as "he spoke with Ciceronian eloquence," means merely that the orator's discourse was distinguished by eloquence, amplitude, and logic, not that it was fashioned strictly after the model of Cicero's Orations or in accordance with the rules laid down in Cicero's rhetorical treatises. The objection to the introduction of such words is that their number is infinite ; and if we are to admit Aaronic we cannot exclude Byronic, Napoleonic—for both of which there is abundant authority—and so on ad libitum. Provisorily, therefore, I adopt rule

Fourth. Words formed from proper names, and still limited to express something directly connected with the person from whose name they are taken, and therefore not become common or generic, are not to be counted.

The next word on the first page, Aaron's-rod, does not come within this exclusion, both because the proper name is only employed in composition with an English radical, and because the word is generic in its use, and is from a fancied vague resemblance to the wonder-working rod of Aaron, applied to a form of architectural decoration not otherwise related to the object from which it takes its name. While on this subject we may as well dispose of the whole question relating to proper names and derivatives from them. No one would contend that if the editors of Webster had chosen to copy Lippincott's gazetteer into their dictionary, the names of places thus introduced ought to be counted as constituents of the English vocabulary, and it is evident that geographical proper names have no better claim than personal names. The same principle applies also to derivatives from both. Ethnological, geographical, and personal appellatives as such have no right to claim a place in any word-books but geographical and biographical dictionaries. Words of this class may, however, be entitled to admission by acquiring a signification distinct from their geographical or personal meaning. Thus Asiatic is used not merely as a designation of things properly belonging to the continent of Asia, but, generically, of analogous things, and it has accordingly become a common epithet. If one were to say of a rich American democrat that he entertained his friends with Asiatic luxury and regal splendor, nobody would understand that bird's-nests, shark's fins, and trepang were served up to them, or that he received them sitting upon a golden throne. In such cases the epithet is simply an intensive or term of comparison, its etymological meaning is lost altogether, and hence the rule just stated has no more application to them than a similar principle would have, in a German dictionary, to the word Kaiser, emperor, which notoriously comes from the Latin proper name Cæsar.

G. P. M.

Harvard Memorial Biographies. (Cambridge : Sever & Francis. 2 vols. 8vo. 1866. E. P. Dutton & Co., Boston.)—Possibly these lives, edited by classmate, relative, or bosom friend, may resemble somewhat those which commonly get upon tombstones. When one addresses not a remote posterity, but the stricken survivors of the lately dead, he will hardly neglect the respectable monition, de mortuis nil nisi bonum. If this practice serves to confound the motives of common actions, and suppresses the inspiring contrast between a worthless beginning and a glorious end of the human career, it has on this account a perhaps higher value as bringing into sharp relief that human sympathy which, on every grand occasion, demonstrates the essential unity of the race. But though professedly memorial, and therefore consolatory rather than critical or didactic, these biographies are remarkable for candor and truthfulness. They are even characterized by moderateness of statement and a tacit agreement to say little beyond the narrative, which tells so much. Where they are autobiographical—and they are largely so—some history of events but more revelation of character is obtained. And we are let in very close to the secret thoughts of the deceased. It is encouraging to turn from what seems a barren, even if diminishing, strife of sects, and a seeming decadence of the church, to the intimate connection here shown between the new birth into religion and the patriotic sacrifice on the field of battle. The old bloods, too, reappear—Mayflower, Roger Williams, Huguenot, F. F. V., laughing to scorn the ethnological pretensions of "chivalry." The native young men of wealth, the finest education, the highest social position in the North, challenge the slanderers of the Old World who taunted America with winning victories as she built railroads—with the hired muscles of the immigrant, the scum and spawn and riff-raff of Europe. Here and there—too sparsely for the whole truth, so we apprehend—a betrothed bride, a young wife, a posthumous child, is mentioned or suggested. But nothing could be said here of those other Harvard men who fought beside the fallen, offering themselves as nobly to the same fate, or who met death obscurely from disease contracted in the service, or in opening to the freedmen a new life and a new light. Nor could they hope to be remembered in such company who, through pitiful misfortune, it is true, perished miserably upon the other side.

It is an injustice to the public, who cannot allow these lives to be appropriated by any single institution, as well as to the great body of the alumni of all our colleges—Harvard not excepted—that only a small edition of these two elegant volumes was printed, and is already, if not exhausted, much enhanced in price. We learn from one to whose patient devotion this collection owes a large part of its worth, that an effort will probably be made to issue a popular edition, even at the expense and pains of resetting. We sincerely hope the effort will succeed. The publishers may gain equal credit by a less sumptuous outlay.

Poems Grave and Gay. George Arnold. (Boston : Ticknor & Fields. 1867.)—This is a book of poor verse preceded by a poorer preface. That is, both are weak ; but the preface-writer seems to be further from manly strength of any sort than the poet. This latter was a man who died at the not very youthful age of thirty-one, and whose favorite authors then were Balzac and Byron, as his friend tells us, and he tells it as if it were an interesting fact in the history of this individual young man, and seems unaware that it is a fact in the natural history of the genus to which the young man belonged—a genus of which, on the whole, considering how much we have heard already, and how little it is worth hearing about, the less we hear the better. The friend goes on to show more of the quality of his wisdom by printing in a book poems of this sort, which their writer (to do him justice—to partly save him from his friends) never himself collected from the newspapers for which he wrote them :

"IN THE ALCOVE.

"Round and round the waltzers twirled ;
Through the hall the music rang—
Viol's hum and cymbal's clang—
Is not this a pleasant world ?

"But Lady Clare passed by me,
And her lip was curved with scorn ;
I sat me down in an alcove,
And wished I never was born.

"Up and down the glittering room
Went each dame and cavalier,
In the triple atmosphere
Of light, and music, and perfume.

"But Lady Clare walked by me,
And tossed her delicate head ;
So there I sat in the alcove,
Wishing that I were dead."

Other "pot-boilers" of a comic kind, parodies of poems by Tennyson, Bryant, Hood, and many more, it is possible to read, and even, to a certain extent, praise. At all events, the crackling of thorns under a pot is a pleasanter sound than the plaints and heart-throbs of a certain sort of people. As a specimen of his mirth, the specimen most favorable to him that we can find, we copy a stanza which parodies Bryant's fine poem, "The Planting of the Apple-Tree." "The Drinking of the Apple-Jack" Arnold calls it :

"Come, let us drink the apple-jack !
Cut the tough lemon with the blade ;
Hot let the water then be made ;
There gently pour the liquor ; there
Sift the white sugar in with care,
And mix them all as gingerly
As poets mingle rhythmic feet
To print in some æsthetic sheet :
So mix we the apple-jack."

Sklaverei und Emancipation der schwarzen Race in den Vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika. Geschichtliche Abhandlungen von C. Goedel. (Herausgegeben vom Züricher Comitê zur Unterstützung der befreiten Farbigen. Zürich. 1866. Pp. 150.) Slavery and Emancipation of the Black Race in the United States of North America. Historical Essays by C. Goedel. (Published by the Zürich Committee for Furnishing Assistance to the Freedmen.)—The title of this pamphlet, which we have given at full length, shows the shape which Swiss sympathy in the great work of our country has taken. The sketches treat of the history of slavery in colonial times, of its growth and extension in the United States, of its results, our rebellion, of emancipation, and of the condition of the blacks before and after the war. The introduction, after acknowledging the gifts already received by the society, declares the purpose of this pamphlet to be the dissemination of the true state of the case throughout Switzerland, as being at once the best appeal to the practical Christianity of the Swiss, and the only thing which is needed to interest the people of the one republic in the welfare of the other. The author is a man of business and not of letters ; but it is the acquaintance which he has formed with the American men of business, in the way of business, that has enabled him to make these enquiries, and properly to estimate their value and importance both to the United States and (indirectly) to Switzerland. Of course the sources of information and the information itself cannot be new to us, but such substantial sympathy and help must be useful and valuable. The names of the committee are given in the appendix, and among them we find clergymen, professors, merchants, and one or two local celebrities, Escher, Syz-Landis, and Hesendonck. It is to be hoped that some measures will be taken to collect and perpetuate all such evidences of the interest taken in this country by Swiss as ties between the two republics, and to extend them to other European states and cities,

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

IMMEDIATE RECONSTRUCTION A DUTY.

THE absolute rejection of the Constitutional Amendment by Mr. Johnson's State legislatures takes away all excuse for the thought of sanctioning his usurpations by recognizing the validity of the governments organized by him. It is, in every point of view, as well that this has happened. The amendment, though excellent in itself, would not be a complete settlement of the issues between the North and the South; while the recognition of States organized by a bald usurpation of the Executive, no matter upon what conditions, would be a highly dangerous precedent. In offering such terms to the South, we believe that Congress obeyed the will of the people; but we are confident that the people neither expected nor desired that, if those terms were rejected, Congress should do nothing more. Yet, some influential Republicans in Congress seem to consider the amendment a finality, and to hold Congress bound to wait for the Southern whites to ratify it, even though months and years pass by.

From this view we strongly dissent. The day of grace is past. All the Southern legislatures have met, and all have deliberately rejected the terms offered to them. If these legislatures should reconsider their action, ratify the amendment, and thereupon be recognized by Congress, it may yet be questioned in the courts whether such a ratification is valid; and after such recognition the amendment would clearly have no validity if not ratified by three-fourths of all the States, including those newly recognized. Congress is not bound to run any such risks, nor has it a right to do so.

The main reasons for further action by Congress are, however, to be found in the obvious dangers of delay in reconstruction, and the certainty that such delay will be almost indefinitely prolonged under the present policy. On this point we have frequently expressed our entire concurrence with the most earnest advocates of the Southern cause. It is absurd to deny that the unsettled condition of the South is prejudicial to the North. With no legitimate government, and with the whole influence of the de facto governments tending to injustice, inequality, and insecurity, it is impossible that the South should prosper. Nor is it possible for the North to prosper as it should so long as this unsettled state of society exists in one-third of the common country, depriving it of capacity to produce or to purchase as it otherwise would. The laborers of the South have no security for their liberty or their wages. Capitalists have no security for their investments. How can they safely lend money to governments which may at any day be overthrown? How can they act under charters from such governments? We do not wonder that the Southern States have had to allow large discounts on their bonds. We only marvel that such obligations should be salable at any price. The unpleasant situation in which Northern men find themselves at the South is notorious; nor can it be improved without a thorough reorganization of the local governments. Under such circumstances, the South cannot possibly contribute to the national wealth anything like what it would if law, order, and equality of rights were firmly established.

The political precedent involved in indefinite delay is also worthy of consideration. Ten governments are in fact controlling the internal affairs of as many States; and Congress neither recognizes nor disavows them by any decisive official act. Yet if they are not legitimate, it is the clear duty of Congress to suppress them and secure to the people regular government; while if they are legitimate, it is equally the duty of Congress to admit their representatives. A prolongation of the present state of things would be an excuse to future Congresses for either weakness or usurpation, as they might feel disposed.

Even from a merely partisan view of the case, the perils of delay seem intolerable. The whole question is put at issue every alternate year. A single defeat would be irremediable; for if the Southern States are once recognized, the act can never be undone. And every year would add to the strength of the existing governments at the South; since toleration would amount to a half recognition, and vast pecuniary interests would become involved with them. Add to these considerations the possibility that at any moment the validity of these governments, as the only ones in existence may be asserted by the Supreme Court, and the danger that delay will result in a triumph for the South does not seem small.

We therefore urge upon the present Congress the duty of immediate reconstruction. At the very least, an experiment should be made upon one or two States. Conventions should be summoned forthwith, and all the machinery of government be put in motion. We have repeatedly shown that Congress has the power to do this, and that the co-ordinate departments of the Government are bound to abide by the decision of Congress between conflicting governments. We shall not again set forth our arguments to this effect, because Congress no longer doubts its power, but only hesitates as to the expediency of exercising it.

Those conservative Republicans who oppose further action on this subject, from fear of its effect upon business, are, as it seems to us, short-sighted. It must be far better, in a mere business point of view, to bring this controversy to a head at once, than to let it drag on for years. Uncertainty is the curse of trade, which can accommodate itself to almost any settled state of affairs, but is ruined by doubts and fluctuations.

It is said by some that nothing can be done until Mr. Johnson is removed. But it is very plain that if an impeachment is to be had, an act of reconstruction, imposing simple and unmistakable duties upon the President, will either compel him to submit or furnish ground for impeachment too clear to be a matter of dispute. Thus, he may be required to issue a proclamation, or to provide for an election, or to do some other act involving a repudiation of the governments which he has set up. If he fails to comply by the day appointed, he will be so clearly guilty of a misdemeanor that no question can be raised other than one of pure law, upon which no argument need be made by the prosecution. Upon such a charge Mr. Johnson could be impeached, tried, convicted, and removed, within ten days, with the most perfect decorum, fairness, and legality, and with the general approval of the country. His trial upon an indictment such as General Butler presents would occupy six months or a year, while any attempt to supersede him meantime might precipitate us into civil war. On the other hand, if Mr. Johnson obeys the law, his defeat will be so perfect that he can no longer have any power to interpose obstacles in the way of Congressional action, he will mortally offend his present supporters (if he really has any), and must submit to carry out the whole policy of Congress.

Whether, therefore, an impeachment be desired or not, it is evident that the interests of society, both North and South, demand the early action of Congress upon reconstruction. However imperfect that action may be, it will at least establish something certain where all is now in doubt, and cannot, therefore, fail to be beneficial. But we have no fear that the measures of Congress upon this point will not be in the main judiciously framed. The principles which will govern it are well known, and are approved by the country. Now let it act, and act without delay.

THE TURKISH QUESTION.

ONE thing, and we might almost say the only thing, which is clear in the news from the Mediterranean is that the Cretan struggle is not over, and is not likely to end without producing serious complications in European politics. Whatever amount of sympathy and encouragement the Cretans may meet with in other countries, in Greece, at least, there is a desire to help them, which neither the Turks nor foreign powers can restrain. Turkish despotism differs from all other European despotisms in reaching all classes of the community, the lower even more effectually than the upper. The Austrian or Russian despotism presses most severely on the educated or wealthy classes, but that of the Turks has the peculiarity of being felt more bitterly in the cabin than in the salon, and of exciting indescribable hatred amongst those who have little sympathy with what is called "modern liberalism" and care little about national independence in its highest sense. The Greek peasants do not detest Turkish rule because they sigh over the ancient glories of their race, or long for a freer political development, but be cause they want to keep their wives, their children, and their scanty earnings to themselves. They hate Turks not as men hate tyrants, but as they hate wolves and tigers. Consequently neither their ignorance, nor poverty, nor want of union or organization, is likely to prevent the prolongation of the struggle, and the struggle can hardly be prolonged without bringing on the interference, either secret or overt, of the great European powers. It is from this fact, in our opinion, the Turks have most to fear. We do not anticipate any very rapid success from the efforts of the Greeks themselves.

What shape the interference will take, or who will initiate it, it is hard to say, but that it will come before very long seems every day more likely. The two powers now most opposed to the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire are, as in 1852, France and England. Each of them has the strongest interest in preventing the establishment of a first-class power in the eastern end of the Mediterranean—France because of the effect which such an event would have on her own influence in Southern Europe and Africa; and England, both for this reason and for the peril in which such a change would place her communications with India. It may, of course, be said that similar objection lay to the resuscitation of Italy, and this is true. But the moral arguments in favor of the resuscitation of Italy were too strong for any amount of political selfishness on the part of foreign powers to resist them, and they were backed up by the persistent efforts of the Italians themselves. The Ottoman rule in South-eastern Europe would long ago have shared the fate of the Austrian rule in Italy, and the Turks been forced to retire into Asia, had there been in European Turkey, as there was in Italy, a strong organized power amongst the Christian subjects, ready to take the place of the old government. As soon as there arose in Italy a disciplined, intelligent native force, which had proved its capacity on a small scale and satisfied the world that when Austria retired it could supply a national government, the maintenance of Austrian rule in the Peninsula became impossible, and the old maxims of the French and German fears of a united Italy lost all their force.

When the Greek kingdom was established it was the confident belief of its friends that it would play for the whole of Christian Turkey the part which Piedmont played for Italy; that it would prove a centre of national life, of political education, and would gradually acquire a moral weight in Europe which would compensate for its physical weakness, and thus become in the eyes of the civilized world the lawful heir and administrator of the Turkish "sick man," to use the Russian Emperor's illustration. The kingdom of Greece has not, however, answered these expectations. It has done nothing to win either the confidence or respect of the civilized world. It has displayed neither skill nor wisdom in home or in foreign affairs. Its finances and police have always been in disorder. There has never been either protection for life or property even in the immediate vicinity of the capital. The court has been a caricature, the army a mockery; and the leading politicians have displayed neither talents nor virtue, and have passed the golden years of modern Greek history in a disgraceful scramble for the spoils of office. What has been the cause of this failure—whether the smallness of the kingdom as constituted by the protecting powers, or the character of the sovereigns imposed on it, as the Greeks maintain, or the defects of the Greek character, as the French and English maintain—we do not propose to discuss at present. The fact remains that the Greek kingdom has proved a failure, and a very repulsive failure; that the great military exploits of the Greek insurrection have not been followed by the display of political virtue and capacity; and that during the last twenty years, in which Turkey has been in the throes of dissolution, the Greeks have not been able to offer to the great powers any proof that if the seat of empire on the Bosphorus were left vacant they were competent to fill it or to assume the control and direction of the other races of European Turkey. Consequently there is just as much uncertainty to-day as to what may happen after the demise of the Ottoman Empire as there was at the beginning of the century. Could modern Greece stretch out a trained and tried hand for Constantinople and for all the shores and islands which the genius of ancient Greece has glorified, there is no question that not one of the great powers would venture to dispute her title, and the "Eastern question," coming so soon after the "Italian question," would be settled on the same great principles of justice and morality.

The failure of the Greeks to make good their claim leaves the old jealousy between the European powers as strong as ever. Russia in possession of European Turkey, and with the Greek islands within her grasp, would threaten, or appear to threaten, the liberty and independence of the civilized world, and however Prussia, in consideration of her recent and prospective acquisitions in Germany, might be induced to regard it, it is certain that neither France nor England would ever consent to it without receiving compensation in the Mediterranean on the nature and extent of which they could probably never be got to agree. The negotiations, too, would be complicated by the appearance of Italy on the scene, with even stronger claims for a share in the spoil than any of the others. But France and England are evidently losing their old pre-eminence in the European world. They have for the last two hundred years played the leading part in European politics and occupied the foremost places in war, in literature, and in the arts, but it seems now as if the sceptre were passing away from them. France has been growing rapidly in wealth of late years, and so has England; but both seem unable any longer to make the gigantic efforts required for the maintenance of their old place in the world. The population of France is stationary, and the peculiar nature of her civilization seems likely to keep it so; and England, though not falling off in numbers, seems to be afflicted with a species of social and political paralysis by which nobody is more profoundly impressed than herself, and the only remedy for which even the most hopeful of her friends acknowledge to be desperate. Austria is already a half inanimate body, hardly better off than Turkey. Prussia and Russia, on the other hand, are growing at a marvellous pace. Every year sees the forces under their banners swell by tens of thousands; every ten years, for the next century, will probably see the area of their territory enlarged. The one rules over the very centre of civilization and gathers the flower of European youth into its armies, and the other holds in reserve the untold resources of that vast Eastern region from which Europe has been already once overrun. Now, Prussia may prove indifferent to Russian movements on the Black Sea, and should the two powers come to an understanding on the Eastern question, it is hard to say who could gainsay their decision with a chance of success. France, we may be sure, would not submit quietly to the loss of the influence she has wielded in the Mediterranean for over a thousand years, and France can do great things; but the world has greatly changed since one battle gave her Berlin and one campaign gave her Moscow. England is passing through a political and social crisis which would probably forbid actual participation in Continental broils, even if the last attempt to save Turkey had not struck so serious a blow at English prestige, and if the policy of non-interference had not since then been deliberately adopted. As long as England holds Malta and Gibraltar, her footing in the Mediterranean is not likely to be endangered by anything which does not actually diminish her fighting power, and she will probably, when the worst comes to the worst, leave Turkey to its fate. It is clear that, however the present trouble may end, the regions bordering on the Mediterranean are on the eve of great changes, and what with political transformations and the influence of the telegraph and railroad and the Suez Canal in bringing back commerce to its old channels, we shall probably witness, even in our time, the gradual restoration of the historic sea to the place of pre-eminence, both political and commercial, which it held in the ancient and mediæval world.

PAYMENT FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES.

WITHIN the last six months two attempts have ostensibly been made to get the architects of the country to send in drawings for very important public buildings—one the State Capitol at Albany, and the other the new buildings of the War Department in Washington—for a small fixed sum and without any assurance that the successful competitor would afterwards be employed to superintend the work. In both cases the leading architects have united in a refusal, in which they say that they will not make competitive designs for any work unless they are assured beforehand that the author of the accepted plan shall superintend its execution and receive compensation for his services in the customary way. The architect's commission in the case of the Albany Capitol would amount, at the usual rate for private work, to about $30,000; the "Empire State" offers, through its agents, $2,500 for the service. The compensation of the architect in the case of a building erected for commercial purposes of the character of the proposed War Office would amount to about $25,000; the United States, through a board of officers charged with the duty, offer from $1,000 to $3,000 as premiums for the best three plans, but nothing more.

The architects say, with great justice, that both these buildings ought to be not simply great piles of masonry, with a certain amount of office accommodation inside, but real works of art; not only the embodiment of the highest taste and cultivation of the country, but good enough to exercise a powerful influence hereafter upon the æsthetic education of the people. To conceive and put on paper a structure which would meet these requirements needs, in the first place, if not genius, the highest order of talent and imaginative power, either highly trained by study, reflection, and observation, or by years of practical experience, or by both. In short, in the mystery of arts, there is no higher grade than that of a first-rate architect, and nobody but a first-rate architect is capable of either conceiving or executing public buildings which will be worthy of the country and of the age. To offer to such a man, for such work, the sum of $2,500 or $3,000, displays deplorable ignorance on the part of the Capitol Commission and the War Office Board of the two things which it most concerns them to know—the kind of buildings they want and the kind of men competent to execute them; and behind this ignorance there is, of course, another defect, which is not peculiar to these two bodies of gentlemen, but pervades in a greater or less degree the whole community—ignorance of the real value of professional labor, or, to put it in another and perhaps less offensive shape, a tendency to under-estimate all services which do not result, or are not likely to result, in direct pecuniary profit to the employer.

Nevertheless, in the case of architects we confess there is something to be said in the way of apology, if not of defence, for the undeniable unwillingness of the public to pay them what they ask in the way in which they ask it—that is, by a percentage on the money spent. We grant without hesitation that $25,000 is not a cent too much to pay for a worthy expression of the idea which the people of a great State ought to have of the kind of building in which their legislature ought to meet. Hardly any sum would be too great to pay to a man who could perfectly express such an idea. Those who ask an architect to design a capitol for $2,500 do not think of anything more than providing what may be called a costly shelter, and of this any builder or carpenter is of course capable.

But there is, nevertheless, to most men something on the face of it a little preposterous in paying an artist, qua artist, according to the sum it costs to put his idea into execution. The value of his work lies in the conception, and of the value of this an estimate may be formed the minute he puts it on paper. He does so estimate it himself. He says: I will design you a building of such and such a character, containing such and such accommodation, and to cost $50,000. I will superintend its execution, and pledge you my professional honor that the mechanics' work shall be suitably done, for $5,000. You agree without hesitation to pay him this sum; but while the work is in progress, lumber rises or laborers strike, and the result is that the building costs $75,000 instead of $50,000; the architect's trouble and responsibility remain the same, but he receives $7,500. It may of course be said, and is said, in reply, that inasmuch as a rise in building materials or in labor usually indicates or accompanies a rise in the cost of living, it is only by making his professional charges rise with them that the architect can secure himself a fair share in the general advance of prices. It is also said, and with equal justice, that the difference between what most buildings cost and what it is calculated at the outset that they will cost, is due to a change of mind on the part of the owners, the introduction of new features at their request into the plans, and that the architect must protect himself against people's fickleness or caprice or inability to state clearly their own wants by making his compensation depend on cost. Although an artist in the highest sense of the word, he is not simply an artist. He is also a manager, and of course his trouble is increased in more than one way if modifications are made by others in his plans. Moreover, buildings are not simply works of art; they are in a very large number of cases commercial enterprises. The value of a bank or store or insurance office, for instance, depends largely on the amount of accommodation it affords, and on the number of well-lighted and convenient offices which it supplies for rent. If an architect's skill or ingenuity in arrangement, therefore, has added largely to the commercial value of the building, it is fair enough that he should share in the profit in the commercial way by charging commission. Moreover, they say the plan of charging by commission is not of their devising; that it prevails in almost every branch of business. Brokers and agents of all kinds are paid for their services not by a round sum, but by a percentage on the amount of money which passes through their hands.

All this is true, but it is not the whole of the truth. In employing a broker we fix to a dollar the amount of money he shall spend, and consequently the amount we shall pay him for his services, by fixing the minimum for which he shall sell, or the maximum for which he shall buy. The architect's compensation, as long as he is paid by commission, we cannot fix, let estimates be ever so carefully made. In the first place, no architect can possibly, by any amount of care, include everything in his estimates. In a large building hundreds of items are sure to be overlooked, each one, perhaps, of small importance in itself, but in the aggregate causing a formidable addition to the cost. For this reason neither contracts nor estimates ever give more than an approximation to cost, and yet it is the client and not the architect who suffers from these oversights—the latter actually profiting by them. In the next place, no client ever knows, or except in very few cases can know, what he wants, and can tell whether any plan submitted to him will really meet his wants, supposing he does know them. It is only to the professional eye, the trained professional imagination, that a drawing conveys a clear and distinct idea of what the building will be. To most men, the statement that a room will be so many feet in length and breadth, and so many feet in height, supplies little notion of what the reality will look like; and of the general effect in brick or stone even of "an elevation," seen only on paper, not one man in a thousand can form any adequate conception. Consequently the clients of an architect, when they put themselves in his hands, put themselves in his power to a degree unknown in any similar relation, and they are generally painfully conscious of their own ignorance. The people who think they know all about building do not employ architects. Therefore, under these circumstances—the ignorance, inevitable ignorance, of the client, and the difficulty of making exact previous calculations of the cost, combined with the direct interest which the architect has in having the work cost as much as possible—the whole profession, under the commission system, is exposed to the suspicion, as we believe the very unjust but not unnatural suspicion, if not of increasing cost, of taking no pains to prevent its increasing.

Although, as we have said, the architect is not simply an artist, but also a manager of work, he is, nevertheless, still more of an artist, and must be more of an artist than of anything else. Not only, therefore, is it for his pecuniary interest, under the present system of remuneration, that a building shall cost as much as possible, but his feelings as an artist lead him inevitably to treat cost as but a secondary consideration—perfection, finish, and beauty as the main one. That architects honestly endeavor not to be influenced by this consideration we have no doubt; but to assert that none of them are influenced by it, is to say either that they are more than human or not animated by true professional ambition. To put them on a right footing with the public, however, their compensation ought to be in no way affected by the amount of the builder's bills after the plans had once been made; because, in the first place, a building is hardly ever undertaken, in this country at least, the expense of which is of little or no consequence. As a general rule, the problem for the solution of which an architect's assistance is sought is not how to get a handsome house or store, but how to spend a certain sum to the best advantage.

In the second place, the art education of the American public, and indeed we may say of every other public, is still in too backward a state to enable them to appreciate the services of an architect at their full value. There is as yet both very little desire for beauty in architecture, and very great reluctance to pay much for professional labor of any kind. What an architect can do for a man only very few know; fewer still are willing to give for it what it is worth. When the honorable architect insists, therefore, on an arrangement which to the vulgar eye appears to give him a direct interest in leading his client into all possible expense, the mass of men are driven either to betake themselves to a thrifty quack, who, while making but low charges as an architect, is acquiring a fortune by connivance with knavish contractors, or to employ a builder who, with no suitable talent, education, or training, professes to be also an architect, and the popular indifference to architectural beauty is thus confirmed and perpetuated. The great majority of builders of houses in this country, whether individuals or corporations, are now, and will always be, limited in their means, forced before they begin to build to count the cost closely, and it may be questioned whether anything would be more likely to promote amongst them the employment of the highest architectural talent than the certainty that the architect has no interest in their overrunning their calculations. We admit that the present scale of charges is not one whit too high, and in charging a fixed sum, we think the architect should secure himself against the consequences of all his client's infirmities, be they what they may. There is no profession in the country in which the rewards of labor are not miserably low, unless when, as in the case of lawyers, there is some mode of turning the result of the professional man's exertions into dollars and cents before the mind's eye. But clergymen, doctors, architects, and writers all suffer abominably from the short-sighted tradesman turn of the Anglo-Saxon mind.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, Jan. 11, 1867.

THE newspapers are at present suffering from a dearth of news. Their columns are painfully filled with all sorts of inferior matter. Long discussions on the affairs of foreign powers, from Mexico to Montenegro, seem to be the most popular expedient. The apparently authentic news that Lord Stanley has proposed to refer the Alabama claims to arbitration has been one of the latest topics, and has been received with general satisfaction. Perhaps the greatest piece of luck for editors has been a sharp frost, which lasted for nearly a week. Frosts have almost gone out of fashion in London. During two previous winters we have not had a single day's skating, and on the present occasion the enjoyment of two days on the ice was quite a novel sensation. The mere record of the number of people who are half-drowned in the Serpentine would not be, of itself, very exciting; but the frost exemplified certain peculiarities of London with a good deal more force than was at all agreeable. A more dreary sight than London streets during the few days of frost would be difficult to conceive. A thick, cold fog brooded over the city. A heavy snow-fall had rendered the streets impassable. For two or three days the opposite sides of the Park were divided as if a Swiss glacier had flowed between them. Cabs could scarcely be tempted to venture on to the slippery pavements and to seek their way through the perilous fog by promise of exorbitant fares. The only population visible was that which was bent on skating or the bands of ragged laborers who parade the streets intoning the melancholy chorus, "We 're all froze out, we 're all froze out, we 've got no work to do." I live in a somewhat remote quarter, but I do not believe that a quarter of an hour passed throughout the day without my being treated to this dismal refrain, given out in strong nasal tones with the full power of five or six vigorous pairs of lungs. Now, it was a pertinent question why, when so many men were in want of work, and when there was such a pressing need that a particular piece of work should be done, mountains of snow should be left to block up our streets and convert each house into the likeness of a besieged fortress. To which answer was made that these frozen-out gentry really prefer raising money by roaring about the streets to raising it by a little hard work, and that it was therefore difficult, in spite of appearances, to get the necessary laborers at so short notice; snow being apparently held to be an inscrutable and unimaginable occurrence about Christmas time. This, however, is merely the official apology for incapacity; the true reason is that London is under the most anomalous and intricate system of government which ever ruled over an equal aggregate of human beings. Instead of being a city, it is a collection of overgrown villages, each governed by a set of practically irresponsible vestrymen. In any matters which want a little co-operation and intelligence, they invariably collapse; and as no one knows very clearly who deserves the blame, it becomes almost impossible to administer any chastisement. We are always grumbling about our water and our gas and our pavements, but nothing comes of it; and the hardship of being hopelessly snowed up in the biggest city of the world owing to the pure incapacity of its rulers, is merely another count in a long indictment.

A change will doubtless come before long, for London is going through alterations comparable to those of Paris, and every alteration makes more evident the need of some central power. The huge inarticulate mass is in need of some kind of intelligent organization, and the first step towards erecting a kind of federal union between its discordant atoms has been taken in the formation of the Metropolitan Board of Works. That board is already doing good service in forming the Thames embankment, the main drainage, and a variety of other important improvements; it will doubtless manage to acquire other functions, in obedience to the general instinct which prompts all boards to swallow up their smaller rivals. One most important change in this direction is being now brought forward by many men of high standing, some of whom had an interview the other day with Lord Derby. The railways which are beginning to pierce the very heart of London have incidentally caused great evils. They have knocked down large numbers of houses in the most crowded parts of the town. It is calculated that within four years fifty thousand people have been turned out of their homes owing to this cause. The result has been to crowd to repletion districts which were already so crowded as to be pestilential. Respectable working-men with their families have to herd together in one room, or even two or three families are forced each to occupy a corner. It is unnecessary to point out the moral and physical evils which are the inevitable results. One could not invent a better plan for directly manufacturing paupers and criminals by wholesale. It is now urged that railways should be compelled to provide suitable accommodation in return for that which they destroy, and further, that the Metropolitan Board of Works should have the power to condemn houses as unfit for habitation and to rebuild them on advances from the Treasury, repayment to be secured on the metropolitan rates. Lord Derby will probably have too much on his hands next session to be willing to burden himself with this additional weight. Moreover, according to that great doctrine of political economists which some persons take to be the whole of political economy, namely, that everything ought to be let alone, much may be urged against the plan. Considered as a remedy for a sudden evil, and an evil which has been produced by legislative action, it is plainly justifiable; if Parliament gives power to railways to knock down a whole town of houses, Parliament may certainly provide that such a power should be exercised so as to produce the minimum of inconvenience. But it seems rather a doubtful principle that the state should interfere to give people respectable lodgings any more than to give them a higher rate of wages. The only thing to be said is that in such cases it is sometimes wise to strike as hard as possible at a notorious evil and to leave general principles to take care of themselves. I will not, however, attempt to argue this question, merely pointing it out as one of those which will inevitably come up for solution before long. Next session has so many tasks already provided for it, that perhaps it may again be postponed; but it is certainly one of those which press most for a speedy solution.

To turn to a rather more lively topic, the approach of the session may be seen in another way. The reform agitation becomes more interesting, and the first proof of reviving interest is a new crop of libels against Mr. Bright. That generally excellent but rather heavy periodical, the "Fortnightly Review" (which, by the way, now appears only once a month), led the way with singular clumsiness. It professed to introduce a higher tone into English periodical literature by discarding anonymous writing. Its notice of public affairs, however, which of all parts of the "Review" most needed a responsible author, continued to be anonymous. In an article in the December number, Mr. Bright was quoted as having made these two statements: first, that all the land of England was in the hands of 150 owners, and all Scotland in the hands of 12; secondly, that the rich had no right to legislate exclusively for the poor, and, more than that, the poor had a right to legislate exclusively "for the rich." Now, in the first instance, Mr. Bright had said half England and half Scotland (a correspondent of the Times ingeniously argued that, to say that half Scotland belonged to 12 owners was the same thing as saying that the whole belonged to 24); and in the second case, the words "and more than that" are a mistake for the words "any more than." After some correspondence, the author of these statements acknowledged his name—he is a Mr. Danby Seymour, a Liberal M.P. and a friend of Mr. Bright's; he said that they did not matter much, and that, if they had been accurate, his inferences from them would have been justifiable, and a very lame apology was inserted in the "Fortnightly" for these gross and most invidious blunders. A Mr. Garth, however, a Conservative lawyer, has quite cut out Mr. Seymour. He asserted roundly that Mr. Bright was hated by his own workmen, that he had been hooted out of his own yard, that he had not subscribed for the mechanics in the cotton famine, and that, instead of subscribing, he had proposed to issue loans to the distressed, in order to keep them "as serfs at his beck and call." When asked by Mr. Bright to explain these audacious statements, he could give no authority for them whatever, except that two very extreme members of Parliament had once said something like some of them in election speeches, and that he did not know that they had been contradicted. Whereupon Mr. Bright told Mr. Garth that he was one of those persons who threw dirt recklessly, because they knew that, if necessary, they could afterwards eat it, which is about the truth. The most characteristic thing is, that a sound and rather eminent lawyer is perfectly prepared to believe any discreditable story about Mr. Bright, simply because it is discreditable, without so much as asking for evidence. Mr. Bright is, to Conservative imaginations, the incarnation of all that is diabolical, and the burden of proof is always upon him; he must establish his innocence or he will be assumed to be guilty.

These things forbode a degree of political rancor in the coming session such as we have not lately known. A rather unfortunate proposal has been made, which, if carried out, will not tend to diminish it. It has been suggested that another demonstration of working-men should be made at the opening of Parliament. As many men as possible are to go down, each bearing his own petition for the franchise, and the Liberal members of Parliament—such as Mr. Bright, Mr. Mill, Mr. Hughes, and Professor Fawcett—are to be asked to stand at the door of the House to receive them. It is a very ill-conceived and undesirable plan, in my opinion. It would look far too much like an exhibition of physical force not to disgust the great body of moderate men, and it could hardly end in anything but the collection of a huge, disorderly crowd. There would be no room near Westminster Hall for the numbers proposed, nor for any approach to them; and it is hard to see how the delivery of the petitions could be anything but a general scramble. The best Liberal papers, however, discourage it, and it will probably not come off.

PICTURES ON EXHIBITION.

MR. DERBY has opened very pleasant art galleries at 845 Broadway, and has "inaugurated" them by exhibiting the collection of pictures which was formed by Mr. Wright, of Hoboken, a collection chiefly known because of one picture, the "Horse Fair," by Miss Rosa Bonheur. This large picture hangs now at the west end of Mr. Derby's largest room, of which it occupies the whole width. There is no doubt in any one's mind that the picture is powerful and interesting. In some respects, and for some good qualities, it is even worthy of study. But such praise has been lavished upon it on occasion of former exhibitions, both here and in Europe, as belongs only to the greatest works of art; and this praise has been as mistaken as indiscriminate censure would be. The picture has nothing that makes it a great work of art. It is not even good art in any high and permanent sense. It does not pretend to be a work of color. It is not of unusual or surpassing excellence in drawing, nor are thoroughness and completion in drawing even attempted except in the nearest figures. The action, without being unnatural or theatrical, is often strained; and a general sense pervades the scene of immense exertion with no result but dust. There are plenty of weaker pictures, but some even of these the world could less easily spare. The great majority of female artists paint worse, and nearly all of them draw less forcibly; but after all, there has as yet been no female artist who could draw the human figure (for example) adequately, and none who has shown any power of color-composition on a large scale. The highest artistic powers, possessed by few, have never been manifested by women. And the accordance to Miss Bonheur of the highest place among women painters, and to Mrs. Browning of the highest place among women poets, does not include the ascription to those artists of power to produce great and immortal works of art. For the picture before us, meritorious as it is, there are better animal painting, better color, better landscape, better action and movement and stir, better human faces, better composition and picture-making, and better results from the union of these merits, or some of them, to be seen elsewhere and without going far. All of which in no way denies that the picture is valuable. It is well that this work of art is here in America, and is to remain here. But it is not well to go on praising it as if it were of extraordinary worth.

Mr. G. H. Boughton's little picture, "The Ambush," is a pleasant one to see, and it is good to compare it with the more recent and more highly finished "Hester Prynne" of the last Artists' Fund Exhibition. Mr. Boughton can paint a great deal better now than he did when this "Ambush" was painted. He now gives to snow and dresses and buildings and faces an appearance of reality very different from the shadowy suggestions of the same things in this picture. But the boys in the ambush seem to have been very positive existences in the painter's mind, faintly as they are shadowed forth on his canvas; very pleasant existences, too, "jolly companions every one," heartily fond of snow-balling and brimming full of mischief.

The picture called "The Village Perambulator," by Jules Adolphe Breton, of Paris, a celebrated painter now, but one of whose other work we have little knowledge, is very delightful, and probably the best picture in the collection. It curiously reminds the spectator of the recent pictures of Winslow Homer, though Mr. Homer draws better bare feet than those of the children in the picture before us. The breadth of ripening grain, with the squat church tower rising in the distance above the golden surface, and this group in the foreground, mother and children making the baby happy with corn-flowers and scarlet poppies, are as foreign to American soil as they are near to American and all human sympathies. We have no church towers like that, and if a good village church should somewhere be visible, it would not be five hundred years old, which we take to be about the age of this one before us. Nor do we have scarlet poppies in our grain fields—we only wish we had; but they grow with the wheat in Europe, from Yorkshire to Tuscany. We have no distinctive costumes, and probably never shall have; so that Mr. Homer will deserve our thanks if he will paint for us, with the accuracy he believes in and practises, and with the power he has gained by work, some of the beautiful things which we have not and which Europe is soon to lose for ever. His errand in Europe we hope is to do that. If he can do what he has done with American volunteers' uniforms and young ladies' dresses and hats, in Virginia camps and among New England hills, we shall have good things to expect as the results of his labors among the lake valleys of Switzerland, and in the as yet not rebuilt cities of Italy, and wherever there yet linger traces of national and distinctive costume. There was enough for him to do here, but there is also much that he can do to good purpose in Europe, and there is no use in denying that there are beautiful things for him to study which America has not and never will have.

The "historical" picture called here "The Diamond Studs," painted by J. N. Robert-Fleury, illustrating a very well known scene in the history of Anne of Austria, is one of those absurd pictures which have absolutely no artistic rank at all. M. Robert-Fleury is a very old man, if he still lives, and even in 1859, when this picture was painted, the strength he once had was gone. He was once a draughtsman of considerable power, and a historical painter of merit according to the last-century French standard of merit. But this picture has nothing but the pompous architecture of the background to give it even academical excellence. The drawing is as feeble as the composition or the expression of faces. There is no realization of the scene or attempt at historical truthfulness or possibility. The group is that of the operatic stage, with chorus and performers of wood. For the matter of color, which the artist's admirers think he gave his heart to in his age, the principal figures are invested in a uniform of purplish pink of which we never saw the like before, lights and shadows almost alike in hue; other parts of the picture are in a wholly different key, as notably some figures on the left, which are like stray bits of a ruddy-brown picture; there is not a smallest passage of delicate gradation, or an enjoyable scrap of pure and brilliant color, anywhere on the canvas. The whole work is almost below the reach of criticism, because hardly worthy to be called "art" more than the scrawling of a child on a slate.

Mr. Eastman Johnson's great and rapid improvement in the technical qualities of his art can best be judged by comparing his recent work, even the slightest of it, with this well-known and deservedly popular picture, painted only seven years ago. During those seven years the strong and dextrous painter has come into existence. It is especially delightful to see that this advance is not more marked in the faces and figures of men and women than in the slightest details; to see that this good and true painter has never lost sight of the rule, to paint everything as well as it can be painted. We do not know if this be his avowed principle of action; but he practises it in company with the good painters of most schools and eras, and with the great of all.

Mr. Leutze's "Lady Godiva" is here, and is one of the most offensive pictures that has ever been shown to the public. A coarse and vulgar woman, ill-drawn, worse painted, impossibly posed upon a very awkward horse, her streaming yellow hair without beauty of flow or of color, her blush a rough red wash; the lady of this picture seems to have been studied from an inferior circus-woman in tights. The painter seems to have imagined the scene as taking place in the seventeenth century; or so we read the meaning of the badly-designed architecture on the right. The half-timbered houses on the left have the look of a rather careful study from a tinted lithograph, which they strongly resemble in color. But all the valueless accessories are of little harm to a picture whose very essence is vulgarity. It seems to have been painted in close following of Tennyson: here are the famous "three tall spires," the "little wide-mouthed heads upon the spout," the "barking cur" who "made her cheek flame," and the other details of the poet's picture; but the painter's picture has none of the refinement which the noble legend demands and which the poet has given.

MR. AVERY'S SALE.

MR. S. P. AVERY'S collection of pictures was sold on Monday night, and the sale marks the breaking up of the pleasant art gallery and the useful art agency which has been for several years at the corner of Fourth Street and Broadway. Mr. Avery goes to Europe, as everybody knows, to hang American pictures at the French exhibition. But one returns from Europe nowadays; and we shall hope that a new art agency with larger facilities, and a gallery with a fuller and more frequently changing exhibition will come of the journey. Mr. Avery will have it in his power to be of even greater use to American art than he has hitherto been, and we shall anxiously watch for his return.

Correspondence.

MR. BARTLETT'S AND MR. FRISWELL'S FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Dear Sir: Two years ago, Mr. J. Hain Friswell, of London, prepared a book of quotations entitled "Familiar Words." The "North American Review" of July, 1865, and the "London Bookseller" of August, 1866, in noticing the book, charged Mr. Friswell with a dishonest appropriation of the fruits of my labors. In reply to the charge of the London periodical, Mr. Friswell says:

1. "Mr. Bartlett's book was virtually a reprint of the 'Hand-Book of Familiar Quotations,' published by Mr. Murray in 1853."

2. "Bartlett's volume adopts the title, plan, and quotations of its predecessor."

3. "Mr. Murray's begins with the Bible, and so does Bartlett's; and the quotations in both books are the same in the Scriptures, Shakespeare, Pope, etc."

To this I will only answer, that it will clearly appear, from an examination of the authors instanced by Mr. Friswell, that my book, so far from being a reprint of any other, is quite different. The "Hand-Book" has 216 lines from the Scriptures and 314 lines from Pope. Mine has 313 lines from the Scriptures, and the number of corresponding lines is 168; the number of corresponding lines from Pope is 112; and even for this degree of similarity I am but to a small extent indebted to my predecessor. The titles of the books are different. The plan adopted in each, of placing all the quotations from each author under his name, is the same; for this, however, I was not indebted to the English work, a copy of which I never saw until my book was going to press. My obligations to that work I properly acknowledged in the preface to my first edition of 1855, as follows:

> "This collection, originally made without any view of publication, has been considerably enlarged by additions from an English work on a similar plan."
> "Though perhaps imperfect in some respects, it is believed to possess the merit of accuracy, as the quotations have been taken from the original sources."

My fourth edition, which has formed the basis of Mr. Friswell's book, contains nearly three times as much matter as the English book referred to by him.

His obligations to me Mr. Friswell curtly sums up as follows: "Mr. Bartlett's fourth edition first suggested to me the idea of my own volume. I took from it several quotations, unfortunately, as in those alone do I find any blunders."

In reply to this I will merely state that eight impressions were printed of my fourth edition. A quite careful comparison of the seventh impression of my book with Mr. Friswell's shows more than three hundred blunders in his, and in mine less than twenty. As for the matter taken from me, which he would have his readers understand was limited to a few quotations at most, I find the whole of my volume of 410 pages in his book, excepting only sixty-five quotations. All of his notes, to which he calls attention in his preface as showing instances of parallel passages, are to be found in my book with the exception of four only; and these occur on pages 9, 122, 135, 196. His notes of a different nature also are copied from me, with the exception of twenty-four referring to matter added by him; and some of my material I find with the abbreviation "Ed." subjoined. A note of his on page 303, "See Spenser, ante, page 30," has no meaning whatever in his book, but is appropriate in mine.

Mr. Friswell has stated, in his preface to his first edition, "It is believed that no other work exists in the English language at once so copious and exact;" and in the preface to his second edition, that "its merit is recognized as being the work of a man of letters, as distinguished from that of a mere book-maker." The following specimens of blunders made by him in using my book will show the value of these claims. Thus, he takes names from the running title or head-line of my page, and appends them to quotations, without verification, which has led him into the blunder of assigning passages from well-known authors sometimes to "Miscellaneous," and at other times, where two authors are given on the same page in my book, the name of the last only being placed at the top, he takes a quotation from the first and attributes it to the latter; e.g., Thomson and Dyer occur on page 229; the head-line is Dyer; he copies "Rule Britannia" and assigns it to Dyer. Thus he gives:

" 36. Herrick's "Seek and Find" to Lovelace.
" 49. Lyttelton's "Soliloquy" to Moore.
" 54. Herbert's "Sin" to Suckling.
" 75. Thomson's "Rule Britannia" to Dyer; a singular blunder in an Englishman.
" 114. Lowell's "Changeling" to Key.

In all his copying from me he abounds in similar blunders; thus he gives the wrong numbers to lines by using the number belonging to the quotation following or preceding the one copied, for instance:

"And prove their doctrine orthodox."—Hudibras, Part 1, Canto 1, Line 199.
"Compound for sins they are inclined to."—Hudibras, Part 1, Canto, Line 215.

Friswell copies the first line and gives it as line 215. Nor is he more exact in respect to his references of the quotations to the various authors and their different works, plainly from the same carelessness in copying; such as:

" 137. Byron, "Last Times," for "Monody on Sheridan. Last Lines."
" 144. Byron, "Prisoner of Chillon," for "Byron's Darkness."
" 179. Addison's "Letter from Italy," for "Addison's Ode."
" 295. Shakespeare, "Induction, Act 1, Sc. 1," for "Taming the Shrew, Act 1, Sc. 1."
" 321. Thomson, "The Seasons: Winter," for "Thomson's Hymn."

Finally, upon comparing, with my index, the "certain prominent words which remain on the surface of the memory," which Mr. Friswell has placed in italics, I cannot help feeling that this part of my book formed the staple of all his labors and the basis of all his research. Mr. Friswell seems to have acquired no accuracy by experience; and for the greater part of his corrections he is indebted to his critics. His second edition abounds in errors; and many might be added to the long list already pointed out by the "Bookseller," as found in the first 113 pages.

My book first appeared in 1855, and was published anonymously until ten thousand copies were disposed of, when, at the request of my publishers, my name was added to it.

I am under great obligations to many kind friends; but to no book of a similar character other than that already referred to am I at all indebted, and my whole obligation to that does not exceed a tenth part of the material of my fourth edition.

John Bartlett.

THE SUPREME COURT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In your short article of the 24th inst. on the proposed limitation of the powers of the Supreme Court, you have not, it appears to me, viewed the case with your usual judgment. The disposition to reverence things because they are old clings to us all very strongly, but the events now transpiring are fast unsettling our faith in the infallibility of our forefathers.

Judges are but men, swayed as other men are by their passions, their prejudices, and, we have of late had too much reason to discover, by their party connections. Does any person suppose that even in England, which vaunts herself so highly on the purity of her courts, decisions such as those of which our country so justly complained would have been made if the judges had not been corrupted, shall I say, by their prejudices in favor of the rebels? In this country everyday experience proves that our courts are not free from such influences. The State of Pennsylvania was saved by the election of Judge Agnew from being placed in opposition to the national Government on the subject of the draft, and that the United States Supreme Court is not free from similar influences we have certainly had mournful proof. The infamous decision in the Dred Scott case will remain a standing memorial of the baseness of the majority of the court at that time. Some of that majority still occupy seats on the bench.

A law of Congress is enacted by the concurrent action of both Houses and signed by the President, or, if he interpose his veto, by a majority of two-thirds of both branches of the legislature; yet a mere majority of the judges, five out of nine, can set aside a statute which has been passed, unanimously if you please, by both Houses, and has received the sanction of the President, and that by their mere votes, for they are not required to give written opinions. The arguments of the minority may be unanswerable, but the votes of the majority, supported as they were in the case above mentioned by arguments which were enough to make a person who had any regard for the character of the court blush with shame, settle the case. True, the good sense of the nation, no thanks to the court or to the rule under which they act, has proved that their decisions are not "final."

When a law of doubtful propriety has been passed, it may be repealed; but "a Supreme Court decision is for all practical purposes final." Surely you could not have been serious in offering this as an argument in favor of the present rule. To my mind it is one of the strong points against it. Shall a mere majority, five out of nine, have power to decide finally the important political questions of the day against the great body of Congress, supported as they are by a vast majority of the people and by the settled opinion of the nation? Were they as incorruptible as angels they would hardly be worthy of such trust; and surely when men who disgraced themselves by being parties to the infamous Dred Scott decision sit on the bench, some bounds should be set to their power.

Nor does the argument, "that in every case tried, some one man, plaintiff or defendant, would have to submit his case to a tribunal in which the chances against him would be as three to one or as two to one," even were it sound, which a little reflection will prove it is not, have any weight in my mind. The proposed rule applies only in cases in which the validity of a law of Congress is called in question. In a majority of such cases the private parties have public ends to answer by such suits. The controversy generally arises after the law has been passed, and no man has a right to base his conduct on the assumption that a law of the land is unconstitutional. But aside from this, how does the case stand? Either the judges are upright, unbiassed by party ties and by their prejudices, or they are not. If they are, then every man has a court which he may confidently trust with a righteous cause. If they are not, surely a mere majority, irresponsible save through the almost impossible means of impeachment, should not have the power to override the other branches of the government and settle the policy of the nation finally. As well make them a permanent committee on reconstruction and do away with the tedious process of legislation. Much expense would thus be saved, and, as the court is at present constituted, the whole question would doubtless be settled more to the satisfaction of the President and his rebel friends.

Yours, S. A.

DELAWARE WATER GAP, January 28.

[A most extraordinary argument. Of course controversies as to the constitutionality of a law arise after the law has been passed, but the subject of the controversy may have existed, and generally does exist, long before, and if every man is bound to assume that an act of Congress once passed is constitutional as to all that happens after its passage, of course the constitutional restrictions on Congress are a farce.

Where did "S. A." get the notion that "upright judges, unbiassed by party ties and by their prejudices," are sure to agree on points of law, or that a majority against the constitutionality of an act are sure to be base? We are utterly opposed to having great political questions decided by the Supreme Court; all we say is, that we do not think that Mr. Williams's plan for preventing the usurpations of the court a good one. We do not think a "permanent committee" of eight a whit more likely to be right than a permanent committee of five, while it would be nearly twice as difficult to get a decision from it if unanimity were necessary.—ED. The Week.

THE New Orleans Investigating Committee has brought in its report—a very long one and a very good one, though somewhat diffuse. The evidence as well as the conclusions of the committee fully confirm the popular impression as to the nature and origin of the riot; show it to have been planned by the secessionists, headed by the Mayor, for the purpose of breaking up a meeting which, whatever its legislative powers might be, was undoubtedly legal; that such arrangements were made as to prevent the interference of the military; that Mr. Johnson's telegrams and correspondence, and especially his gross insult to Governor Wells in passing him over in his communications to the State authorities, led the authors of the massacre to count on the President's countenance and sympathy; that most of the butchery was done by the police; and that Mr. Johnson's statement at St. Louis that the "radical Congress" had planned the riot was a baseless fabrication. Neither in the House, nor in the Senate, nor in the caucus, had the Republican party given any encouragement to the promoters of the convention to expect any unusual support at Washington. Mr. Johnson's charge can, therefore, only be accounted for on one of two hypotheses, and we do not care to mention what these are.

THE Committee has appended to its report a bill for the government of the State of Louisiana, which has passed the House and will doubtless furnish a model for use in dealing with the remaining States of the South. It provides for the appointment of a provisional governor and a provisional council of nine, by the President and Senate—to hold office for one year, and to be supported, and their orders executed, by a competent military force, under the command of a brigadier. In October next a constitutional convention, elected by loyal men, of all colors, and by such ex-privates of the Confederate army as can show that their service was involuntary, is to frame a constitution which is to prohibit all political discriminations based on color and all attempts to pay the rebel debt or reward persons for service in aid of the rebellion. In June next the qualified electors are to elect a governor and legislature, who are to hold office until their successors have qualified under the new constitution. This bill seems to have supplanted Mr. Stevens's in the good opinion of the majority, who forced it rapidly to a third reading under the previous question, though there seemed to be a want of concert of action amongst its supporters. It promises well, and we hope it or something like it may be at once acted on. A singular incident marked the close of the debate on Monday. Mr. Eliot consented to an adjournment before the third reading, in order to let the members read the bill. Mr. Eliot's magnanimity in letting the House read one of the most important measures of this century before passing it, can only be equalled by the magnanimity of the majority in voting for two readings, and standing ready to vote for a third without having ever seen it in print. The "previous question" is becoming a kind of machine for the manufacture of laws, and can now turn out a dozen a day, on a pinch, with as much ease as the Hindoo prayer-mill, which, we believe, grinds off forty petitions an hour—such as they are.

THE Tariff lags in the House, and the probabilities seem to be that it will be bequeathed to the next Congress in its present muddle. We are sorry it cannot be tried at once, for the country will never have peace until the Tribune and the lobbymen have done their worst.

TWELVE or thirteen years ago, Mr. Douglas, Mr. Jefferson Davis, and the "Democracy" generally, were fighting hard, and apparently they fought with success, to spread slavery over Nebraska and the other Territories of the Union. But on Saturday last, in spite of Mr. Johnson's veto, Nebraska was admitted into the Union as the thirty-seventh State, and on condition that she should bind herself to make no distinction amongst her citizens on account of color. On the 29th ult. the Committee on Federal Relations of the Territorial Council, to whom was referred the consideration of this condition, reported decidedly in its favor. Practically, we suppose it will be faithfully observed, and answer its purpose. The new State is nearly ten times as large as Massachusetts, blessed with a healthy climate, somewhat warmer than that of eastern regions in the same latitudes, 40°–43°; the surface of the country is generally level or slightly rolling; the soil is excellent, producing wheat, maize, oats, hemp, sorghum, tobacco, hay, and clover. The vine flourishes; iron, coal, and salt are believed to be abundant. Omaha City, the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, is the capital, and is situated on the Missouri River. The railroad above-mentioned runs parallel to the Platte, the chief river of the State, for three hundred miles, and Nebraska is connected with the East by a road which runs from a point on the Missouri opposite Omaha City across Iowa to the Mississippi. With its railroad facilities, its excellent free-school system (excellent for so young a country, and soon to be better still), Nebraska offers great inducements to emigrants, and is sure to grow rapidly.

A VIGOROUS discussion of the power of the Senate to suspend the President, during his impeachment, has been raging during the week. Madison is reported, in Eliot's Debates, as having conceded the existence of the power; but Madison in his own report opposed, in express terms, the grant of any such power—for the very reason, too, which now makes General Butler and Wendell Phillips argue for its existence: that it would enable the majority "at any moment, in order to make way for the function of another who will be more favorable to their views, to vote the temporary removal of the existing magistrate." The proposition was voted down by 8 to 3.

Professor Dwight, of this city, has been making a careful examination of all the impeachment cases in English history, with the view of discovering whether this power of suspension during trial had ever been exercised, and has failed to discover a single example of it. On several occasions the Commons asked the Lords to address the Crown for a removal from office of persons under impeachment, but the Lords uniformly refused, on the general principle that the innocence of a functionary must be presumed until he is found guilty. We see as plainly as anybody the inconvenience of having Mr. Johnson in office during a long exciting trial; but we are so well satisfied that if the power of suspension of the President were once established it would be frequently used hereafter by a party vote to get rid of the President for the time being, when there was neither the chance nor expectation of having him convicted, that we hope no attempt may be made to put General Butler's theory into force. We have got to a point in the history of the nation when we must be careful what precedents we establish. Three years hence the South will be back in Congress, with the Northern Democracy at its back, and we should be sorry to see our Radical friends hoist by their own petard.

George Peabody has given a million towards the education of the South. The gift is a magnificent one, and comes at the right time. The danger is that the trustees will try to do too much with it, and, by diffusing it over too wide a space, make little impression with it anywhere. The best use that could be made of it would be to employ it in the education of teachers—a suggestion made, if we remember rightly, by the Evening Post.

In the course of argument every one cheerfully admits that there is no city in the world so execrably misgoverned as New York. But one particular statement may be more valuable for instruction than a thousand general confessions, and we offer the following case for the attention of our city readers and of members of the State Legislature. Ex-Alderman W. J. Peck holds by lease the right to run ferry-boats from the foot of Spring Street across the North River. He has held it for eight or nine months, and, we presume, has run the boats and collected the fares. Comptroller Connolly, in reply to a resolution of the Board of Aldermen, now informs that body that the city derives from this lease no revenue whatever; Mr. Peck virtually has a free use of the slip. Also, we are told Mr. Peck, in some unexplained way, enjoys the use of the square bounded by Spring, Canal, and Hoboken Streets—a square set apart for a public park—as a brickyard, and the city gets nothing at all for property worth to Mr. Peck twelve or fifteen thousand a year. As for the slip, it is possible, we suppose, to explain how that is held. The city offers this or that piece of property to the highest bidder; ex-Councilman or ex-Alderman A or B or C is at the time in possession; a person hired by him outbids all honest bidders, and is successful in getting the franchise, or whatever it may be, knocked down to him. But the successful bidder never appears to qualify. Meantime, of course, the ex-councilman or ex-alderman continues to hold city property. The time comes round when the property must be offered again; the gentleman—bar-keeper, billiard-marker, what not—whose bid is accepted, somehow again fails to appear when required; the ex-councilman must still hold the city property till it can be offered for sale once more in accordance with the law. And so the thing goes on for an indefinite period. The aldermen on Monday referred Mr. Peck's case to a special committee of three. The Park Bank, too, we observe, has got to "see" a committee before it gets leave to set up ornamental columns in front of its new building on Broadway.

The Government clerks in Washington have got their salaries increased twenty per cent.—a measure which everybody who likes to see labor fairly paid for and knavery discouraged will heartily rejoice at. The low rate at which Government officials are paid at present is a premium on dishonesty, and tends, with the uncertain tenure of office, to keep able and honest men out of the public service. There is no country in the world in which the salaries of officials ought to be higher than in this, for in none are there so many other more tempting fields open to talent and ambition.

The public has had its fill of Fenianism, and any journal—this side the Canadian line at any rate—who refers to it owes its readers an apology, which we hereby make. But the very latest incident connected with the movement is so perfectly characteristic that to withhold it would be a pity. When the O'Mahony fell from his dizzy height drafts were pretty constantly coming into the Moffat mansion headquarters, which the country "circles" had made payable to the order of O'Mahony's grand treasurer. These drafts Mr. O'Mahony's successors of course got cashed, so the above-mentioned treasurer-in-chief, the secretary of the treasury for the Irish Republic in America, brings suit against Mr. B. Doran Killian, Mr. Gleason, and perhaps half a dozen more. It may—and again it may not—seem incredible, but it is true, that the grand treasurer does not sign his name to the complaint on which the warrant for arrest issued, but makes his mark! There is one Fenian official then who is not homo trium literarum; at least, in one sense of the words.

The Board of Commissioners appointed by the last Massachusetts Legislature to examine into the condition of the manufacturing population of that State, and to report upon the expediency of enacting that eight hours' labor in mechanical employment should be a legal day's work, has made a report, which we have not seen, but which, judging it by a brief synopsis of it, is in great part a well-reasoned argument against legislative interference with the labor of free men. The report also declares that there is in Massachusetts a general disregard of the law forbidding the employment in manufacturing establishments of children less than ten years old. The law as it stands is directed against "owners, superintendents, and agents," and is evaded by letting the "overseers" hire the services of the infantile operatives. Of course, the parties to blame are the parents. We have heard of its being said by a well-known politician of Massachusetts, who should know the manufacturing population very well, that the operatives systematically increase their families in order that their children going into the mills may add to the family income. In the West, a farmer's boys are a part of his capital, and large families are considered a blessing; but the farmer's children are not forced to labor in occupations injurious to health, and are not forced to begin at nine and ten years old a life of unintermitting work, which makes their education next to impossible. It is not necessary to say—what we have heard said—that thousands of our Eastern factory hands compel their boys and girls, who ought to be in school, to support them in laziness; in its best aspects the matter looks as if it demanded thoroughgoing treatment.

The Boston Commonwealth is crying out for a "Lieutenant-General who will be governed by a higher law than the orders of his superior." This particular form of public nuisance is found in perfection only in Spain and Mexico, where each general has "a higher law" of his own, and we know the result. We trust that if it should ever show itself here, the people will abate it summarily. In the meantime, the constant reference to General Grant and his opinions at the present crisis are not edifying. His opinions are of no consequence, and ought not to be. His duty is to obey the civil power, and we have no doubt he will do it.

The somewhat alarming conclusions reached by Dr. Allen, of Lowell, in regard to the degeneracy and diminution of the native population of New England, are not received with assent by his medical brethren. On the contrary, they declare him to be mistaken, and, as regards some points, have already proved him to be so. For instance, when Dr. Allen says that in Massachusetts such a number of American and such a number of foreign children are born, it is the nativity of the parents which guides him in his application of the adjectives "American" and "foreign;" but when he comes to speak of the number of deaths in Massachusetts, the nativity of the parents no longer governs him, but the nativity of the person deceased. Of course, by such a method he reaches results which wear an unduly unfavorable appearance. How much falsity there is in his conclusions, so far as concerns the single case of Boston, is shown by a writer in the Medical and Surgical Reporter. Dr. Allen says that in 1865 the births in Boston were as follows: Foreign, 3,575; American, 1,641; Unknown, 60. The deaths in the same year were as follows: Foreign, 1,398; American, 3,143. Here, he says, the whole number of births exceeded the whole number of deaths by 734; but the deaths of Americans exceed the births by 1,520. But in order to be counted by Dr. Allen as a foreign decedent it is necessary that the deceased person should have been born abroad; when counted as a foreigner in the list of births, he only exacts that the child's parents, or one of them, should have been born abroad. But now let the computation of births and deaths alike be made with reference to parentage: Children of American mothers, 1,650; of foreign, 3,587; of unknown, 38; total, 4,541. Decedents of American parentage, 1,245; of foreign, 2,868; of unknown, 428; total, 4,541. The results of the correct calculation may be summed up as follows: American parentage—births, 1,650; deaths, 1,245; gain, 405. Foreign parentage—births, 3,587; deaths, 2,868; gain, 719. Unknown parentage—births, 38; deaths, 428; loss, 390. So, instead of a loss of 1,502 to the native American population, there really is a gain of 405—relatively a greater gain than that to the foreign-born population. Further examination of Dr. Allen's statistics, it is likely, will reveal other errors. It is not believed, for instance, that the returns of births and deaths in the rural districts of Massachusetts are anything like so perfectly accurate as Dr. Allen assumes them. But the lesson which he wished to teach is surely an important one, and we have no doubt that his efforts will do something towards impressing the minds of Massachusetts people with the necessity of better physical education for Massachusetts women.

THE Reform demonstration in England has come off and proved a great success, though we suspect the numbers in the procession have again fallen below the anticipations of the leaders. But of the spirit which lies behind the demonstrations there appears to be now no doubt. D'Israeli has opened the discussion in the House of Commons by a synopsis of what is called the "historic view" of the franchise, which, by the way, may be made to prove the correctness of almost any of the existing theories of the British Government. His attack on Goldwin Smith as "a wild man" is a bit of defiance which is hardly likely to help the conservative cause.

JOHN BRIGHT met by invitation, at Rochdale, on the 25th of last month, twelve hundred of his workpeople, who presented him with an address filled with expressions of the highest respect and confidence, and denying in the most absolute manner the Tory slander, according to which Mr. Bright was so odious that he could scarcely venture to visit his factories with safety. Mr. Bright, in his reply, very effectively turned the demonstration from a vindication of himself into a protest of his operatives in their own behalf. "If it were true," he said, "that we were the oppressors of those who lived near us, and to whom weekly we paid wages, you were the oppressed; . . . and if we were devoid of conscience, you were proved to be devoid of independence." He then proceeded to show what the authors of this and kindred aspersions on his character were devoid of, why they singled him and his establishment out of some five hundred others, and what had prompted them to this dirty business. He had not asked that the laboring classes might change laws or overthrow institutions, but simply that they might be heard in the hall of the representatives of the people. This was the head and front of his offending.

TURKEY, if we may judge from the last Cable telegrams, has at last become thoroughly frightened, and has, it is said, determined on emancipating its Christian subjects, and calling a "Turkish parliament"—whatever that may mean. It is as well to say that its Christian subjects were emancipated to all intents and purposes in 1856, by the Hatti Hamayoun of that year—but only on paper. The reforms then projected were never carried into effect; and the reforms now proposed would not be either, once the danger was passed. There are no materials in Turkey for the foundation of a constitutional government. A "parliament" composed of Turks and Greeks and Bulgarians and Armenians would be a sight worth travelling far to see, but its legislation would do little either for Turkey or mankind.

THE FREEDMEN.

WE notice in another place the action of the legislature of this State upon the question, Shall or shall not colored men be allowed to vote for delegates to the State convention?

—A bill has passed the Pennsylvania Senate, and is pretty certain to pass the House, "stamping out" the practice of excluding colored passengers from the public conveyances simply on account of their color.

—The Maine House has refused to agree with the Senate in so amending the law as to permit white persons to intermarry with negroes, Indians, or mulattoes. The vote was: yeas, 45, nays, 76.

—The Tennessee Legislature has almost adopted a bill enfranchising the blacks of that State—"the greatest victory since the war began," said Senator Fowler.

—The bestowal of suffrage on the colored citizens of the District, and the evident determination of Congress to secure them in the exercise of that right, have wrought some marvellous changes in Georgetown and Washington. Officials who recently were conspicuous in devising means to evade the several acts of Congress compelling education to be provided for blacks as for whites, since both were taxed for school purposes, now calculate nervously their chances at the next election, and reveal an admirable solicitude for the intelligence of their constituents. The Georgetown election takes place on Monday, the 25th; the Washington some time in June, we believe. Both will be watched with uncommon interest.

—The Maryland House of Delegates refused the use of their hall to Gen. Howard and Judge Bond, to deliver a lecture in aid and in explanation of the objects of the Baltimore Association for the Improvement of the Colored People, but gave the desired permission to the General alone. Never would Mr. Representative Clark, the "proud" mover of the amendment (all his own), "consent that Judge Bond, or any other Marylander who advocated the social and political equality of the black race, should have the use" of the chamber. Mr. Nelson wanted to know whether if negroes applied for admittance they would be let in; a kind of irony in which the chevaliers of slavery and color-prejudice have never been excelled.

—On the 6th inst. the Delaware House did two notable things: rejected the Constitutional Amendment, and defeated a bill to allow negroes to testify, and to make the same penalties applicable to black and white criminals without distinction.

—Gov. Cummings, of Colorado, has labored faithfully with the legislature of that Territory to procure equal rights for the colored population. His message of Dec. 13 closed with an earnest appeal on this subject, but it was disregarded. An act of March 11, 1864, had disfranchised all negroes and mulattoes, and last month, in spite of the Governor's veto, these classes were excluded from the jury-box also.

—Both houses of the Missouri Legislature are agreed in proposing such an amendment of the State convention as shall do away with distinctions of color.

—The City Council of Baltimore has appropriated $20,000 to the colored schools of that city.

—Gen. Howard has notified the agents of the Bureau that they are to exact no fees for their services between planters and freedmen in the matter of contracts. These, he recommends, should always be in writing.

—The colored mistress of a man in Louisville was poisoned by him on the 7th inst. The excuse which prevailed with the justice before whom he was brought, and who at once released him, was "that he was afraid the girl would tell his wife that she was with child by him!"

—The omnipresent "regulators" have appeared in the neighborhood of Wilmington, N.C. Their plunder was horseflesh, and their victims negroes.

—Inspector-General Sewell is engaged in Virginia, transferring the unsettled freedmen to homes in the North and West, when no homes can be found for them in the State itself.

—Fifty-four contracts were made by freed people in Kentucky during the month of December. The average wages of men were $16 41 and of women $8 50, monthly, besides rations and quarters as usual.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE Tariff Bill has passed the Senate with an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. on all English books printed since 1840. This is in itself an unnecessarily high duty, but the publishers are making a vigorous effort in the House to change the duty to thirty cents per pound, and have succeeded in inducing the Committee of Ways and Means to impose a duty of ten cents per pound on all English books printed prior to 1850, and twenty-five cents per pound on all books printed since then. This is intended, by its proposers, to be a prohibitory duty on all cheap publications. Under such a provision, the more valuable a book is, generally speaking, the less duty will it pay. But on the cheaper juveniles and illustrated books, on the cyclopædias, and all the foreign books that the ordinary reading public, who spend little, would buy, the duty is from 200 to 300 per cent. We doubt if the publishers would dare ask Congress directly to grant them such an immense duty; it is only by disguising it under the form of a specific duty that they think to obtain it. There is no danger of the publishing business being ruined, when it is well known that the larger firms have been obliged, during the last year, to work extra hours in order to get through with their immense business. It is difficult to see why importers, and why the reading public, who naturally desire cheap books, have not some rights as well as the publishers. The manufacture of books is not one that is necessary to the prosperity of the country. If books are cheap, what matter whence they come? The book-publishing business has grown up without protection, and surely ought to live without it. There is one argument used which every one can appreciate. It is said that there is but a certain sum spent in books every year, and it is much better that that should go into the pockets of American publishers than to the English. The imposition of a duty per pound on newspapers and periodicals is a mere individual annoyance to all readers and an advantage to no one. It compels every one to subscribe and receive his paper by mail instead of from an agent here. Such duties are a hindrance to popular education, a prevention of enlightenment and learning, a premium upon national stupidity and self-content. They can be defended on no public grounds, either of revenue to the Government—for the revenue was greatest when duties on books were only eight per cent.—or of advantage to the nation.

—Mr. A. R. Spofford, the librarian of Congress, has presented a special report on the historical library of Mr. Peter Force. This library is by far the most valuable collection of books and manuscripts relating to American history that has ever been brought together by one person in this country. There is a very large collection of the early American voyages; of early printed American books, every day becoming rarer, there are ten times as many as in the Congressional Library. Of the laws and journals of the early colonial assemblies there are over two hundred volumes, few of which have been reprinted, and none of which are in the Congressional Library. The Library of Congress has not an American newspaper printed prior to 1789. The Force Library has very complete files from 1735 to 1800, about 245 volumes. It has also nearly 40,000 pamphlets relating to America, of which 8,310 were printed prior to 1800. The collection of atlases, maps, and plans relating to America is absolutely unique. While the national library has not a single autograph letter or paper of our Revolutionary generals and statesmen, the Force collection has forty-eight folio volumes of rare and valuable autograph letters, beside various military journals, reports, private journals of George Washington, Gen. Greene, Arthur Lee, Paul Jones, and two unpublished manuscript works of Las Casas—in all 429 volumes. There are also beside about 310 folio MS. volumes of collections prepared by Mr. Force for his "American Archives," all copies of old papers, the originals of which are in many cases now destroyed. This superb collection Mr. Force is willing to sell to the Government for $100,000. He has refused that amount from private individuals, as he wishes it not to be dispersed, but to become the property of some great library. It is to be hoped that Congress will see the wisdom of purchasing this collection. At present the most complete collection of books relating to America is on the shelves of the British Museum. It will be to our shame if this deficiency is not remedied. The addition of this library to that of Congress will go far toward supplying it.

—We regret to record the death of Mr. Forceythe Willson, a young man whom his lately published volume, "The Old Sergeant," showed to possess considerable poetic power.

—A few copies of an interesting and singular book are to be seen and had at Scribner's. It is called "Hyak nia is'shiu, or Stanzas by a Century of Poets; being Japanese lyrical odes translated into English verse," by F. V. Dickins, M.B. The original text is also given, and there are added copious notes and a glossary. The odes themselves are great favorites with every Japanese household, high and low, and every Japanese child can repeat many of them. They are all short, of a peaceful character, some didactic, some descriptive, and many amatory. They abound in allusions and word-plays, and are written in the old Yamato dialect, so that there are very many commentaries on them. The oldest of them seems to date back about a thousand years, and the most modern was written at least six hundred years ago. Each ode has in the original, on an average, thirty characters or syllables, sometimes one or two more when the sounds of these combine with the sounds of adjacent characters, and nothing in the nature of rhyme can be detected in them. They are always read in a somewhat monotonous, singing falsetto, with scarcely any accent or emphasis, being, as it were, a mere slow recapitulation of the syllables composing them. The compilation was the work of Teika or Sadaïhe, about A.D. 1230. We quote one or two specimens:

"LXX.—RYOZEN HOSHI.

"In lonely solitude my home,
And from my cabin when I stray,
Where'er my wand'ring eyes may roam,
The landscape that doth round me [lay],
How desolate, how drear
Doth it at autumn e'en appear."

"XCIII.—KAMAKURA NO UDAIFIN.—A.D. 1303.

"Oh that throughout an endless life
I might in peace dwell, far from strife!
For ever watch the fishing yawl,
And view the net's abundant haul:
How fair to me,
How pleasant such a lot would be!"

—An English antiquary, Mr. Joseph L. Chester, communicated to the January number of the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register" a paper on the alleged ancestry of Washington, in which he conclusively proves that George Washington was not descended from the Washington family of Sulgrave in Northamptonshire. In a future paper he will endeavor to trace what he considers the true pedigree of the American family. It seems that in 1791 Sir Isaac Heard, then Garter King of Arms, compiled a pedigree of Washington based on the Heraldic Visitations of Northamptonshire, and finding in the Visitation for 1618 the names of John and Lawrence Washington, he took them for the two persons thus named who emigrated to America in 1657. Washington himself, in his answer to Sir Isaac Heard, says that he had often heard members of the family say that their ancestors came from one of the northerly counties of England, thus casting a doubt on the pedigree. Sir Isaac Heard himself only regarded it as conjectural, and made a note to that effect in his copy of the pedigree. Some years after Mr. Baker, in his "History of Northamptonshire," assumed the same pedigree, ignoring the note of Sir Isaac, and his version has been generally followed as authoritative. Mr. Chester shows that the John and Lawrence Washington of Sulgrave, the only ones of that family who could by any possibility have emigrated, were born between 1589 and 1602, and therefore would be about 60 and 55 years old at the time of their supposed emigration. In February, 1622-3, Mr. John Washington was knighted. Sir John's first wife died in 1624 and was buried at Islip, in Northamptonshire. Little is known of him after 1636 except that he married again, and is mentioned in various papers and wills in such a way as to show that he was probably living on his estate of Thrapston in 1661. He married a second wife, Dorothy, who died in 1678, her will and the parish register both speaking of her as "the relict of Sir John Washington, knight, deceased." His son John was also living at Thrapston in 1661–2. Lawrence Washington, of Sulgrave, took his degree at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1623 and became a fellow in 1624. In March, 1632–3, he was presented to the living of Purleigh, in Essex. He remained there till 1643, when he was ejected for his loyalty, but was given some small living after the Restoration. Further, John Washington, gentleman, not knight, the Virginia emigrant, states distinctly in his will, dated Sept. 27, 1675, that he brought his first wife from England, and that she died in Virginia and was buried on the plantation, and that his second wife was named Anne, whom he appointed his executrix. It will be seen that there can be no doubt that the present pedigree is erroneous.

BURNSIDE AND THE NINTH ARMY CORPS.*

Mr. Augustus Woodbury's "Burnside and the Ninth Army Corps" is a book of some five hundred and fifty pages, of large size. Long as it is, it is generally readable. It has many merits; but they are more than counterbalanced by one defect which pervades it, and that is its untrustworthiness. The author probably intended to tell the truth and nothing but the truth, and he may have thought that he was telling the whole truth; but if he did, he was very much mistaken. The task which he undertook was one which it was not easy to perform without giving wrong impressions. Such compositions as these are oftenest undertaken by minds which are under a strong bias; and when it is not so at the outset, the temptation to magnify one's subject and to pay too little attention to the doings and sufferings of others soon grows very strong. It is for this reason that the annals of regiments and brigades, interesting as they may be, must be so carefully used as materials for history. While we read of the doings of the "Fighting Onety Oneth" or some "Iron Brigade," we feel as if all the deeds of derring-do were performed by these few troops, and the rest of the army were only so many eaters of rations and contributors to the impressiveness of the tableau. General Burnside's position before the public, and the career of the Ninth Corps, had both of them certain peculiar features that made it almost certain that the chronicler of the doings of the leader and his corps would write under conditions unfavorable in an unusual degree to the precision, proportion, and impartiality of history.

General Burnside, the hero of some successes of inferior magnitude, and the principal actor in some of the more serious failures and the ghastliest defeat of the war, has enjoyed in a singular degree the confidence and admiration of his fellow-citizens. There is a magnetism in his appearance and manner which disarms criticism and wins regard, and his many excellent qualities make us only regret that he wanted the firmness to persist in the refusal to accept the high command which his knowledge of himself taught him, as bitter experience taught his soldiers, was beyond his powers. The command with which his name is most closely associated—the Ninth Corps—has also had an exceptional history, both in the fact that it saw service in various and widely-separated scenes and in the fact that it often constituted an army by itself.

Mr. Woodbury was not a soldier of the Ninth Corps, and was not an eye-witness of the scenes which he describes. The third paragraph in his preface makes us doubt his fitness for his task, for he there undertakes to pronounce the following judgment: "No corps in the army, with the exception of those which made the grand march from Atlanta to the coast and up through the Carolinas, has performed more arduous service, or marched or fought over a wider territory, than the Ninth." That this corps saw a great deal of the country during the war, is true. That no corps in the army performed more arduous service, is not true. While the Army of the Potomac was fighting its many sanguinary battles upon the Peninsula and before Richmond, General Burnside and his troops were in North Carolina, where their severest experiences were the comparatively bloodless victories of Roanoke Island and Newbern. The aggregate of killed and wounded in these two affairs was less than seven hundred men. At the Antietam the percentage of loss in the Ninth Corps was little more than half that of the Second. The Ninth and the Second formed the right grand division of the army at Fredericksburg, and the losses of the division were very heavy, but no statement of the loss of each corps is known to be accessible to the public. The language of the report of General Sumner, who commanded the division, and the fact that General Burnside, after his repulse, proposed to form a storming column of eighteen regiments of the Ninth Corps, create the impression that it was not much exposed and suffered little. At Chancellorsville and Gettysburg it was not present. Between the 1st of May and the 1st of November of 1864, when it was in line with, or a part of, the Army of the Potomac, it captured eleven colors and four guns, against forty colors and eleven guns captured by another corps in the same army. Not an officer of the staff of the corps was killed, and only one was wounded, while in the discharge of his duties.

Not one word of what has been written has been written with a view to depreciate the services of the Ninth Corps. It was a worthy part of the great army of the Republic, and shared largely in all the glories and losses that fell so thickly to its lot. It is only when an imprudent historian, in a somewhat elaborate work, claims for a corps exceptional distinction that justice to other corps demands scrutiny of the pretension.

Mr. Woodbury's postulate—not distinctly laid down but constantly implied—that General Burnside, next to General Grant, was the best soldier, and the Ninth Corps was the best body of troops, in the Union armies of the East, demanded of him certain sacrifices which he has not hesitated to make. But his tone towards the victor of Gettysburg is the most objectionable. He ventures to insinuate that General Meade was unwilling that General Burnside's combinations should be successful; that he consulted his own comfort unduly while important movements were in progress. He declares that the corps commanders of the Army of the Potomac, after the surprise of Fort Steadman, "would have been glad to have fought a battle under the direction of General Parke, without any intervention of General Meade." He states that Lieutenant-Colonel Pleasants, the miner, instead of recognition, "had nothing but ridicule at the headquarters of the army." He magnifies the credit due to Hartranft, commanding a division of the Ninth Corps, for his gallantry and promptness at Fort Steadman, and to Burnside, commanding the Army of the Ohio, including the Ninth Corps, in East Tennessee, at the expense of two most distinguished officers, by declaring that the conduct of the former was "as decisive in its way as General Sheridan's splendid achievement at Cedar Creek," and that "the deliverance of East Tennessee deserves to hold an equal rank with the victory which turned the tide of invasion from Pennsylvania." He goes out of his way to assert that in the winter of 1863–4, Sherman's "great march was already projected in the mind of General Grant."

Apart from the defects which are distinctly traceable to the partisanship of the author, Mr. Woodbury's book is as good as could be expected from a man of fair education, much industry, little military knowledge, and a strong tendency to fine writing, and especially to patriotic platitudes. Many reasons have been given for refusing to it a place among the trustworthy contributions to the history of our war. It is an interesting book from the necessity of the case. It is most interesting when it treats of operations on a comparatively small scale, which are within the author's grasp. Thus the account of operations in North Carolina, which occupies about the first fifth of the book, is generally excellent, and the chapter on the "deliverance of East Tennessee" is very good. It is true that it costs the author eight lines of great eloquence to state that General Burnside is of Scotch descent, that he was born in South Carolina, and moved from there to the West. To him the Merrimac is "the iron-clad monitor that lay in the harbor of Norfolk." He is very apt to pronounce confident judgments, the echoes of the crudest assertions of the press, upon subjects upon which he is not qualified, at least so far as appears, to form an opinion. He is as ready to declare that General McClellan made a fatal error in not transferring his base of operations from the York to the James after the destruction of the Merrimac, and that a "fruitful cause of failure" in Burnside's command of the Army of the Potomac was the training which it "had had in the method of fighting with the spade rather than with the musket," as he is to utter such truisms as "the health of the soldiers is necessary to their morale, and their morale is an essential element for their achievement of victory. Physical and moral feebleness is the sure condition of defeat."

And here it may be well to make a remark upon the matter of the use of the spade. An officer of the Engineer Corps declared at Yorktown, in August, 1862, that he had been all over the ground, and that the enemy had thrown more earth on the Peninsula than we. Neither army used the spade much at the Antietam, but the enemy used it more than we did. The cause of Burnside's failure at Fredericksburg is to be sought elsewhere, therefore, than in the army's training in the method of fighting with the spade rather than with the musket. The army that beat us had had more such training than the army that was beaten.

Mr. Woodbury, following the lead of General Burnside's advocates, seeks to fix the responsibility for the loss of the battle of Fredericksburg upon General Franklin. That officer has himself undertaken his defence, and conducted it ably, and there is not room here to review the controversy. But there is matter for serious comment in a note which Mr. Woodbury has appended to his chapter on this battle. It commences as follows: "The following conversation, which is authentically reported as having taken place between Generals Meade and Lee, at the headquarters of the latter, shortly after his surrender, may throw some light upon the subjects discussed in the text." Then come, alternately, three speeches of General Meade, and the same number of General Lee, in the first person, and in the form of familiar dialogue. The obvious inference from the introductory language of this work is, that this dialogue was "authentically reported" by some ear-witness, who gave not only the sense but the very words used by the speakers. In point of fact, no such report has ever been made by an ear-witness. If the conversation ever took place, it was reported by either General Meade or General Lee, and if either of those officers repeated it to Mr. Woodbury, or if he heard it, at one or more removes, from some person to whom one of those generals repeated it, he should have said so, and not given his readers the impression that he was placing before them the material of contemporaneous, verbatim report. It is by such carelessness, to use no severer term, that the purity of the sources of history is disturbed, and against such illegitimate use of hearsay we earnestly protest.

* "Burnside and the Ninth Army Corps." Augustus Woodbury. Portraits and Maps." 8vo. Providence, R. I.: Sidney S. Rider & Bro.

There is so much to tell in the history of the war that loose rhetoric is peculiarly out of place in a book which must be long or else leave unsaid things that ought to be said. Mr. Woodbury would do well to make his book shorter by leaving out such poor stuff as this: "The Ninth Army Corps took its place in the history of the war—a place unsullied by a single act of dishonor." "No stain of dishonor ever sullied their fair renown, and no stigma of shame can ever be affixed upon their bright record." "Never was there an army like that which was raised in defence of the Republic," etc., etc. It is amusing to read what Mr. Woodbury says in relation to General Burnside's resolving to take up arms at the outbreak of the rebellion: "There was, indeed, great danger; but the sentiment of patriotism was stronger than the regard for bodily safety." This is one of the most "refreshing" sentences to be found in the literature of the day.

To those who look for real merit in each new book upon our war, who wish that facts be carefully gathered and skilfully used, that praise be not bestowed almost indiscriminately, and poltroonery too gross to be extenuated be not passed by in silence (as those who know the unwritten history of the Mine know happens once in this book), Mr. Woodbury's book will not be welcome. To the soldiers of the Ninth Corps and their friends it will be pleasant reading, for it is plausible and full, and to their virtues very kind. Their virtues were many. The corps marched through many States and fought bravely on many fields. It displayed one soldierly virtue in an eminent degree, and that was esprit de corps. It may probably be safely asserted for this corps, that in no other in the army was there less jealousy or more harmony. Fortunate in the kindly spirit of their first commander, they caught their tone from him, and fought and lived and died like brothers.

The fame of the corps and of its officers is a part of the fame of the country, and precious in the sight of all to whom honor is dear. So much credit belongs to General Burnside and his soldiers of the Ninth Corps that they may well be satisfied with the laurels to which their title is undisputed, and need not ask of their historian that he should seek to add to them leaves or chaplets from the brows of others.

RECENT WRITERS OF TRAGEDY.*

To write a great poem, it has been said, appears the easiest thing in the world—to him to whom it is impossible. When a man coolly announces that he has by him a matter of seventeen dramatic poems, and that he intends to finish two more and make the whole number nineteen, it is not surprising that the reader thinks of the saying above quoted, and anticipates pretty bad plays from an author who seems to make so little account of play-writing. Let Mr. Osborn, then, have the benefit of the confession on our part, that we took up "Calvary" and "Virginia" expecting to find very little worth seeking. For Mr. Osborn announces twelve tragedies and seven comedies, all but two of which are ready for the press. And for ourselves, let us have the benefit of the statement that we were not disappointed, and that Mr. Osborn's plays were very far from pleasing us.

"Calvary" opens lyrically. There is a choral song of angels. Next Caiaphas urges Pontius Pilatus to arrest Jesus as a seditious person. Next, there is the closing scene of the first act, and in this Mary, his mother, seeks to dissuade Jesus from continuing in a course of life which will lead him to death. But one thing is at all noticeable in this part of the play; it is, that the mother of Jesus speaks to him as if in perfect ignorance of his claims to be considered as of divine origin:

. . . . "MARY. Still thou speakest
As if thou aye wert toiling at the work
Thou dost no more and hast not done for years.
Who is thy father, who thy brethren, son?"

In the second act we notice that the devils who in the first scene sing in chorus use some appropriately bad English:

"Onward strides the time
When the Prince of Heaven,
For whose sake, down-driven
From the heights sublime
Hitherward we fell,
Shall with human anguish,
Woe divine as well,
For a spell,
. . . .
By his sharp partaking,
Lighter make the aching,
Changeless which and fell
Makes us," etc.

The construction in the last complete line is very clumsy, and the italicized line above is so colloquial as to have a ridiculous effect. After the chorus of short-sighted demons, whom Lucifer rebukes for rejoicing over an event which shall be injurious rather than beneficial, we have a scene between Mary Magdalene and Judas Iscariot, who are represented as living together in unlawful love, and as being so poor that Iscariot, in order to buy wood, oil, and food to keep himself and his mistress from starving, decides to sell his Master. In the third act this is done, Caiaphas paying the traitor thirty shekels of silver, and Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, members of the Sanhedrim, opposing the whole transaction. Judas takes home food to Mary Magdalene, who refuses it, discovers the treachery of the renegade apostle, and makes him leave her to attempt the undoing of his work. Caiaphas refuses the price of blood, and Judas hangs himself. It is not necessary to repeat here a story which in its remaining course keeps in the biblical channel. Whenever the author varies from the scriptural account, or from the view held by Christendom in general, it seems to us that if he had succeeded, his dramatic success would have been dearly purchased, but also it seems to us that he has not succeeded. Nothing is gained by degrading Mary Magdalene into the mistress of Judas. Remorse, without her reproaches, would have been enough to have sent Judas to his gallows; and to make Judas betray Jesus because he and his mistress were hungry is to give him not so powerful or impressive a motive as the one that the pulpits commonly attribute to him—the sordid desire of an earthly soul to force the Messiah into declaring himself in all his glory and entering on his career of temporal splendor.

But aside from bad management of those parts which are incidental, the subject is very badly chosen. It is oppressively great; it does not admit of the ordinary tragic treatment. The strictly human passions which were displayed in the Sanhedrim, the judgment hall, and in the garden and on the hill of Calvary, the spectator cannot but feel were not the efficient agents in bringing about the result. It is true, too, that the woes and misfortunes do not fill the soul with the grief, indignation, and terror which tragic woes excite. And the victim is a willing and conscious sacrifice, and not the puppet of destiny. This is all above and aside from tragedy, whether ancient or modern. We say nothing, therefore, of Mr. Osborn's failure in poetic power in this instance.

In "Virginia" we find, as in "Calvary," occasional minor blemishes of style, pretty fair dialogue, business-like blank-verse, without more than a suggestion of poetry in it, which now and then is energetic and nervous, but generally is as good as prose, comprehensible by both pit and gallery if "Virginia" ever gets on the stage. The story of the tragedy is almost familiar. Livia, the mistress of the client Marcus, is made by the author a bitter enemy of Virginius, who had once rejected her love, and she it is whom Marcus brings forward as a witness that Virginia is her own child and not the daughter of Virginius's wife. Except this incident, there is nothing new, we believe, in the plot or characters. The decemvir is the well-known tyrant, Virginia loves Icilius and her country, Icilius harangues the people, Marcus is a sneaking pander, Virginius a manly Roman—all as we have been accustomed to see. Appius, according to Mr. Osborn, is killed in the Virginian riot. A brief extract will show the author's style, and we are glad that it contains one of the few passages which we had marked for commendation. The little touch which depicts Virginius ashamed of the falsehood he had felt compelled to tell the messenger—he a Roman centurion, having authority, lying to a slave—and which describes him as apologizing to his youthful nephews, we found quite a pleasant relief from the prevalent high-sounding, rather empty Ancient Romanism of most of the play. Virginius has tampered with the tablets the messenger was bearing to the camp:

"Virg. How shouldst thou know?
'Tis as it should be. I disturb'd the wax,
And then re-wrote it. There is not one word
But what stood there at first. Knows Rome not Appius?
Is my life nothing? Go. Thou losest time.
[Exit Messenger.
And we too, sons; our steeds are not the wind.
My daughter!
C. Num. What has chanc'd? Thou art so pale!
Virg. I'll tell thee on our way.—O Rome! O Rome!
My child!— Accursed tyrant!—— Boys,
Ye have heard Virginius lie like any slave.
C. Num. Lie, uncle?
Virg. Yes: what is it to deceive?
The words are nothing; 't is the intent alone
Makes them or true or false. That beaten slave
Had been but politic; but I, a freeman,
A Roman, and a soldier, cannot use
Ulysses' craft without both sin and shame.
Learn that of me; and be this cheek your monitor.—
Yet oh, my daughter! 't was alone for thee!—
Tyrant! I'll have thy life!— Come, boys.— My child!
[Exeunt."

Poetry, in our opinion, makes no gain in the advent of Mr. Osborn. The stage may get two or three sensible acting plays from his nineteen, but we are greatly mistaken if "Calvary" or "Virginia" is among the number. The dates which are prefixed—to "Calvary," 1864, and to "Virginia," 1847—if they mean the time of writing, would seem to show an advance backward; of the two, the earlier is rather the better. It would be wrong to close our remarks without saying that his notes appended to the plays give evidence that Mr. Osborn has worked hard for accuracy.

"Antonius," we presume, is meant as a dramatic poem and not as a drama to be acted. However it may be with acting plays, no dramatic poem was ever saved from oblivion by skilful construction of the plot alone, and we, therefore, take leave to tell the story of the tragedy in the briefest way.

Salome, the daughter of that wicked Herodias, having committed her sin in obedience to her mother and not from hardened wickedness of heart, is able to repent and become a devout Christian. She afterwards goes to Hispania to join her betrothed lover, Sextus, a Roman general, and is captured by a roving band of British pirates, who carry her to Mona. There Alpindargo, the aged Druid, protects her, and she is saved from sacrifice.

Nearly at the same time the mysterious Kaliphilus is cast upon the shores of Mona by shipwreck. The Britons try to kill him, but he is apparently invulnerable; moreover, he is a master of magical arts, so that soon the savage and superstitious islanders hold him in very high honor. At a later period Antonius, an old Roman general, is also shipwrecked and thrown upon Mona, believing himself sole survivor of all who were on board the fleet. In this he is mistaken, for Sextus and some others of the army are brought to land in another part of the isle. Here the play begins. Kaliphilus succors Antonius, and having learned, by patiently enduring several long speeches very full of imagery, that once the old man had a wife who played him false and a daughter whom he seeks, conceals him from the Britons, well persuaded that by so doing he keeps him from the sight of Salome, whom he suspects to be Antonius' daughter. In like manner Kaliphilus finds and secures Sextus.

In a love scene between Salome and Kaliphilus we find out who this latter is. When Salome danced before the tetrarch Herod—whom Mr. Heywood, by the way, following St. Mark, calls a king—she is seen by a young Hebrew, who at once becomes enamored of her. She begs the head of John; and the young Hebrew, Kaliphilus of course, having discovered that the executioner has scruples about killing so holy a man, offers himself as a substitute in the bloody office, and with his own hand beheads the prophet. Afterwards, when a greater than John went up the hill of Calvary, Kaliphilus smote him and bade him go faster. Thus he became the Wandering Jew. Salome pities him but cannot love, and exhorts him to repentance. It is his punishment, he replies, that the power of repentance is taken away from him; but he imagines that in love he could for a time forget the extremest pangs of his misery. He pleads hard; she, however, still refuses, and the magician resolves to obtain her by plotting. He demands her of her father, offering him, in case he will consent, the sight of her he had sought so long. Antonius refuses. Soon comes a day for sacrificing to the British gods, and it comes just as the Romans are about to make a descent on the island, indeed just as their fleet is in sight, and Salome is designated as the victim. Ullin, moved thereto by Kaliphilus, who wants a rival put out of the way, and chiefly moved by his great love for Salome, offers himself to be sacrificed instead of her. Kaliphilus asks the horror-stricken Alpindargo (Ullin's father) if he may have the maiden for his own if he will procure for the altar, instead of a girl, a stout Roman warrior. Surely yes, they answer him, and he produces Antonius. Hereupon Salome consents to wed Kaliphilus if her father (secretly they had met in the isle, and she knows him) may be spared. At once Kaliphilus presents for sacrifice Sextus—a young warrior in place of an old one. But now the Roman soldiers from the fleet rush in; there is instant battle; Salome is borne to a tower where her father and the faithful Ullin defend her against certain pirates who in the confusion would carry her away, and just as Sextus, wounded, fights his way in and comes to aid Antonius, Kaliphilus, entering by a secret door, seizes Salome in his arms and bears her away in triumph. This scene ends the poem, which in all the latter scenes is very spirited indeed.

But it is not an excellent poem. The language is not to be described as rich or forcible. The versification, whether in the lyrical or dramatic parts, is stiff and unpleasing. And as for matters more important—the play is not destitute of thought, but the author staggers under a theme so tremendous as that of "The Everlasting Jew," and cannot handle it. He can devise a plot and can conceive the outlines of a striking character, but he depicts character badly. Kaliphilus is now a mesmerizer and cheap juggler, now a tolerable villain of the order of Mephistopheles, but never the awful figure that he should appear. Salome is anybody or nobody. So are Thona and Ullin and Orla. Alpindargo is somebody; but for a sacrificer of human victims he seems extremely gentlemanly, and for an aged high priest extremely liberal in opinion. Antonius historically must be, we suppose, that Herod Philip whose wife, Herodias, divorced him in order to marry his half brother, Herod Antipas. Dramatically he is an old man, a very Elizabethan Roman, of not much account, who in one place terrifies the reader with indications that he is going to imitate Lear and go mad and talk disjointedly—a device which in the hands of modern dramatists generally leads to results which make one blush for our race. Kaliphilus frequently suggests Prospero and, as we have hinted, Mephistopheles. Of Theudas, his servant, we see but little; but that is enough to make us think him a base counterfeit of Caliban. He is very much deformed, fears and hates his master, and talks about gulping a fat toad. Ossian, of course, inspires the songs of bards and priests.

But there is evidence of imagination in the poem, of thought, and of labor. The author has not well embodied any of his characters; but, on the other hand, he has attempted it, and has not used the worn-out wooden puppets with which we are familiar to fatigue. Increasing years to ripen his judgment, to give him experience of the passions, and to give him time for hard study, will, we have no doubt, make Mr. Heywood capable of producing a poem truly good.

NOTES ON THE NEW EDITION OF WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

NUMBER XII.—STATISTICS OF THE VOCABULARY.

THE next title is Ab, originally a Latin preposition, but employed in English as a prefix implying separation, privation, etc. It is never used by itself, but only in composition, and is therefore only an element of words, not like the letter A, in some cases, an English word per se. In short, it is no more an English word than is the native negative prefix un-, or than the dot over the i is a letter of the alphabet. We may safely frame rule

Fifth. Affixes, or other constituents of words, which are not used independently in English, but in composition only, are not to be counted.

Next we have Aback in the familiar sense, and then as another form of Abacus. About the first there is no question. I reject the second as falling under Rule Third, the word not being distinguishable from Abacus except in termination.

On the last column of the page we find Abaft, preposition, and Abaft, adverb. These are one in form, they are the same in etymology, and they convey the same idea. But one is a preposition, or has a regimen, the other qualifies some other word, or is an adverb.

The words are perhaps logically indistinguishable, though grammatically belonging to different categories. I design to distribute the vocabulary into grammatical classes, and therefore, as a matter of convenience, I propose rule

Fifth. Words identical in form, in etymology, and in substantial meaning, but being different parts of speech, are to be counted separately.

The numerical result of all this is: We count A as three instead of one; we reject Aaronic or Aaronical, Ab, prefix, and Aback, abacus, thus gaining two and losing three, and leaving the number to be counted to this page twenty-three instead of twenty-four. It admits of reasonable doubt whether we ought not to reject Aard-vark, Cape-of-Good-Hope Dutch for ground-hog; Ab, the name of a month in the Jewish calendar; Abaca, the native word for Manila hemp—not Manilla, as misspelt in Webster—all foreign words not perhaps yet naturalized by act of the sovereign people; Abaddon, a proper name, Abacot and Abaiser, as words not sufficiently authenticated. But we must allow to lexicographers as large a liberty as to writers, and upon the whole I think all these words should be counted. I shall, however, not include them in the general summing up of the vocabulary, but enter them in a separate list, with others of the same class met with hereafter.

Let us now proceed to the examination of the second page. The number of titles is twenty-nine, including three braces or couples of words, namely, Abannation and Abannition, Abaptista and Abaptiston, Abatis and Abattis, all evidently different orthographical forms of one word. The two first cases, however, suggest questions of some interest in Greek and Latin philology, but which cannot well be discussed here. The first point which offers itself for determination is, whether Abandon, noun, obsolete in both the two senses ascribed to it, ought to be considered the same as French Abandon, now not unfrequently employed by English writers in a signification different from the two belonging to the obsolete noun. They are alike in form, in etymology, in radical meaning, and in grammatical class. Logically, they are the same word, but as English words they have a different history. The present use of the latter is not a revival of the former. The obsolete noun had never the meaning now exclusively given to the same form, and it is an important observation that at the time when the word was current in our earlier literature it had not acquired, even in French, its present signification. It is, therefore, a new importation introduced for the apt expression of an idea never formulated in English and for which our vocabulary furnishes no term. It is important to keep note of the obligations we are incurring to our neighbors, as an interesting point of literary history and of philological finance. I decide accordingly, though not without some hesitation, to count both words, and I lay down rule

Sixth. Words recently introduced from foreign languages in a new signification, though formerly employed in English with an obsolete meaning, are to be counted as different words.

This word Abandon is an example of a somewhat numerous class of terms recently introduced from abroad and used by good writers, but generally under protest signified by printing in italics, or by some more or less formal apology. Such words I shall count, indeed, but in a class by themselves, as in the case of Aard-vark and its fellows. The distinction between the two classes will probably not always be clear in practice; but theoretically, foreign words freely used by eminent writers in miscellaneous literature, though not yet current in familiar speech, ought to be discriminated from exotic terms not popularly known at all, and only occasionally introduced into scientific works or other special treatises not designed for general readers.

The next word on the second page is the participial adjective Abandoned. Shall this, and other words of the same class, be treated as a mere form of the verb, or shall they be counted as independent constituents of the vocabulary? I think they are to be considered simply as adjectives, and treated accordingly. They are used in purely adjectival constructions, without an auxiliary, and they are no way syntactically distinguishable from the adjective. In fact, a considerable proportion of our ordinary adjectives were originally participles of verbs either now obsolete or never introduced into English. It is true there is sometimes a practical difficulty in determining, in a particular case, whether usage sanctions the employment of a participle as a technical adjective, but this does not affect the principle. In order not to repeat the argument when the case arises, I may here state that I shall apply the same test to the active as to the passive participle, and we thus have rule

Seventh. Participles, active or passive, employed in common usage, or by authoritative writers, in adjectival constructions, are to be counted independently as adjectives.

The next word which suggests a question is Abanet, for the definition of which reference is made to Abnet. This should be rejected in counting, as only an orthographical variation, a simple duplicate of the other word.

Next we have Abanga, "the fruit of a kind of palm tree whose seeds have been thought useful in diseases of the chest." For anything that appears to the contrary, this word is peculiar to the Island of St. Thomas, and though used by one or more medical writers, it does not seem to be entitled to a place in an English dictionary. It will, therefore, not be counted in the general vocabulary, but referred to the list of similar words first above mentioned.

The editors of Webster very properly, as a matter of convenience to the student, make separate titles of the active and neuter, or as they, unhappily I think, call them, the transitive and intransitive uses of the verb, and consequently the active verb Abate makes one article, the neuter verb Abate another. There is, however, no good ground for treating these two as logically distinct, and there is no special motive for discriminating them in the enumeration. I therefore count them as one only, but see no occasion for formulating a special rule on the subject.

On pages third and fourth, I find no word which suggests any new question of principle, and I content myself with saying that on page third I refer to the alien list Abdal, Abdest, and the group Abelian, Abelite, and Abelonian, as foreign words which have acquired no rights of English citizenship, and reject Abderite as a mere geographical appellative. A B C, on the same page, I count as a word for the same reason as the letter A, a decision for which Robert of Gloucester furnishes me this authority:

> "Clerc he was god ynou, and yut, as he telleth me,
> He was more than ten yer old, ar he couthe ys abece."
> Chronicle, p. 266.

On page fourth, Abhal is counted out as a stranger, and Abhominable omitted from the enumeration as a word which, though very properly introduced into the dictionary, is only a corrupt form, an accommodation of Abominable to a mistaken etymology.

It is evident that, although in taking the census of the vocabulary, the whole alphabet must be mentally gone through with in the way I have exemplified, it would be a waste of time and space to continue the detailed and reasoned discussion through this series of articles. Unless, therefore, questions of principle, not now foreseen, shall arise in the examination of the alphabet, I shall, hereafter, as far as concerns the total number of words and of each grammatical class of words, content myself with stating results only.

Several Recent Publications.—Jerrold's masterpiece, the lifelike representation of the nagging feminine human nature—or, to speak more civilly and more as we prefer to believe, the strong concentrated extract of the nagging element as it is found universally diffused throughout feminine human nature—is here offered us by Hurd & Houghton in a cheap form. The illustrations by Keene are good, but the book has never been illustrated as it might be, nor, we have faith to believe, as it yet will be. So very enticing a field must sooner or later be the scene of many a triumph for some new comic genius. This edition should be a popular one, the volume being handy in size, the paper good, the printing done at the Riverside Press, and the price being quite low—as prices of books go nowadays in America.

In Volume X. of Harper's Weekly are comprehended the separate issues of the year just elapsed—a year which in our politics is remarkable for the struggle for the balance of power, which has lain and still lies with the freedmen of the South. Appropriately enough, the first engraving is that of the "Last Chattel," and never after, to the credit of the paper be it said, in text or engraving, are the claims of this unfortunate to light, protection, and equal freedom forgotten. In this volume, besides the usual world-wide miscellany of illustrations, we have some of the finest and most powerful cartoons of Mr. Thomas Nast, including those in which the President's tour is held up to ridicule with a degree of effectiveness only rivalled by that kindred artist, Mr. Nasby. Here also are a portion of Mr. Nast's caricatures displayed at the Academy of Music; and his illustrations to Mr. Harrington's novel of "Inside" may be praised for more faithful representations of American character and manners than it is probably within the capacity of any other designer to execute. Lastly, his picture of Mr. Lincoln's entrance into Richmond, if not worth alone the price of the year's subscription, is worth far more than the majority of pictures that such a sum would buy in our shops. We must not overlook, among some poor ones, the many really fine portraits of public men—Scott, Stanton, Bancroft, Sumner, Thomas Hughes, Bismark, and the rest. Maps of some of the Gulf States, of Tennessee, and of mid-Europe have a permanent value for almost everybody.

The fourth revised edition of "Familiar Quotations" leaves little to be desired on the part of the public in respect of accuracy or fulness, while the compiler and publishers have a realizing sense of the favor which this convenient hand-book has met with, in the fact that thirteen thousand copies were insufficient to supply the demand for it. The public, bent on getting the best, probably took it for granted that the credit due Mr. Bartlett for this collection was precisely what he, in all modesty, assumed; but the letter which we published from him in our last issue sets the question of his originality completely at rest. At least, we do not think Mr. Friswell will be inclined to pursue the controversy.

Messrs. Little & Brown publish also two editions of Walton's "Angler," with Major's commentary and Absalon's illustrations; the same in all respects except that the one intended for subscribers only is on large paper, and, by so much, more elegant than the other. The disciples of Walton and Cotton can hardly require a better garb for their favorite authors.

The eleventh volume of Burke's works, published by the same house, has just appeared, and contains still further documents relating to the Warren Hastings impeachment. With volume twelve, we believe, this carefully edited and well-printed edition will be completed.

A part of "The Mysteries of the People" has been done into English before, whether well or ill we confess we have forgotten it too thoroughly to say. But it was only a part, and now the whole is to be given us in eight numbers, at a dollar a number, each larger than an ordinary paper-covered novel. It would be possible, perhaps, to spend eight dollars for books in a worse way, and very easily possible to spend that much in an indefinitely better way than in purchasing this book of Sue's. It is not precisely "your scrofulous French novel" either, though it contains a good many pictures, more or less accurately drawn and colored, of historical scenes that might better not have been put before the novel-reading world. In his more elaborate novels, Sue is always a social reformer; after his expulsion from aristocratic society he began to write "novels of purpose." In this one he preaches that in all ages the people has been the great source whence flowed whatever is good among men, and that in all ages the people has been cruelly trampled and oppressed. The scope of his work is the fortunes of a plebeian family during two thousand years. Among all the Gauls, he says, but especially among those of Brittany, it was a custom to keep records of their history. Not only noble but plebeian houses thus preserved their archives. In the keeping of the family of Marik Lebrenn, a linen-draper of Paris, a descendant of Brennus, there are many manuscripts, and the story of the Lebrenns is complete from Druidical times down to almost our own day. To each manuscript was attached a relic—to one a golden sickle, a Druidical emblem; to one an iron collar such as slaves wore; to one a brass bell of the days of Vercingetorix, to one the skull of a child, to one an abbatical cross, to one a pair of pincers, an instrument of torture; to each some relic, and generally one of a sort to awaken sensations of gloom and horror and to suggest crime. To relate these tales is what Sue proposes to himself; and in this first number he expatiates on the tyranny of the priesthood in Jerusalem, who crucified the great moral teacher and friend of the poor, on the vile debauchery and horrid cruelty of the Roman patricians, on the destruction of Gaulish liberty by the Roman army under Cæsar, and it is plain to be seen that priest and noble are to be made to suffer in the coming volumes. The scheme was undeniably a great one, a scheme of epic grandeur; but it was M. Sue that carried it out. Therefore, in many places the work is defiled by the vile touch of the workman's hands. Its historical truth is of the kind that is as bad as falsehood, being the truth but not the whole truth. As for its answering the end for which, nominally, it was undertaken—why, the world will be a good deal worse than it is when men of M. Sue's abilities and propensities have devised its social philosophy; the world will be a good deal worse than it is before it commits the task to men like Sue. Mr. Clark and the American News Company put the work in the American market, and the translation, which seems to be a good one, at any rate it is a translation into good English, is done by Miss Mary L. Booth.

The ninety-first volume of "Littell's Living Age" is before us. Every Saturday has not yet succeeded in breaking us of the habit of considering the "Living Age" the best of all those periodicals which euphemistically may be called eclectic. The editors of them cull the best from the contents of the periodicals who pay their writers, but they cull without leave—"convey, the wise it call"—and we praise with serious reservations. But whoever will sink morality, will certainly find the "Living Age" a most excellent weekly visitor.

Why Colored People in Philadelphia are excluded from the Street Cars. (Philadelphia. 1866. Pamphlet, pp. 27.)—The author of this paper has put on record his protest against one of the most curious relics of the ancient barbarity still extant. It is a strange anomaly that Philadelphia has done as much for the extinction of slavery and the triumph of freedom as any other city of the Union, that it was the seat of the first organization for raising colored troops, that it fed and clothed them at its refreshment saloons, that it cares for them in its Soldier's Home now, and that, in spite of all this, to this day no negro can ride in one of its passenger cars. The pamphlet tells in plain, straightforward, manly phrases, and with a simplicity that lends strength to its rare bits of sharp sarcasm, the history of the efforts that have been made to remedy this mischievous prejudice. In spite of committees, of public meetings, of courts of law with decisions clearly against it, of applications for legislative action, which were strangled and not discussed, there is such a bad sentiment in the general public, such a universal agreement in this wretched prejudice, that the mischief holds its own. Of course it is indefensible on any ground of sense or reason or humanity, and nobody pretends to meet it with any argument of that sort. Nevertheless, by common consent, the privilege or right, call it which you please, that is accorded in every other town of the country, is denied in Philadelphia. The calm, measured tone of this pamphlet will lend it value when, hereafter, the people of Philadelphia shall look back on the curiosities of their older days; the same merit makes it worth reading and preserving in other places which can afford to look down on Philadelphia with some complacency, so far at least as this particular fault is concerned. Of course the good to be done by it is not confined to securing to the colored people the right of riding in street-cars, for that will come when the real work of the pamphlet is done. It is meant to show to the white people of Philadelphia the wickedness of fostering and keeping alive prejudices of race and distinctions of color, in a way that injures the whites in the eyes of all other white men, and blunts their own perception of right and wrong, and holds the colored people at a point lower than their rightful place, humble as that may be.

Faith Unwin's Ordeal. By Georgiana M. Craik. Tauchnitz edition. (Leypoldt & Holt, New York.)—That such novels as this vitiate the public taste is unquestionable; and yet it is a marvel that they have power to affect anybody's taste at all. Weak tragedy, made up of "great passions of tears," "sudden passionate movements," "passionate pity," "passionate cravings," "dry sobs," "white faces," "pale hands," etc., etc., ad nauseam—these one would think powerless over even the trembling sensibilities of the most susceptibly melancholic young women. But as there are young women who will weep at the very fictitious woes of very fictitious heroines, all more or less like Faith Unwin, it may be well to suggest other reasons for drying their eyes than considerations of pure sense. Such stories as this, then, we esteem immoral in tendency. The history of a woman marrying, but not for love, and afterward falling in love with a man other than her husband, is one not calculated to edify its readers, unless managed by a hand that is guided by philosophy and religion, as well as by the mere ability to stir up a morbid excitement. As a rule, these plots—and we take the present one for a text—come to nothing that makes it worth while to have waded through such seas of misery. Faith ends as she began—suffering; and in the end as in the beginning, we are cruel enough to say, this suffering is the evident result of lack of principle and mental ballast. Of course, if the authoress recognized this fact as plainly as her readers must, there might be no reason why Faith Unwin should not be an instructive, even if an unlovely, character. But we can discern no other motive for the book than that of screwing as much "passionate anguish" out of a lay figure and the English language as possible. To that peculiar class who love to fancy themselves in some special way marked out by Providence for woe, this sort of stuff is grateful manna—it feeds their disease. To the healthier portions of mankind we trust it carries its own antidote.

Breathings of a Better Life. Edited by Lucy Larcom. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867.)—The object of the compiler has been to bring together from the past and present some of the best thoughts upon the highest themes. This object has been well attained, and the result is a handsome little volume that will be very welcome as an aid to private and family devotion. The grouping of the various themes is most felicitous, and the choice of parallel passages from ancient and modern writers has been made with a great deal of carefulness and fine appreciation. The ever beautiful thoughts of Fénelon and Tauler and the Theologia Germanica, and the more modern speech of Bushnell, Robertson, and Beecher, teach side by side the same lessons of sweet trust and self-forgetfulness. For all that the compiler is herself no mean poet, the selections of poetry do not average so good as the prose part of the book, and we can but regret that some of them had not given place to her own verses. But the prose selections would have been still more inviting if they had been selected from a wider range of authorship, and if Dora Greenwell had been less of a favorite. The free use of this writer's pseudo-mysticism indicates the principal failing in the book, viz.: its excess of quietism, its constant reference to the passive virtues of the Christian life to the neglect of its more active side. It might be a more profitable task to complement the tender mysticism of Fénelon and Tauler with the earnest humanity of Robertson and Beecher, and it certainly would be a task in better keeping with the genius of these men, who have insisted on the active virtues of their faith more than on anything else. Miss Larcom's volume shows that they have been mystical, but the mystical element is not that which has especially distinguished them. This is a fine book for the sick-room and for those who can do nothing but bear patiently. But sickness is an episode. Health is man's normal state, and for healthy men an active not a passive type of Christianity needs most to be proclaimed.

Passages in the Life of a Faire Gospeller. By the author of Mary Powell. (New York. M. W. Dodd. 1867.)—This is a very pleasant book. It could scarcely be less, coming as it does from the same hand that gave us "Mary Powell" and the "Diary of Sir Thomas More." But it is not equal to its predecessors, not even to the last of them, "Cherry and Violet," for no fault of the writer's, but because of less intrinsic interest in the subject matter. As in the case of Milton's wife, the author takes certain liberties with the traditions which it would be pleasant to have justified if they can be. It is pretty certain that Milton's wife was not the sweet little fool that the "Maiden and Married Life of Mary Powell" represents her, but let us hope that this story of Mistress Anne Askew is based upon a careful study of the facts, and that it fairly sets forth the result. The received tradition is, that the Faire Gospeller recanted; the story says that she did not. But the success of the story is not dependent in any great degree upon this statement, for so consistent is the moral tone of the sweet Puritan's character that her recantation would involve no loss of faith in her, but would at once appear to be the yielding of the body, not of the invincible soul. The great superiority of this book and its companion volumes over the similar writings of Mrs. English—the author of the "Schönberg-Cotta Family"—lies in the fact that they magnify the character of the hero instead of his belief. Mrs. English teaches that persons are noble because believing so and so; Mrs. Warren that they are noble because while believing so and so they are not false to their convictions; and Mrs. Warren has it further in her favor that she is never sentimental, and always brief.

The Play Room; or, Indoor Games for Boys and Girls. A Complete Collection of Home Recreations. Illustrated. (New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.)—We are inclined to believe this little book almost all it pretends to be, and, whether or not, it certainly will be very much liked by all children into whose hands it may be put. There are play-room games from "Blind Man's Buff," which we know, and "Copenhagen," which we know, down to "One Old Ox Opening Oysters," which we do not know; all the board and slate games are here, and table and toy games like "Dominoes" and "Cup and Ball," and a dozen of "Comic Diversions" and "Parlor Magic and Sleight of Hand," together with the modus operandi of feats "Requiring Simple Apparatus," such as "How to Pass Six Cents Through a Table" and "Tricks with Cards" and "Curious Puzzles" and "Arithmetical Amusements." Also, for this is a nineteenth century child's book, and "the long results of time" are visible in the nursery, we have "Scientific Recreations" full of chemistry, "Optical Amusements" with camera, thaumatrope, and what not, and "Pneumatic Amusements" in great variety. The work is got up serviceably as well as cheaply.

Easy German Reading after a New System. By George Storme. New Edition. Revised by Edward A. Oppen. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt.)—The new system seems to us not a bad one. Little anecdotes, humorous, historical, or otherwise, are printed in coarse, primer-like type. Each difficult construction and each new word are explained in the copious footnotes, which occupy nearly half of every page. The learner then is not daunted at the outset by the length of the work to be translated, but is encouraged by its brevity. There is no turning over of a dictionary to distract the attention and impose manual labor, and one insensibly might, we should say, pick up a great many words to be added to his vocabulary, and a great many idiomatic constructions, by the use in odd half-hours of this little book. It is not too large for the pocket and it is cheap,

MILITARY RULE AT THE SOUTH.

MR. STEVENS's bill providing for the military government of the South, whatever its ultimate fate may be, has met with enough approval, both from Congress and from the country, to show that the eyes of the public are gradually opening to the extent of the blunder which was committed when the power not only of suspending the habeas corpus but of restoring it was handed over to the President. This was done, it is true, in the heat and excitement of the first years of the war, but it was supported with a profusion of argument by two or three of the first lawyers in the country. The inexpediency and danger of the thing were so plain, that the least doubt about the legality of it ought to have prevented its being done; no such power, we believe we may say with safety, was ever given to a single man in any country which made any pretensions to be free. Not only was the power of making arbitrary arrests conceded to the President, but he was declared competent to decide when he should assume it and how long he should retain it. Even in Rome the legislature determined whether a dictatorship had become necessary and how long it should last. In England, from which we have inherited nearly all our notions of civil liberty, Parliament alone can suspend the habeas corpus, and in suspending it it always fixes the date at which the suspension shall end. Of the technical arguments by which Mr. Lincoln's assumption of power was justified, we say nothing. Had they been twice as strong they ought not to have had the least weight with the people. The question who should exercise the right of suspending the writ and who should decide when it ought to be restored, as long as it was not expressly settled by the Constitution, was a political and not a legal question, and ought to have been decided on political and not on legal grounds. It is just one of those questions on which a lawyer's judgment is no better than any other man's. All history and all experience of human nature prove that no man is fit for the exercise of any such authority. Mr. Lincoln was as nearly fit as anybody ever was, or perhaps ever will be, but even in his hands it was abused. Mr. Lincoln, too, was mortal, and was sure to have successors of whose character and aims nothing could be known. He has gone, and his successor is in his place, and is armed with all his extraordinary powers, and is using them in such a way as to justify nearly every argument that was put forward four years ago against granting them. The power of restoring the habeas corpus he has used to restore the operation of the civil law in districts in which the civil law is a mockery and a snare, in which neither judges nor sheriffs afford the slightest protection for life or property, and in which United States laws are treated with just as much contempt as if the rebellion was still raging. The power of declaring the rebellion at an end he has used to hand over the government of the whole conquered territory to the rebels themselves, without giving Congress any time to decide what disposition should be made of it, or what legislation was necessary for the preservation of peace and tranquillity. We do not use the words "conquered territory" in any technical sense; we simply speak of the fact that the territory lately occupied by the government of the rebellion was when the war was over in the hands of the Federal forces, and subject, therefore, to the will of Congress, whose duty it was to reorganize civil government in it and to preserve order in it in the meantime.

We maintain now, as we maintained a year ago, that it was the business of Congress to suspend the habeas corpus, and that it is emphatically its business also to say when it shall be restored; that Mr. Johnson had no more right to declare the war over than he has to declare war or make treaties of peace. It is his duty to report facts—to say to Congress that the fighting had ceased, that the enemy had fled or laid down his arms; but the legal inferences from this it belongs to Congress to draw. A war is not over until the treaty of peace is signed. Our war has been legally decided to be, and was, a regular territorial war; and, if so, Mr. Johnson had no more right to declare it concluded and act accordingly than if it had been a war with Great Britain. The war with the South is not ended, no matter by what name it may be called, until the Senate has ratified a treaty of peace, or until, if there be no power with whom to make such a treaty, Congress has provided for the government of the conquered territory. Moreover, it is now generally recognized that it belongs to Congress to suspend the habeas corpus. It also belongs to Congress to restore it, so that the President's proclamations on this subject ought to be treated as so much waste paper. Personal liberty is too sacred a thing to be taken away on one man's dictum; but if taken away in the interest of the public safety, the public safety is too sacred a thing for one man to be allowed to decide how long the deprivation shall last. If questions of this sort ought not to be submitted to the legislative body, nothing need be submitted to them, and the work of government might be all done by the President and his cabinet.

It is not too late for Congress to reassert its jurisdiction over this whole question. Mr. Stevens's bill is the first step in this direction, and it is a necessary step. Mr. Eliot's is another. The Southern governments cannot be reorganized in a proper manner unless the Southern States are subject to the control of the United States forces. No election ordered by Congress could be fairly conducted unless the Federal troops were authorized to protect voters and maintain order. No act of Congress, looking to reorganization or reconstruction, can be effective as long as its execution is left to the local authorities, to marshals, judges, and sheriffs who all sympathize with, if they do not aid in, all attempts to resist or frustrate the law. Moreover, the protection of life and property, in all districts in which war or any social convulsion whatever has rendered the courts powerless, is the first duty of a government. That duty Congress is bound to do until society shall have settled down into its normal condition. The assertion that military law is not allowable as long as the courts are open is, when applied to the South, a transparent fallacy. It makes no difference in a political sense whether judges sit or not, as long as they do not do justice. A court is not simply a man seated on a bench listening to arguments. It is a man interpreting the laws without fear or favor, and armed by the community with power to carry his decisions into execution. If this definition be correct, there are no courts open at the South, and if there be no courts there is no civil law and no police. All the talk which we have heard in defence of Mr. Johnson's views on this point are so much sophistry, sophistry which would bring discredit on a tavern debating club.

There may be objections to Mr. Stevens's bill. It may give a color of support to a theory which we at the North might some day find highly inconvenient. But the preamble is a small matter. The main thing is to save Southern society, which the present state of things is rapidly barbarizing and will very soon break up. We hear a good deal of the blow which the spectacle of military rule at the South will give to civil liberty at the North and elsewhere, but we know of no state of things so dangerous to liberty, so well calculated to bring free government into contempt, as a state of things in which the constitutional forms are used to cover just such tyranny as the Turks exercise over the rayahs, in which trial by jury is used to promote the denial of justice, and in which judicial decisions on points of law are simply expressions of popular passion, and in which the sheriffs and police are in active sympathy with the law-breakers. There is no worse enemy of temperance than a drinking temperance lecturer; there is no worse enemy of religion than a dissolute professor of religion; and there is no worse enemy of free government than a country in which the forms which were framed for the protection of weakness and of innocence and freedom are used to protect robbers, murderers, false witnesses, and oppressors from the consequences of their crimes. This is the state of things which exists at the South, and it is with this state of things that our Government, in the interest of freedom and democracy, is called upon to deal. Reconstruction cannot be effected in a day. It is a knotty, troublesome business, to be considered carefully, debated thoroughly, and faithfully carried out. Let Congress take all needful time for it, but in the meantime let us have protection for life and property and free speech. No man ought to lie down under the United States flag in terror of anything which police and soldiers can prevent. Mr. Stevens's bill proposes, curiously enough, to pass the President over and impose the duty on General Grant, a little device which shows what a crooked condition the minds of some of the leaders are in. No bill can relieve the President of the duty of executing the orders of Congress in any matter requiring the intervention of a military force; and so far from seeking to relieve him of it, those who want to have him tried ought to seek, by every means in their power, to bring him face to face with the sharp test of a positive and clear injunction to do something. Should he disobey, there would then be a plain case against him. Hardly any of the objections made to Mr. Stevens's bill apply to Mr. Eliot's. The latter only proposes military rule ad interim. It makes the army subordinate to the civil power. It provides for reconstruction in regular form at a certain fixed period not very remote; asserts the power of Congress over the whole question, and prohibits all political distinctions based on race or color; and though last, not least, prescribes a certain course of action for the President. He must either obey or disobey. If he obeys, all is well. If he disobeys, let him be at once impeached at all hazards.

THE ELECTION OF A STATE CONVENTION.

THE judiciary committees in both branches of our State Legislature have very properly decided that it is the duty of the Legislature to summon a constitutional convention. The cause of doubt, as our readers may be aware, was that the constitution directed a convention to be called in case a majority of all the persons voting at the election of 1866 should vote in favor of such call; and that, while on this particular question the vote last fall stood 352,854 in favor and only 256,364 opposed, the total vote for governor, cast at the same time, was 719,195; so that a majority of the whole number of electors attending the polls did not vote for a convention. In California, under a somewhat similar provision concerning amendments to the State constitution, it has always been held that an amendment fails unless voted for by a majority of all the electors attending the polls. In Wisconsin, it was always assumed that such was the rule of law; and an amendment allowing colored men to vote, which received a majority of the votes cast upon that question in 1849, but not one-fourth of the gubernatorial vote, cast at the same time, was always treated as a nullity. So universally was this view adopted, that the Legislature of 1865 again submitted the amendment to the people, who rejected it by 8,000 majority. But the question being brought for the first time before the Supreme Court of the State in 1866, that court decided that the vote of 1849 had made the amendment a part of the State constitution. This adjudication is directly in point, and fully justifies the Legislature of this State in calling a convention. It is, moreover, entirely reasonable, being in accordance with the time-honored maxim of law and common sense, that silence gives consent.

The committees have further agreed upon holding the election in April next, so as to submit the new constitution to the people in November, and upon some other points of detail. On some questions, however, they widely differ. The Senate committee favor the election of four delegates from each Senate district, by manhood suffrage, without distinction of color; while the Assembly committee report in favor of the election of one delegate from each Assembly district, by persons qualified to vote for Assemblymen under the present constitution.

In regard to the first question, it is obvious that the Senate committee are actuated by a dissatisfaction with the tendency of small districts to send small men. The objection made to their plan is that it would probably exclude every Republican from the counties of New York, Westchester, Suffolk, Erie, and perhaps Kings; while it would also exclude every Democrat from the western and northern parts of the State; thus making up the convention exclusively of Republicans from the interior and Democrats from the southern counties and large cities. But in other respects this plan would secure the election of a class of men superior to those who will be likely to come from single districts. A solution of the difficulty would be most satisfactorily reached by allowing a representation to the minority in each Senate district; but we presume it would be impracticable to perfect this plan in time for the election. The probability is, therefore, that the delegates will be chosen by single districts.

The other question is one of more general interest and wider scope. It is not probable that the admission of colored men to equal suffrage will materially influence the result of the election; but as a precedent it would be of immense importance not only to this State, but to all the States. We have long maintained that the restrictions of a State constitution do not apply to an election of a State convention; and this was one of the first among existing journals to assert the doctrine that at such an election universal suffrage is a right, and not a question of expediency. To this principle we still adhere. The election of a convention is an act of reconstruction, going to the foundations of government. We admit that the majority may, upon forming the government, decide who shall vote; but we deny the right of a majority to exclude the minority from a voice in the formation of government itself. A convention represents society dissolved into its original elements. It is a legal and peaceable revolution. It meets to determine what the government shall be, and not merely, as a legislature, to decide what the government shall do. It is itself above all constitutions and laws. It is the uncontrolled, unfettered representative of the people except so far as it is limited by the act summoning it into existence. To exclude any portion of the people (except such as are excluded by the immemorial usage of the Anglo-Saxon race from political action even in revolutionary times) from participation in this work, is to our mind mere usurpation. If the "qualified electors" do not want to admit the mass of the people into their privileges, let them work in the regular constitutional channels, and abstain from breaking up the foundations of government by the super-constitutional step of calling a convention.

The bearing of this question upon reconstruction in the South is obvious. Congress is, we hope and believe, about to claim universal suffrage as a right, in the election of conventions in the Southern States. Not all the resolutions that the Legislature can pass, nor all the speeches which its members can make, will have half the moral effect in support of this policy that will result from the recognition of it in the practical manner proposed by the Senate committee. It is eminently fitting that this great State should, by a solemn and unmistakable act, declare that all men not only ought to have, but do have, an absolute right to share in framing the government under which they live. We have no doubt that such a step will be decisive of the question in this country for all future time.

The proposition to admit women to vote at this election is one that we are reluctantly compelled to oppose. We hope that the convention will look favorably upon the suggestion of female suffrage; but we think that the almost invariable usage of our race (broken in upon only in isolated instances) excludes women as much as minors from the ballot-box. We shall use our influence to break up this usage, as against woman; but we cannot see any ground of law or custom upon which she can claim as a matter of right to participate in the government.

We shall look with profound interest for the final action of the Legislature upon these important topics, and earnestly hope that its action may be such as will honor the State and advance the cause of equal rights throughout the world.

WHY BUSINESS IS DULL.

FOR the last two years we have grown so accustomed to "our unexampled prosperity," that we are loth to admit the possibility of any change, and are slow to give heed to paragraphs like the following, culled almost at random from the newspapers within a week or two:

> "The principal corporations in Lawrence, Mass., have just notified their employees of a reduction in their wages of ten per cent."
> "Sixty book-binders in Hartford, Conn., struck yesterday for higher wages, their pay having been lately reduced twenty-five per cent."
> "The coal miners of Pittsburgh have quit work on account of an attempt to cut down their wages."
> "The Lowell Manufacturing Co. are running their mills on three-quarters time."
> "All the rolling mills of Wheeling have stopped work, and one thousand persons are consequently thrown out of employment."
> "The wages at the Wamsatta mills, New Bedford, Mass., have been reduced ten per cent."

At the same time the complaint is general that business is bad, prices are everywhere declining, Wall Street is in a chronic state of discomfort, the internal revenue receipts are falling off, the reduction of the national debt has stopped, the failures for the year have again increased to more than double the amount of any year since 1861, the railroad receipts are growing less, and gold has again advanced from 131½ to 139. In short, business matters and business prospects generally are in a very unsatisfactory condition, and the whole country, but recently engaged in a grand chorus of glorification over our prosperity, is now getting ready to indulge in the corresponding fit of depression. It is worth while asking, What is the matter?

Answers are plentiful, but none seem to us quite satisfactory. Contraction of the currency, says one. True, the currency has been contracted about twenty millions since June 1, or about two and one-half per cent. in eight months. But it is likewise true that business continued extremely good, in spite of contraction, until near the end of the year; that money, in spite of contraction, was always easy; that there was no contraction in January, yet in January we witnessed the great panic in Wall Street, and that in the same month of January, in which there was no contraction, business was worse than ever. The fact is, that as inflation had nothing to do with the improvement in business, so contraction had nothing to do with the depression in business, except by its effect upon the imagination of thoughtless speculators.

Another answer is: The impulse of the enormous expenditures by Government is wanting. But the heavy expenditures of Government ceased nearly two years ago, while the country has been unusually "prosperous" until within the last two or three months.

The friends of Mr. Johnson point to Congress as the cause. The Radicals say the President's policy is to blame. Free-traders throw the responsibility upon the tariff. Protectionists argue: our business is ruined by the competition of the products of pauper labor in Europe.

The real cause of the depression in business is, in our opinion, as follows: The mischievous system, born of national ignorance and national selfishness, of raising money by loans instead of by taxation (thus creating the national debt), has deluded us into the belief that we were prosperous and were increasing our wealth, while we were in reality eating up our capital. From this delusion we are being gradually but surely awakened by that great, stern, silent, but impressive teacher of finance, the tax-gatherer. We are not going to trouble our readers with statistics, but we must use a few figures (correct ones, though) for the sake of clearness.

In the year 1860 the people of the United States possessed and used an aggregate capital of 16,000 million dollars worth of property, by the aid of which the combined labor of the whole people produced annually additional property to the value of further 8,000 millions. This annual product sufficed to furnish the whole people with food, shelter, clothing, and such luxuries as each one, according to his individual gains, could afford, and to leave a surplus besides. This surplus or annual saving amounted to about eight per cent. of the total annual product, or four per cent. of the total capital, or to about 640 millions worth of property. In other words, the whole people of the United States produced annually property worth 8,000 millions, consumed annually property worth 7,360 millions, and saved annually property worth 640 millions.

Has the annual production of property increased since then? We have no reliable data in the shape of figures; but when we know that one-third or one-fourth of the entire number of males of the chief producing ages were under arms for from one to four years, and one-tenth of them were killed or permanently disabled, it is safe to assume that production has not increased since then, but that it has actually diminished. Apart from this assumption, there are many scattered indications that production has really diminished, and of these indications the most striking certainly is that "the decline of industry" and "the diminution of products," which play so important a part in Mr. McCulloch's report to Congress, in Mr. Wells's report on the tariff, and Mr. Morrill's recent speech on our finances, are, by almost universal consent, accepted as facts, and are daily quoted as the worst and most tangible consequences of that "inflated paper currency" to which all our financial evils are now supposed to be due. We may, then, safely assume that production has not materially increased since 1860.

In the four years from June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1865, the debt of the United States increased in round numbers 2,650 millions. During that period the Government levied by taxation say only 850 millions. During the same period the Government of the so-called Confederate States raised by taxation and loans say only 1,500 millions; making a total of 5,000 millions of money levied and expended by the governments of the United States in four years, at the rate of 1,250 millions per annum.

We have seen above that, before the war, of the 8,000 millions worth of property produced annually by the entire labor of the people, 7,360 millions worth was purchased for consumption by the people themselves, and consumed or destroyed by them. Since the outbreak of the war the Government has appeared in the market as a purchaser of property to the extent of 1,250 millions annually, almost all of which property so purchased was consumed or destroyed. The ordinary consumption of the people before the war was 7,360 millions per annum; the consumption of the Government has been 1,250 millions per annum additional; the consumption of the people and Government together, 8,610 millions per annum. The ordinary production of the people before the war (and not materially increased since then) was 8,000 millions. The annual wants of the people and Government combined, therefore, exceeded the total annual production by 610 millions.

It may be objected that the consumption of the people during the war was correspondingly reduced. But every one knows that this was not the case. Indeed, the reckless extravagance of the whole people during the years of war has become proverbial, and, like the "decline of industry" and the "diminution of products," is incessantly brought forward as both proof and consequence of the paper-money inflation. There was no diminution in the people's consumption. The people consumed as much as ever, they produced less than ever, and of this diminished production the Government consumed more than the people had ever saved before. The whole country has been engaged in eating up its capital at the very time when it was congratulating itself upon its prosperity.

It is scarcely possible to doubt that the people of the United States as a whole are to-day poorer than they were six years ago. The national debt (hence called a national blessing) has until now disguised the fact from us. The internal revenue demands are gradually disclosing it to us. The last balance-sheet at the end of December has shown most people, that in order to pay their taxes they must hereafter spend less money for other things. In fact, this process of "spending less money for other things" has been going on for some time past, and it is this process, and nothing else, that in our estimation makes business bad. The process itself is likely to continue for some time to come, and to produce results far more serious than a panic in Wall Street or a temporary suspension of business throughout the country. But in the meantime it is quietly repairing the great damage done to the national property by the war, and teaching the people the great lessons—that no national advantage can be gained except by individual sacrifice; that war cannot be carried on except at a loss of comfort and wealth, sooner or later, by non-combatants, as well as of life and limb by the soldier in the field; that the expense and burden of this generation cannot be shifted from our shoulders on to those of the generation to come, but that the duty of to-day must be done to-day, or twice done if left until the morrow.

AMERICAN MINISTERS ABROAD.

THE McCracken correspondence brings prominently into view some of the many small miseries and inconveniences which those have to undergo who have the honor or the misfortune to represent the United States at foreign courts. In the first place, as diplomacy is not a profession with us, the men who do our diplomatic business are rarely trained for it—a circumstance which, if they only know the language of the countries to which they are sent, and possess some familiarity with the ways of European society, we do not consider a very great disadvantage as far as the conduct of the business is concerned. We have, on the whole, fared very well in most of the great negotiations which we have had to carry on, and have had, whenever we have taken pains, little difficulty in finding matches for the wariest and astutest of European statesmen. But, then, the very fact that diplomacy is not a profession in this country, and that all kinds of men are, for all sorts of reasons, sent to represent us abroad, inevitably lessens the social consideration enjoyed by even our best ministers. The best man we can select suffers more or less at the outset, from the fact that he is not a member of a regular calling, and that his fitness, either natural or acquired, may have had nothing whatever to do with his appointment. Then he has, in a measure, to bear a portion of the legacy of disgrace bequeathed by those who in the old Democratic days got drunk at this court, did not pay their bills at that one, and had street-fights at another, and at a fourth lived in an attic and did their own cooking. So that each American minister, instead of finding a high social position ready-made for him, as the diplomatists of other nations do, is apt to have to make it for himself. The presumptions, in fact, instead of being favorable to him, are too often against him. This is a small matter in the case of men like Motley or Adams or Marsh, whose character and standing are already known in Europe; but some of their obscure brethren have found that being an American minister did not at the outset smooth their path in foreign society.

In the next place, the European and the American theory of the use of foreign legations differs very materially. To European governments the conduct of negotiations is but one part, and often only a subordinate part, of a minister's business. In fact, it is very common, when affairs of importance are under discussion, to send out an envoy extraordinary to supersede, or at least act as adjunct, to the regular resident. The main object of European governments in keeping an ambassador at foreign courts is to get information of the temper, feelings, and opinions and tendencies of the classes who control the affairs of each country, so that when difficult crises arise the ministers at home may have such knowledge of the persons with whom they are dealing and of the influences by which these persons are affected as will help them to determine what they shall ask or what they shall yield. The duty of the diplomatist is, in other words, rather to supply facts than to make bargains or express opinions. Now, the qualities which fit a man to do this sort of work effectually are those which would fit a man to shine in the "good society" of any country—good manners, a good deal of social experience, a fair share of conversational talent, considerable knowledge of the world in which he is moving, skill in entertaining in his own house and money enough to do it with, and, above all else, a good knowledge of French, and also, in most cases, of the language of the country to which he is accredited. But French is always indispensable; we do not mean by "French" the horrible jargon in which the mass of Americans and Englishmen order their beefsteaks in Parisian restaurants, but French which will fit a man to talk easily and pleasantly on any subject that is likely to come up at a dinner table, to mark the finer distinctions in his own thoughts and catch those which are made by others in theirs, to play his part in a little badinage, and even to carry him comfortably over as much literature or metaphysics as is likely to present itself in the parlor, and which will qualify him to discuss any political subject with firmness and precision. No European diplomatist is considered fit for his place who has not at least the foregoing accomplishments; a great many have far more. His government, if it be that of a first-class power, pays him enough to entertain freely and handsomely without encroaching on his private fortune—though he nearly always spends more—and generally provides him with a good house. What it wants of him is that he shall be civil to such of his own countrymen as are of a certain rank, that he shall mingle constantly and freely in foreign society, and keep his eyes and ears open, and report regularly and faithfully what he sees and hears. Most of his work is really done at dinner tables and evening parties, and in clubs and in private chit-chat. Treaties, protocols, and "notes" rarely contain anything which has not been settled, or, at all events, shadowed forth over the wine and the nuts in town or country houses. And then the European ambassador is protected from too heavy drafts on his hospitality by the custom which gives nobody a claim on his social recognition who is not a member of the court circle at home, that is, who has not been, or might not be, if he chose, presented to his own sovereign. This not only keeps down the number of claimants on the minister's hospitality, but saves him from the necessity of having to sift for himself those of his country men and women who want to go into foreign society under his wing.

The American idea of the uses of an ambassador differ widely from the foregoing. The mass of the public here are so little used to seeing any political results accomplished by purely social influences, or in fact in any way but through the ordinary process of agitation, speech-making, and article-writing, that they would never think of selecting an ambassador for his social gifts. We are so far removed from government by classes or coteries, that nine-tenths of our people would be greatly amused if asked to give a man a high office because he spoke French well, could give handsome dinners, and made himself very agreeable in drawing-rooms. The qualities in a candidate for a diplomatic mission which most commend themselves to the majority of our political managers, who in this only reflect the popular sentiment, are of course, first of all, the political services in the last party struggle, and ability as a political speaker or writer, or as a lawyer. Occasionally the standard rises higher; it did so during Mr. Lincoln's administration under the pressure of terrible danger from abroad, but this is of rare occurrence.

Consequently, the chances are that when one of our ministers goes abroad, he finds himself unprovided with any of the tools which his brother diplomatists are using. He has, probably, never cultivated society much, and has no great powers of conversation. His knowledge of European life and habits of thought is imperfect; his knowledge of French so slight as to condemn him either to total silence or pantomime in general society. The Government gives him about the salary which would enable him to make a good show in a New England country town, and no house; and, nevertheless, makes it his sacred duty to pay every possible civility to every American man, woman, or child who can by hook or crook muster enough money to pay his or her expenses to the door of the legation. Fifty years ago, when it took six weeks with a fair wind to get from New York to Liverpool, and when a journey on the European Continent was done in diligences and post-chaises, and when only the Ticknors and Sillimans and Irvings made their way over, it was easy enough for an American minister to open his door to all his fellow-citizens and take them round to see the King after dinner. But the times have changed. Tens of thousands now cross the Atlantic every spring, of whom three-eighths belong to a class which in no other country in the world possesses the means of making the "grand tour," or ever think of it. Of late years a very large proportion of the very wealthiest have been persons who have made fortunes rapidly, and to say the least are not attractive in mind or manners. They swarm now in every European capital, and having plenty of diamonds and shawls, and couriers and maids, they see no reason why the European salons should not be open to them. They are nearly always determined at all events to go to court, and to make the minister take them, and the unfortunate man in most cases dare not refuse. He is pricked on the one side by the thorns of European etiquette, which he knows makes it improper for him to take people of certain callings or position into the presence of royalty; and he is assailed on the other by the fear of being abused and held up to popular odium at home as a snob and a flunky, a servile imitator of the bloated and effete aristocracy. He is sure to be made miserable whichever course he adopts, and as the opinion of his own countrymen is the more valuable to him, he generally succumbs, and ushers them into the court drawing-rooms in great droves, which furnish a laughing-stock to the other diplomatists and the society of the place. This the droves do not mind, however; they see the Empress and show their own clothes, and those may laugh who win. The late Mr. Mason, during his occupancy of the Paris mission, was in this particular one of the most kind-hearted of men, and never had the heart to refuse anybody who wanted a peep at the Tuileries on state occasions. So he introduced Tom, Dick, and Harry to the Empress, and at last introduced a German barber, whose profession, though he went to court in the sacred character of an American citizen, somebody had the cruelty to reveal to her Majesty, who was highly indignant thereat, the European theory being that the palace is the king's own house, and that he has as much right to choose who shall come into it as his guests as any private citizen in Fifth Avenue or Beacon Street. The result was that it was determined at court to make an effort to sift the American applications for invitations and presentations, and when Mr. Dayton arrived and sent in his list, he was asked to annex to each name the "qualité," i.e., calling or condition of the owner. This he declined to do, and the invitations were not issued, and some scores of women with their best clothes on and their hair ready dressed were stricken with consternation. Somebody intervened at the last moment and had the cards issued, so that much suffering and disappointment were saved, but the whole party received a severe "wigging" from Mr. Seward, who painted in glowing colors the vanity of court life, and the indecency of being abroad begging for Imperial invitations when the country was convulsed by civil war. A sensitive minister who mixes much in native society, and knows what the feelings of his brother diplomatists are, probably suffers enough in the course of a year, either from having to take his country men and women to court, or from having to find excuses for not taking them, to entitle him to a retiring pension. It is related that one distinguished diplomatist used, when a letter of introduction was sent up to him, to come down on tiptoe and take a view of the bearer through a chink in the door before receiving him; if he did not like his appearance, he was not at home; but if the disappointed visitor was a McCracken, he probably went off and denounced him as a "hater of our institutions" and a servile worshipper of the aristocracy.

Our own opinion is that no American minister of education and character will be able to endure the service, organized as it is, very much longer. The pay is miserably insufficient; the position is in many ways one of extreme difficulty and embarrassment. American travellers multiply with the growth of the country in wealth, and the impudence and exactions of many of them increase in the same ratio as their numbers. Their minister is to a large proportion of them a kind of valet de place, who is bound to secure for them abroad things which in European society are only granted to the possessors either of certain conventional distinctions or to great talents or great charms. And there is not one of them who may not prove any day, as in McCracken's case, a spy and slanderer as well as a bore, if there are men at Washington silly enough or base enough to read and use his tattle. Where the remedy is to be found we do not know, but it must be found somewhere. Either our ministers abroad must be released from all social duties, or they must, in performing them, be allowed to conform to the customs and even prejudices of the society in which they are living—in which case the McCrackens will fare badly.

ENGLAND.—REFORM—THE WORKING-MEN AND THE CLERGY

LONDON, January 25, 1867.

WE are beginning to think about the prospects of the approaching Parliamentary session; and the question most eagerly discussed is, Will there will there not be a reform bill? The Government is in a singularly awkward position. On the one hand, there is a very large party, and not merely amongst Conservatives, who would be anxious to put off the whole subject. We have, they say, plenty of matters to set right; the poor-law needs a thorough reform; our educational system must be thoroughly examined; the army and navy require an overhauling; there are many evils to be remedied in every branch of the law. Is it wise to postpone all these questions for another year in order to discuss the lowering of the franchise, which is far more capable of delay? If the matter were to be settled by the votes of gentlemen at the clubs or by a secret ballot in the Houses of Parliament, there is little doubt that these views would prevail; nine out of ten readers of the Saturday Review or Pall Mall Gazette look with simple distaste upon the whole subject. At the same time, both public men and newspapers have pledged themselves so deeply and so repeatedly that any such shelving of reform may be pronounced impossible. Those who most hate it are beginning to confess that some definite settlement should be obtained. The spectre must be laid, or his constant haunting will become unbearable. Even the Tory Standard calls upon the Government to bring forward the subject, and to secure at least the initiative for themselves. Government must do something—but what? Their party is well disciplined, but any strong measure would produce disaffection in its ranks. The Government themselves are divided. Mr. Disraeli, who is great at devising fancy schemes, and Lord Stanley, who knows which way the world is moving, are supposed to be in favor of a substantial measure. Lord Cranbourne, whose politics are the incarnation of an aristocratic sneer, and General Peel, who last session traced every modern evil to the direct action of the old reform bill, can hardly fail to oppose any genuine concession. Other members of Government represent all shades of opinion. How can any decided line be adopted in a case of such perplexity that the most decided steering is imperatively required? Mr. Disraeli can scarcely feel the confidence which he simulated last summer, when he assured his constituents that, whatever difficulties Government might find elsewhere, they would find none about reform. All kinds of expedients have been suggested. Sanguine people have prophesied an unreserved concession to popular demands—going to the length even of household suffrage; others speak of a bill which should attempt to put on a deceitful appearance of concession, by lowering the franchise, for example, but redressing the balance by a clever alteration of the distribution of seats; then there is the plan of issuing a Parliamentary commission to obtain more information, or of a candid announcement that with so many important matters on hand, the reform question must be, as the phrase goes, "hung up" for a session. Whether concession, or a delusive show of concession, or a policy of delay, direct or indirect, is to be adopted, it is hard to see how a Conservative government can both deal with reform and keep their seats. The play of party in the ensuing session promises to be unusually interesting. Its results will, of course, depend chiefly upon the strength of popular feeling out of doors, which it is hard to foresee.

There are to be more reform demonstrations, the projects for which have excited some feeling. The proposals to hold another mass meeting in Hyde Park or to present petitions in Westminster Hall on the first night of the session, have been wisely abandoned. They looked too much like a threatening of physical force, and suggested too great a danger of riots, to be regarded with much favor by reformers. Any disturbance would have played too much into the hands of the sheer obstructives. There is, however, to be a procession soon after Parliament opens; it will march from Trafalgar Square to Islington, at which place a public meeting is to be held at the large Agricultural Hall. I think myself that there is sufficient latent discontent to be capable of producing a considerable effect if party contests should happen to irritate it; but at present the current of feeling is not very strong. It may demand some satisfaction, but will hardly insist upon any sweeping change.

If anything could lead to a more violent outburst of discontent, it would be the continuance of such distress as has lately existed in the east of London. There is nothing which predisposes a people to revolution like hunger, and I fear that large numbers have been on the verge of starvation, whilst there have been some cases of actual death. The financial disasters of the last year and the depression of the ship-building trade, produced partly by strikes, have thrown great numbers of men out of work. The severe frosts which we have had this winter added fearfully to their distress; I know not how many families are calculated to be either receiving parish relief or to be selling off their last little bits of property. Large charitable collections have been made, and the return of mild weather will help to diminish the distress; but charity is incapable of providing a sufficient organization at a moment's notice, and the poor-law has of course been inefficient. It would be strange if it were not, for on the present organization of London, the rates in the eastern districts, inhabited entirely by the poor, are so heavy that to raise them would be to pauperize the whole population; those who are not actual paupers can only, so to speak, just keep their heads above water, whilst in the rich western parishes the rates are merely nominal. Discontent is not apt to be logical, but there is some connection between this difficulty and reform; it is evidently a very questionable policy which separates this huge city into totally distinct fractions, and burdens the poorest with the chief support of all the poverty which naturally gravitates towards them. Still, important as is such a question about a population of three millions, the equalization of poor-rates has never been discussed in Parliament. Now there is a strong presumption that a Parliament which entirely overlooks one of the chief evils of London, which it alone can remedy, is not a very perfect representative body. If the distress should continue to prevail, it will not only form the soil most favorable to the growth of agitators, but it will really afford some argument for enabling such complaints to make themselves more easily heard.

A curious indication of popular feeling on another point, which has also an indirect bearing upon the reform question, took place the other day. A meeting was held in London, attended by some of the most popular clergymen of the Church and of dissenting bodies on one hand, and on the other by a number of intelligent artisans. A very free discussion took place as to the causes which have avowedly alienated the working classes of the country from most religious organizations. The meeting was addressed by a carpenter, an engineer, a costermonger, an "ex-scavenger," a licensed hawker, and by men of various other trades; and responses were made by Mr. Maurice, Dr. Stanley, Canon Miller, Mr. Newman Hall, and various well-known men of different parties. I cannot say that many very original remarks are reported; there were the usual number of eulogies pronounced upon pure Christianity and upon the difficulties raised by the progress of science; the divergence of practice between the fishermen of Galilee and bishops with £10,000 a year was pointed out and denounced; and it was said with due emphasis that a workman who had been hard at work all the week in a close London street preferred "worshipping God in nature," by taking a walk in the fields, to worshipping after the formal respectabilities of the Church of England. Some of these difficulties which hamper the action of the Church here are probably not confined to England. But one important cause of dissatisfaction is produced by our State Church system. As a cabinetmaker expressed it, "There is a strong feeling amongst working-men that the State Church usurps a place which it ought not to hold; that it takes the property which belongs to the whole nation and uses it for the purposes of a particular class." As a rule, the working-man only comes to the parson when he is driven to ask for charity; consequently, as was explained by another speaker, a workman who attends the church is looked upon as deserting his order and sacrificing his independence for the sake of begging a little money. The richer classes having practically filled the churches, the workman is ashamed to come in his rough dress, and only despises those of his own class who do. Meanwhile, the system of patronage, as at present existing gives incessant scandal. One speaker described how he had heard read to a large company of working-men a newspaper paragraph, stating that an important living was in the gift of a certain Mr. Wyndham. Mr. Wyndham had been the subject of a very notorious lawsuit, in which he just succeeded in proving, in opposition to his relatives, that, although extremely vicious, weak, and extravagant, he could not be legally described as an idiot. That such a man should occasionally appoint the vicar of an important living, and that the right of appointment should be constantly bought and sold, is, to use a mild expression, an anomaly. Such social grievances were not so lengthily discussed as the statement that people did not come to church, as they did not come to a bad shop, because the article supplied was adulterated; but this argument is of less special application. Mr. Maurice was perhaps right in saying, that the only good to be anticipated from such discussions, was that the parsons present might go home and lay to heart all the objections which had been made to them. But the grievances felt as to the constitution of the English Church are also worth notice, as they are gradually working their way to the surface of popular discussion. I think no one doubts that as a body our clergy discharge a useful function, and discharge it zealously and well, especially in regard to education—certainly I do not think that dissenters do it better—but they will have, before long, to put their house in better order. It is their boast, and it is justified by the facts, that they are a body of educated gentlemen; but that very circumstance puts a wide difference between them and the working classes, with whom their sympathies are necessarily imperfect. With an effective representation of the working classes, some change must be introduced.

Paris, Jan. 21, 1867.

The world of Paris, having got through with the festivities of the New Year (including the Fête des Rois, when cakes of far less pretension, containing only a bean, do duty for the architectural confectionery and tasteful ring of an English Twelfth-Night), has been turning its attention with unwonted unanimity to the giving of dinners. Wonderful accounts are going the rounds of some of these gatherings; deliciously combined parties of clever and agreeable people, just numerous enough to excite one another's animation, yet not too numerous to form but a single group around the board, discussing, with learned and artistic discernment, the chef-d'œuvres of culinary skill and the treasures of rare vintages, and seasoning the delicate and abundant repast with witty sayings, well-told anecdotes, striking reminiscences, and brilliant repartees.

The hospitable hosts of the Tuileries have not as yet given any of their usual splendid dinners; but the first of the four state balls of each season is announced for the 16th inst., and these will be speedily followed by the Empress's private balls and parties, admission to which is so eagerly sought by the gay world of Paris in general, and by the American colony in particular. The Emperor, let me mention en passant, having given a cordial reception to General Dix, has paid to Mr. Bigelow the unusual compliment of presenting to him a complete copy of his works, magnificently bound, with the Imperial arms on the covers and the Imperial autograph on each fly-leaf.

A very splendid semi-official dinner was given a few nights since, at his residence in the Louvre, by Count de St. Sanneur, colonel of the Gendarmery of the Guard, to the officers of that distinguished corps. The count appears to have provided a most magnificent entertainment; for, after the dinner, which was all that a dinner could be in the way of eating and drinking, Sivori gave one of his unequalled performances on the violin; Kruger enchanted the company with his elegant and classic playing on the piano; Troy gave an air from Moïse, a song from the Anacreon of Gluck, and a melody of Russy; Berthelier and Block sang their best songs, less classic than those just named, but none the less enjoyed by their auditors; Alfred de Caston astounded them with his peculiar style of wonder-working, not exactly "conjuring," but even more startling and absolutely inexplicable; and M. Lemercier de Neuville threw them into fits of laughter with the performances of his inimitable puppets. The magnificent band of the Guard, under Riedel, played at intervals through the evening. If the enjoyment of the guests be the true measure of the success of an entertainment, the one in question may fairly take rank among the most successful on record. The officers, manifesting their delight with demonstrations considerably more demonstrative than is usual among a company of civilians, applauded the artists with a heartiness and enthusiasm that fairly electrified the latter, and caused them to surpass themselves in the excitement of the hour. Sivori, in particular, seems to have been influenced by the magnetism of all this admiration, and he gave them, toward the close of the evening, his well-known fantasia on the Carnival of Venice, with a lot of new variations and marvellous effects thrown in on the spur of the moment, and in a style that drove the company almost out of its wits. The artist, carried away by the enthusiasm of his audience, seemed at times to be almost lifted off his feet; his command of his instrument, and the marvellous, unearthly tones he drew from it, seemed, say those who were present, to be something "superhuman," and such was the excitement of all present that, had the little man been lifted up bodily into the air, fiddle and all, and carried about, à la Daniel Home, by invisible hands over the heads of the company, it would have seemed to the latter the most natural thing in the world. M. de Caston, with his puzzling feats, and M. Lemercier de Neuville, with his marionnettes, who occupy just now so prominent a place in the amusements of Paris, are well-born, well-bred men, thoroughly educated (Caston passed with honor all his examinations at the Ecole Polytechnique), having exercised a liberal profession. But the bent of their several geniuses has thrown each of them upon a new walk of his own creating; and after using their peculiar talent for their own amusement and the delectation of their friends, they have ended by devoting themselves to the professional exploitation of their several gifts, and appear to be doing a thriving business in their respective lines. The "old fogies" of the learned bodies among whom their literary and scientific acquirements would entitle these gentlemen to take their place are, however, much disgusted with their "frivolous" proceedings. The Academy of Sciences, to which Caston belongs, is so much provoked at seeing one of its members condescending to "work wonders" for money, at evening parties, that it has lately enacted a new by-law declaring non-eligible all persons who "exercise their talents for pay." M. Lemercier de Neuville, whose literary acquirements and published works give him a better title to one of "the forty arm-chairs" than a good many of their actual occupants, would probably, if he cared to solicit the honor of election, find himself black-balled on account of his overpoweringly funny troop of papazzi; an allusion which reminds me that when, lately, a friend of the eminent republican lawyer Jules Favre (whose ambition is believed to covet a seat among the "Immortals") undertook to sound a few of the latter as to the chances of the great pleader, one of the academicians replied:

"I, for one, should have much pleasure in giving M. Favre a white ball, were it not that he so openly declares his preference for another color, the red."

"As we already have among us both the white and the blue," retorted another member, less hostile to the brilliant legal orator, "I don't see why we need hesitate to admit the third of our national colors." "Nor I, either," added a third academician who happened to be present; "and, moreover, I think it might not be amiss to remember that we belong, after all, to the republic of letters!" In spite of which witty rejoinders, it is very doubtful whether the brilliant person whose possible candidature called them forth will ever be allowed to take the coveted place among the famous "Forty."

The recent inhumation of Cardinal Richelieu's head at the Sorbonne has not only afforded material for a great outpouring of penny-a-line-ing, but has been the occasion of a deal of discussion in regard to the authenticity, or otherwise, of a pair of moustaches, popularly believed to be those of Henri IV., and carefully preserved in a glass case by an inhabitant of the highest part of the capital, Montmartre. The researches set on foot for the elucidation of this question of authenticity have brought to light the curious fact that the whiskers of the murdered king were really cut off, just after his burial, by a person who contrived to get access to the crypt of the Cathedral of St. Denis, and were preserved by his descendants until a very recent period as an heir-loom; that the last of these descendants, a woman, who had inherited them from her father, had put them away, folded in a piece of paper, on the top shelf of a press, behind a pile of linen; that this woman died a short time ago, and that one of her nephews living in Paris, and who knew of the existence of the famous moustaches, which he had formerly seen in his aunt's possession, having written to the provincial town where she had resided to ascertain what had become of them, learned that the woman's heirs, on taking possession of her effects after her death, finding a packet of hair stowed away behind the linen, and supposing it to be a "tender souvenir" of some long defunct amourette of their deceased relative, had piously thrown the sentimental-looking packet into the fire.

With the sudden development of prandial entertainments, noticed in the beginning of this letter, there has been an equally marked increase in the passion for gaming, which is now assuming proportions hitherto unknown in this region. Khalil Bey, one of the partners in the obstinately-contested game of two nights and a day which lately astounded the Parisians, and whose enormous fortune enables him to stand losses that would simply use up less wealthy gamesters, has just had another "bout" with a congenial spirit; the net results of the game, in which enormous sums changed hands many times, being for Khalil Bey a loss of only 100,000 francs. A well-known Russian princess, whose passion for play amounts to a sort of insanity, being at Rome a short time ago, the Pope remonstrated with her so urgently on the subject that she at last gave him her word that she would never again sit down to a card-table. For some time the princess kept her word; but the contagion of bad example has proved too much for her, and she is now playing more madly than ever. Her conscience, however, is perfectly easy on the score of her promise to his Holiness, for she only plays standing. Old Baron de Rothschild seems to have been drawn, like everybody else, into the dangerous current of the hour. It is said that he had never been known to meddle with any game of chance, when, a few days ago, having stood for some time looking on at a game that was going forward in one of the salons of Countess D——, and having, as usual, no money in his pocket, he borrowed a napoleon of some one near him, and risked it on the game then pending. The ice thus broken, the keen old money king played on for some time, and left off at last with 30,000 francs in his pocket.

Several strange cases of the sudden disappearance of well-known persons have lately caused much disquiet to the public mind, the parties having been, apparently, spirited away, and leaving no traces of the mode of their disappearance. The latest of these is that of the brilliant young Prince Ghika, of the reigning family of that name, who has been living here for some time, leading the brilliant life of the jeunesse dorée of this gay and extravagant city. The young prince is twenty-eight years of age, had lately set himself up in a charming entre-sol in one of the magnificent new houses of the Boulevard Malesherbes, which he had furnished in very luxurious style, and where he had an elegant carriage, fine horses, and all the usual costly paraphernalia of a young and wealthy grandee. It appears that, soon after his installation in this apartment, he went out one day on foot without giving his servants any intimation of where he was going. But the hours passed on, the day wore away, and still the young prince did not return. Several days passed; the servants made enquiries everywhere among the prince's associates, but no one had seen him or could throw any light on his disappearance. The landlord and the trades-people, unable otherwise to secure the payment of the prince's rent and debts, have just obtained an authorization from the police court to sell off the effects left by him, and which will, accordingly, be disposed of by auction in the course of the coming week.

The new Japanese embassy is installed at the Grand Hotel, with an enormous white flag, with a gold sun in the centre, floating from the balcony of their apartment. They had no sooner reached Paris than they all rushed off to Nadar's studio to get themselves photographed.

Miss Adah Isaacs Menken is exciting the admiration of the Parisians by her personation of Mazeppa in the new ballet at the Gaîté, entitled "The Pirates of the Savannah." The Paris Yachting Club is talking about inviting the three gallant traversers of the December ocean to come over here and be lionized; and the Emperor is said to have given orders to prepare accommodations at the Palace of the Invalides for a deputation of six hundred members of "The New York Guard," whose uniform is declared to be "the most splendid in the world," and who are coming over to see the great exhibition.

A WOMAN'S THOUGHTS ABOUT VOTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read with interest your article on "Woman Suffrage," and since you fain would see the subject more fully discussed by those most interested in it, I offer you the following as the way in which I should like women to attain and use the vote.

I think women ought to vote not from any theory I hold as to their "natural right" to it, but from the simple, practical fact that in some instances men legislate wrongly for women, and in many others they do not legislate at all, so that the most important feminine interests and necessities are either inadequately provided for or wholly neglected. In short, after six centuries of masculine legislation, every thinking woman must be perfectly convinced that men cannot attend to their own business and to women's too.

Let the women vote. But how? Shall they attain it by a revolution that will endow them with political rights and equality at once and en masse? France has tried that in the case of men, as have Mexico, St. Domingo, and the South American republics, and the result has been not freedom, but imperialism in the one case and anarchy in the others.

When we look at the liberties of England and America, however, we see that they are not only stable and law-abiding, but that they are constantly growing and developing into something broader and nobler and more filled with blessings for all mankind. Why, then, should not women prefer to gain political enfranchisement as the men of their own race have done? Our English forefathers of the middle classes did not rise against their king and demand the political rights and suffrage that the nobles and higher clergy then alone possessed. No; but the king called them into Parliament to ask their consent to a larger sum of money than he exactly liked to seize by royal prerogative—in short, simply to tax them. At first they gave him freely all that he demanded; but, after a time, they granted supplies only on condition of "redress of grievances," so that the great historian Hallam tells us that by far the larger part of the most important liberties of the English (and, therefore, by inheritance, of the American) Constitution were purchased from the crown not with blood, according to the popular boast, but with hard-won money, "and chaffered for as distinctly, and with as little apparent sense of disgrace, as the most legitimate business between two merchants would be transacted." Lastly, when all these rights and privileges were enlarged into the ampler scope of American democracy, it was done not only through shedding of blood, but by immense pecuniary sacrifices also.

Now, for my part, so greatly do I honor the freedom of the English-speaking people above all other freedom, since I see it is the only one that has grown from within and developed itself into a living organism, that I do not wish to get my political enfranchisement in any other way than their way. The "emancipation of millions by a stroke of the pen" may do for those who can get it neither with a stroke of the sword nor by a stroke of work; but I prefer not to take from my country "that which costeth me nothing." I cannot fight for my political privileges, and, with my present principles, I would not if I could; but let me buy them with money of my own earning or saving, and then I shall be sure that I have them, and that my daughters will enjoy them after me.

What I would like women to do, therefore, is to engage to pay the national debt in return for the suffrage. The idea may seem perfectly laughable at first sight; but if all the five million grown women of the United States were to earn only half a dollar a day, and were to pay that into the national treasury, the debt would be paid in four years! Of course, this cannot be done as things are now, for few women would know how or where to earn even this small pittance. But give them twenty-five years to do it in, and fix the price of the vote at five hundred dollars, leaving it optional with every woman to purchase or not, as she chose. Perhaps very few of those now over thirty would buy it, as all their prejudices and education are against the idea; but the new generations that would attain womanhood within that time would grow up with very different sentiments. The idea of earning money for their country would redeem labor from its present degrading character in the eyes of our women; our young girls would be dreaming not how they were going to idle away their time in dress and dancing from the hour of leaving school until the bridal hour, but how they were going to earn their five hundred dollars for their country, and an immense spirit of enterprise and co-operation would spring up in all classes of the sex, whose benefit would extend to the most serious problems of womanhood long after the occasion that called it forth had passed away.

This, then, is the way I would have women attain the vote—I would have them PAY FOR IT.

And after we have paid for our suffrage, as did the English commons for their rights and privileges, how should we exercise it? Why, as they did; for these middle classes did not elect lords and princes to represent them in Parliament, but at their king's command they sent the chief men among themselves to look after their interests, and these delegates sat in a hall by themselves, debated by themselves, voted by themselves, and when they came to a decision sent it up to be ratified by the king and the lords. Thus did the House of Commons, and very sensibly too, since at that time the distance was too great between them and the aristocracy, and their interests too diverse, to admit of their discussing fully and freely before them.

And so it is now to a far greater extent between men and women, for if those old English yeomen got desperate against the tyranny of the crown, they could at least fight, as indeed on a few occasions they did. But what could women do against men? Have they not all the agriculture, all the manufactures, all the commerce of the country? Do they not control its armies—nay, are themselves its armies? What forces then could we marshal against them, poor and dependent on them as we are, and with neither instincts nor muscles to fight in our own defense? It is evident that the law-making power is the power of the purse and of the sword wherever that resides, and in this country it resides with the voting masculine majority, since this represents the majority of purses and of swords. Why then will not those who clamor for the suffrage for women have the common sense to see that if women did vote, their vote would represent nothing but opinion, since there is no power behind it to make it good in time of need? Above all things, let us recognize that we are women; and then we will not pretend to be in the state what most of us are not, even in our own families—a power; but will aspire to become what is much more feminine and benign, an influence whose sweet and womanly office it is to mitigate the fierce passions of men and to inspire them with nobler aims and a purer justice.

What is proper, then, in my judgment, is that we should be allowed to elect delegates of our own sex to sit in halls of their own in the State and Federal legislatures, for the purpose of deciding on and recommending to the Senate and House of Representatives those measures which the interest and honor of the sex imperatively demand. The subjects upon which feminine co-operation and action are needed are legion, but ranking them all by very far are the three great questions of feminine education, wages, and, alas! prostitution. No woman will pretend that this last foul blot upon the sex can be discussed and decided upon in the presence of men, even were they not the chief criminals; but when the Legislature of New York is about to "legalize" the infamy—to attack the sacred citadel of feminine chastity by law—then, for God's sake, if the women of America have any self-respect left, let them demand that this matter be given over to their investigation and decision, before men presume to lay their sacrilegious hands upon our own single, solitary, God-given right, infinitely more precious than life itself—the right to our own virtue. Alas! the law of this land made it impossible for a man to sell his personal liberty, and shall it now recognize that a woman may legally barter away that chastity which is not only her own most inestimable possession, but her country's also?—since all history proves that the freedom of nations stands or falls with the virtue of their women. The criminality of enslaving or even murdering a man is not to be named or thought of in comparison of the guilt of seduction, no matter what the victim's own wish or will in the matter; and the horrible abuse by men of girlish innocence, ignorance, and poverty is a more than sufficient apology for the request that a feminine branch be engrafted upon our legislative system, in order that there may be some public body in the state whose business it is to protect and watch over feminine purity. Set the wolves to guard the lambs rather than expect that men will do it! And it is time, high time, indeed, that the whole five feminine millions of us cry out "with an exceeding great and bitter cry" against this deprivation of our birthright with which, for the surer gratification of his cruel passions, the force and fraud of man is threatening us in swelling and ungovernable surges deeper and blacker than death.

ZERO.

[We publish the above as an expression of the opinions of a class of women who are not actively engaged in agitation of any kind. But the plan proposed seems to us to resemble strongly a proposition to give up railroads and transport goods on packhorses. Our forefathers bought their freedom simply because that was the only way of getting it.—ED. NATION.]

"To all who love poetry, Guérin deserves to be something more than a name. . . . . . He has, above all, a sense of what there is adorable and secret in the life of Nature. . . . . His magic of expression will make his name remembered in all literature."—Matthew Arnold.

THE HUGUENOT GALLEY-SLAVE;

Being the Autobiography of a French Protestant condemned to the Galleys for the sake of his religion. Translated from the French of Jean Marteilhe. 12mo, $1 50.

"As soon as the contents of this book are known, its circulation will exceed that of the most popular novel of the day. Open the book where you will, and it is almost impossible to lay it down again. 'It is,' says M. Michelet, 'a book of the first order, distinguished by the charming naïveté of its recital, by its angelic sweetness, written as if between earth and heaven.' Records like these do honor to religion and to humanity."—London Reader.

"We do not hesitate to say that a more valuable contribution to the records of genuine martyrology could hardly be found. The style of the narrative, in its graphic simplicity, reminds us of Defoe; but the well-authenticated facts which it relates are more interesting than fiction, and the incidents not less strange. There is no polemical design nor any element of theological bitterness in this volume. To record the virtues of noble-hearted men, not to reopen wounds, nor to cast odium on creeds or churches, has been the motive of its publication."—London Quarterly Review.

The Week.

THE combination of Mr. Stevens with the Democratic members to secure the defeat of the military bill is not a matter of surprise. Most of the Democratic Congressmen faithfully represent the narrow-mindedness of their constituents, who think a day's delay of a measure to which they are opposed a great victory, even though that delay should inevitably result in the enactment of something far worse for them. Mr. Stevens, on his part, correctly believes that every delay in reconstruction will make the final settlement more severe upon the South, and, therefore, willingly accepts all the aid which he can get from the wise politicians, like Mr. Le Blond and his friends, who oppose him in principle but help him in practice. They have already secured universal suffrage for the colored people instead of a limited suffrage; to this they added on Tuesday a mild clause of disfranchisement for white rebels; and if they can only throw the whole subject over to the next session, as they are struggling to do, they will enable Mr. Stevens to carry a sweeping measure of disfranchisement. The debt which the Radicals owe the Democratic party is almost incalculable.

MR. JOHNSON appears to have become at last sensible of his danger and of the dangers which his obstinacy was bringing upon the Republic. During the last few days he has manifested a great desire to come to terms with the moderate Radicals, and negotiations have taken place between him and sundry Republican Congressmen, which are expected to secure at least his withdrawal of offensive proceedings in opposition to the Congressional policy. "Long John" Wentworth affected much indignation at these efforts for conciliation; but although the House appointed his investigating committee, it evidently had no sympathy with his virtuous wrath. There is not the least evidence thus far of any impropriety on the part of the members concerned; and if they can bring Mr. Johnson back to reason and to a practical co-operation with the legislature, they will save the country from a distracting and perilous struggle to administer a punishment which the Executive has merited, but which is too expensive to the nation to be desired.

THE old bill for the equalization of bounties, the one which the House passed just before election, gave additional bounties to all soldiers. The one which Mr. Schenck, as chairman of the Military Committee, has just reported, only gives bounties to such soldiers as got none before. In other words, when during the war the States were called on to furnish, each of them, such a number of troops, some States got the men for nothing, while some had to pay out great sums of money in order to fill their ranks; and now nothing seems fairer to Mr. Schenck than that the States who burdened themselves with debt for this patriotic purpose should still further burden themselves with still more debt in order to help pay the bounties which other States, as Mr. Schenck conceives, ought to give their soldiers. How much money he wants, Mr. Schenck really does n't know; some said $600,000,000, he believed; but others said only $400,000,000; perhaps $250,000,000 would be required; but the committee believed that the aggregate would not be more than $75,000,000, or between that and $80,000,000. On which statement from a chairman of a committee the House proceeded to legislation, encouraged thereto by Mr. Banks, who, to be sure, voted against the measure, as any Eastern man must have done, but who nobly said that he cared not if the bill required $850,000,000 of the public money; "the soldier's claim was the bottom claim." Like any other man, a soldier who makes a bargain should stick to it; and a country can hardly be generous to the amount of indefinite millions when its financial affairs are in the condition of ours. But we acquit the soldiers of the country of the authorship of this measure, which had a politician for its father, and has few but politicians like Mr. Banks and men of his class for its friends. Doubtless the Senate will defeat this bill, as it defeated its predecessor.

THE Tenure of Office bill has been amended to suit the House by including Cabinet officers under its protection, and in this form goes to the President. Its enactment, with or without his signature, is assured, at which we heartily rejoice.

THE Senate, by one majority, snubbed Mr. Seward by cutting down his contingent fund from $60,000 to $30,000. Mr. Grimes stated that Harvey, the Minister to Portugal, whose salary Congress had refused to pay, had been paid out of this fund. Such an act would be grossly illegal and a contempt of Congress, but these are perhaps inducements to Mr. Seward in favor of such a course. Mr. Harvey is a small man, who has given occasion for many small proceedings on the part of his friends and his enemies.

THE violations of the Civil Rights bill which have taken place in the South within the last few months have for the most part been reported either by newspaper correspondents, by private correspondents of people living in the North, or by military officers in their official reports. The President, in replying to the Senate resolution asking if any violations of the law had come to his knowledge and what he had done to enforce it, informs Congress that the Secretary of the Navy had no violations to report, the Secretary of the Interior had none, the Secretary of State had none, the Postmaster-General had none, the Secretary of the Treasury had none, but the Secretary of War, he says, has reported three cases, that of Dr. Watson, of Virginia; that of Wm. Fincher, imprisoned as a vagrant in Georgia; and that of Mr. Perkins, of Texas, who protected a negro persecuted under color of civil authority. And the Attorney-General, Mr. Johnson says, reports that the Fincher case had been submitted to him by the Secretary of War, and that he had written to the United States Attorney for Georgia, requesting full particulars. Also, certain military reports of generals in command of United States forces in the South had been sent to the Attorney-General by Secretary Stanton. This is all, the President says, he knows as to the violations in question. What the military reports which the Attorney-General has in hand say in reference to the contempt of the law, the country very well knows. As General Thomas has just written in his letter to the mayor of Rome, Georgia, who demanded the release of certain gentlemen who had been put in jail for displaying the Confederate flag in that city, "everywhere in the States lately in rebellion treason is respectable and loyalty odious"—which is not a condition of public sentiment favorable to the execution of United States law of any kind.

WHO would have believed ten years—nay, two years ago, that stocks would rise and gold fall at the passage of a bill establishing universal suffrage, and that the reverse process would take place upon signs of its possible defeat? Yet this is what has just happened. Stocks fell one per cent. on Tuesday, on the announcement that the Blaine-Sherman amendment, providing for universal suffrage, had been rejected by the House of Representatives.

THE City Council of Philadelphia was greatly elated on Thursday by the passage of the League Island bill in the Senate, whither it had gone from the House. We apprehend that the country at large has little reason to join in this exultation. Regarding the question historically or de novo, it appears to us plain that the proffered site for a navy-yard is open to the most fatal objections on the score of convenience, accessibility, healthfulness, and economy. In fact, apart from the suspicious liberality with which it was presented to the United States, we can only account for its acceptance by the newspaper report that the vote was a bargain, the equivalent being the removal of the Naval School at Annapolis to New London, the prominent and, as we think, worthy rival of League Island. This sort of chaffering will have its own reward, and Philadelphia must not expect profits only. The President has approved the bill; but he has yet, according to its provisions, to appoint a board of officers to pass upon the value of the site. They will not need to be packed by him to deliver the almost or quite unanimous opinion of their predecessors in this examination, and we still hope that our iron-clads are not inextricably stuck in the Delaware marshes.

IN consequence of an article on "The New Indian Hostilities," which appeared in our paper on the 19th of January, we have received an old copy of the Rocky Mountain News, which contains a synopsis of the evidence offered in his defence by Colonel Chivington, who commanded at the famous Sand Creek fight, and with it we received a little pamphlet some time since put forth by John Evans, once governor of Colorado Territory. To speak of the latter first: We are inclined to believe that the report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, which severely condemned Governor Evans for inflaming the whites against the Indians, for prevaricating in his testimony, and for doing nothing to prevent the bloodshed of 1864, was prepared hastily and does not set forth the facts correctly. Governor Evans, as it seems to us, makes out a case against the committee, which he charges with culpable negligence as regards the examination of documentary and other evidence; and it follows that we believe him to have been treated with injustice and the people of Colorado with too little respect. As for Colonel Chivington and his volunteers, whose behavior at Sand Creek as it appears in the report of the committee would stain the good name of any nation, we are only prepared to say this, that the committee which failed in justice to Governor Evans may well enough be distrusted when it pronounces on other men judgments that if true disgrace us all. At any rate, Governor Evans has established the fact that the Indians killed at Sand Creek were very far from being at the time "friendly Indians." And it seems to be true, too, that their women, of whom some were killed, were in the rifle-pits with the fighting braves. But such affairs as the slaughter at Sand Creek may almost be called necessary incidents of our present excessively bad system of Indian management, and that must be reformed altogether, or a "Sand Creek massacre" is any day possible. If no other improvement can be made in our way of treating the red men, let us take a lesson from Brigham Young, who is said to find one bag of flour of more use in exterminating Indians than a dozen muskets. If we must kill them off, let us try the plan of doing it by making them comfortable.

IT is due to the State of Kentucky to say that its opposition to the emancipation of persons held to servitude is unaltered; that it has never altered its opposition to the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery; that it steadfastly resists the passage of the pending Constitutional Amendment; that it has never ceased condemning the enlistment of freedmen into the Federal service; that it holds fast the unalterable belief that the United States cannot coerce a sovereign State. Just now it has declared, by a majority of 59 to 23, in the lower House of its Legislature, that it is "unalterably opposed to the movement in Congress to place the Southern States under military rule." In fact, we may say that the eminently respectable but rather tiresome State of Kentucky has once more got its gig across the railroad track, and, in accordance with an incurable habit which it has formed, is addressing resolutions to the locomotive. We doubt if the last "Old-line Whig" of Kentucky has yet been born, and will not be writing resolutions one century after Henry Clay died.

FOR a week or so there has been going on between the Times and Tribune a dignified interchange of amenities which will help to raise the reputation of the "metropolitan press" and of the men who are responsible for what is printed in the two papers. "Sneak thief," "pickpocket," "treachery," "forgery," "preposterous lie," "breach of faith," "let it (the Tribune, namely) wriggle out of or bully out of this dilemma," "it (the Tribune) did attempt to swindle the Times out of an important piece of news"—these are a few of the phrases with which the rival editors have been plastering each other. The Times printed the report of the New Orleans Investigation Committee a day before its correspondent in Washington had agreed that it should; upon this the Tribune took its neighbor to task for irretrievably disgracing the profession of journalism, and covering itself and all belonging to it with infamy; the Times then informed the world that the Tribune tried to obtain the test-oath decision, for which the Times paid $400, by means of a forged order. So the battle was joined, and it is still raging; the reserves in the persons of the Washington correspondents of the foemen have been brought up, and the Tribune, if we may believe the Times, occupies at this present moment the position of "a sneak-thief in a corner." We took occasion, a week or so ago, to congratulate the enemies of barbarism on the happy confession of the Tribune, that calling a man a liar in controverting his arguments was a "gross indecency;" we had always known, we said, that the conversion was sure to come sooner or later. It must come later. From present appearances, a couple of centuries will be necessary before the gentlemen of the Tribune and Times will learn either that the public cares nothing for their disgraceful squabbles, or that in a controversy it is as well to leave one's weightiest word for a long time unsaid, and to refuse to use some words at all.

THERE has at last been a Fenian "rising" in Ireland; a few hundred probably half-armed men have taken to the woods and mountains as in 1848, to be followed by the troops, and doing more or less plundering on the way. The main object of the movement is doubtless to stimulate the collection of money, which has of late come in rather languidly. Probably one or two battles have been fought of the same magnitude and importance as the battle of Lime Ridge, in Canada, and we shall have by next mail glowing accounts of the flight of the cowardly British before bands of Fenian heroes, and loud appeals for fresh aid either in money or salable goods for "the men in the gap." Stephens is said to be in command, but we are inclined to think this rumor has been set afloat by his enemies, and contains a base slur on his reputation. Why should he expose a valuable life in the wilds of Kerry when there are still so many doubting spirits in New York?

As may be supposed, the news from Kerry caused a good deal of stir among the Irish of this city, and probably several thousands of able-bodied men have lost several days' work watching bulletin-boards. As if the Republic had not enemies enough, the Fenian orators and officials are speaking very disrespectfully of the Atlantic telegraph cable. As Mr. Ferguson asks, Who can expect favorable reports to come across so venal a wire? General Gleeson, however, says that he thinks he can comprehend several despatches, which to the general public seem to import disaster to the Fenian cause, and to the Fenian public seem of an extremely puzzling character. A Tribune reporter, who "enjoyed an interview" with General Gleeson on Monday, says that the Deputy Chief Executive of the Irish Republic expects that thirty-five Fenian circles which have money belonging to the Brotherhood will immediately turn it over to his committee; that then the committee will secure $50,000 which was raised to aid the revolutionists of 1848; that in addition to these sums the Brotherhood at large will raise other moneys; then, he says, the Fenian exchequer will be replenished—which we see no reason to doubt. Gen. Gleeson says further that he knows that there is fighting going on in Tipperary, for his brother, Joel Gleeson, is there. The enrolling of volunteers is begun and goes on, and we believe money begins again to be taken in. So Roberts's Senate, which has had a session or two, may decide to close the breach between the Stephens Fenians and themselves. But apparently the old enthusiasm is hard to wake, though of course wherever Irishmen are got together in considerable numbers and exposed to bands of music and to speeches, they get into a state of excitement. Several of the city newspapers are at their old disgraceful game, and the World predicts an advance on Canada in May next.

THE tranquil philosophy of the Emperor Napoleon again finds everything for the best in the best of worlds. His speech last week to the Corps Législatif admitted but one exception to the universal harmony—a single instance of Imperial fallibility. Germany had taken a great stride towards homogeneousness. France had "helped the peace" which Italy and Prussia made without dismembering Austria. Their success not only "cannot disturb France," but is a most important guaranty of the balance of power in Europe. The Great Powers will undoubtedly act in concert to protect the Sultan and to satisfy the Cretans; they will sustain the temporal power of the Pope "against demagogues." England has an intimate understanding with France on all leading questions. France herself has new rights and will use them wisely. She must keep her flag high and increase her defences, but there is no fear that the peace of the world will be disturbed. Mexico is the only marplot, in spite of the elevated idea which guided the Mexican expedition. "The happy results at first obtained were compromised by an inauspicious concurrence of circumstances," and the Emperor spontaneously determined upon the recall of his army corps. Such is an outline of Napoleon's greeting to his Parliament, whom he has kindly relieved of the necessity of making a response. What they may be able to articulate through their new machinery remains to be seen, but it is hardly likely to be a hymn of praise. He pretends to have fulfilled their wishes in regard to the liberal development of the national institutions; concerning which Thiers is reported to have said: "This is a comedy, but we shall make a reality of it."

NAPOLEON'S allusion to the Cretan difficulty is about all the light that has been shed upon it since last week, but the obscurity is far from being removed. A London despatch predicts the complete independence of the island, as the result more of Cretan spirit and endurance than of diplomatic interference. The attention of Greece has been for a moment diverted by the disastrous earthquake which shook Cephalonia, and which, as it follows closely on that which racked Algiers, betokens volcanic uneasiness in the Mediterranean basin.

THE FREEDMEN.

REPORTS from Tennessee, for the quarter ending Dec. 31, show the whole amount of money expended in that State during the quarter by benevolent societies to have been $11,866 00. The freed people themselves contributed $1,637 00 for kindred purposes. Since Oct. 1, there has been a gain of 32 schools and 2,278 scholars. The fact that 26 school-houses are now owned by the freed people is a proof of their increasing desire to get education. One school has been closed on account of the refusal of the whites to let a building for it, and one other because of demonstrations against the teacher. During the quarter, 8,362 rations were issued—being an increase of 4,073 on the preceding quarter. Included in this number, however, are 4,020 full rations, issued to a party of freed people en route for Liberia via Charleston, S. C. 144 pieces of property have been restored to former owners, and the work of restoration continues. There are no hospitals in the State, and but one dispensary, which is located at Nashville. The indications are that but few contracts will be entered into during the present year, the freedmen alleging that the Bureau is powerless to enforce the contracts it approves, and they are assured by the planters that all the agent wants is his fees. (This, however, cannot be said any longer, since the order of Gen. Howard forbidding the practice.) Complaints are constant, but chiefly from the small towns and districts, that the negroes cannot obtain of the civil courts the justice to which they are entitled. In the large cities, justice is more generally executed. But few outrages have been reported except in Robertson, Sumner, and Obion Counties, where murders and other shocking crimes against freedmen have been of common occurrence. Five persons have been arrested by the Bureau agents for being concerned in the murder of freedmen, and are held to bail to appear before the Circuit Court at Gallatin.

—On the 18th the Tennessee Senate passed the House bill conferring suffrage upon the blacks. The State has now accomplished almost everything for the civil and political equality of its citizens. Sitting upon a jury, however, is apparently regarded as a social privilege, and we believe is not yet accorded to negroes. The motives which have brought about the extraordinary progress of the Tennessee loyalists from their old prejudices to their present action are very mixed, and will afford a curious chapter for somebody's "History of Reconstruction." Except that most reforms are carried by selfish considerations, however they may have been undertaken, we should distrust more than we do the gifts in which the colored people of Tennessee rejoice.

> "TOPEKA, Thursday, Feb. 14.
> "The Senate has adopted the House joint resolution to amend the Constitution by striking out the words 'white' and 'male,' with an amendment making intelligence the basis of suffrage."

—Lieut. Stone, agent at Aiken, S. C., reports that five colored men were found guilty of capital felony by a soi-disant jury. Six jurors were sworn, two more took their seats without having been sworn; they then deliberated together and found the prisoners guilty. The sentence was deferred. Gen. Scott ordered the matter investigated, and that, if the facts should be found as above represented, the prisoners should be protected from a mob styling itself a court constituted by law.

—The interior and northern districts of South Carolina have suffered most by the exodus of the freedmen. The number of emigrants is reckoned by thousands, and it is asserted that many of them have abandoned plantations which they had bound themselves by contract to cultivate.

—In Fairfax County, Va., contracts have been easily effected by the industrious (and almost all the freedmen are so); more than formerly wish to work on shares, and nearly all can gratify this desire.

—The pillory is still an instrument of "justice" in Florida. On the 4th a negro was forced to stand in it one hour at Lake City, by order of the Columbia County Criminal Court.

—During the last quarter of 1866, 7,125 rations were issued to whites and blacks in Louisiana.

THE obituary of this week records the death, on the 17th inst., of Alexander Dallas Bache, the chief of the United States Coast Survey, a member of the National Academy of Science, and one of the leading mathematicians of the country. Mr. Bache was a lineal descendant of Benjamin Franklin, and was born in 1806. He graduated at West Point with the highest honors in 1825, and became a lieutenant of Topographical Engineers. He was in 1827 appointed a professor of mathematics in the University of Pennsylvania, and afterwards president of Girard College, and principal of the Philadelphia High School. In 1843 he became the head of the Coast Survey, and remained in that position till his death. His rare administrative ability, geniality of temperament, tact, and discretion, as well as his scientific attainments, enabled him to carry on this great national work efficiently and economically, and to maintain it free from the curse of party patronage and favoritism, during a period of over twenty years, in no one of which did it fail to be assailed with bitterness and resolution by politicians in and out of office. On the outbreak of the rebellion he was charged with very important confidential duties by the War and Navy Departments. His counsel was often taken by President Lincoln, and he was a working member of the Sanitary Commission. The requirements upon the Coast Survey were at the same time of a novel and difficult character; and when, in July, 1863, he undertook, in addition to all his other responsibilities, the duty of preparing in haste a system of defences for his native city of Philadelphia, then threatened by the advance of Lee, which ended at Gettysburg, and here found his plans constantly thwarted by the knavery of the local politicians, his strength failed him, and a disorder of the brain ensued, from which he is now happily freed by death. A noble life is thus nobly ended, for of all his old comrades who fell on the field of battle none lived and none died in more complete devotion to the service of their country.

—The interesting paper on "The Government of Sir Edmund Andros over New England in 1688 and 1689," which was read at the December meeting of the New York Historical Society by Mr. J. Romeyn Brodhead, is printed in full in the January number of the "Historical Magazine," which has just appeared. Mr. Brodhead takes a different view from most historians of the administration of Andros, of the "Revolution in New England" in 1689, and of the intrigues of Phipps and Mather, which deposed Andros and resolved New England again into its constituent colonies. In the same number there are a great variety of short papers, the most important being one on the affinities of the language of the Natchez of Louisiana with the Maya and Huasteca tongues, by Dr. D. G. Brinton, of West Chester, Pa.; and a copy from the colonial records at Annapolis, showing that John Washington, the ancestor of the American Washingtons, came to this country in 1657. The record itself is the report of the proceeding against Edward Prescott, at the complaint of Washington, for hanging a witch on his ship. Washington being detained at home by the christening of a child, Prescott was acquitted. The publication of the first series of translations of the earliest colonial records of New Amsterdam is begun here by the authority of the city of New York, beginning with a proclamation of Governor Stuyvesant, dated May 31, 1647, forbidding liquor-selling on Sunday before 2 P.M., or, if there is afternoon preaching, before 4 P.M. The proceedings of the various historical and other societies are also printed in full.

—The following are some of the most recent announcements and publications: Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. announce "The Culture demanded by Modern Life," a series of addresses and arguments on the claims of scientific education, by Professors Tyndall, Henfrey, Huxley, Paget, De Morgan, Draper, Acland, Mr. Herbert Spencer, Sir John Herschel, Sir Charles Lyell, and others, edited by Edward L. Youmans, M.D.; "A Journey to Ashango Land," by Paul B. Du Chaillu; "Military History of Gen. U. S. Grant," by Adam Badeau, colonel and aid-de-camp; "History of the Navy during the Rebellion," by Rev. Chas. B. Boynton; and "Lessons in Elementary Physiology," by Professor Huxley. Messrs. Scribner & Co. have published "Studies in English," by Professor M. Schele de Vere, and announce "Elements of Logic," by Professor Henry N. Day. Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have just issued "The Huguenot Galley-Slave" and "The Journal of Maurice de Guérin," and announce "The Journal and Letters of Eugénie de Guérin."

—Mr. Hepworth Dixon's "New America," which Messrs. Lippincott & Co. announce for publication to-day, is a very entertaining book. It differs much from previous books on this country in having no sketches of New York or Boston society, no disquisitions on the Constitution of the United States, no tirades on democracy, and no statements of expenses, dinners, fleas, and discomforts. It contains interesting sketches of life in Kansas, Colorado, and Utah. Mr. Dixon seems to have been well received by the Mormons, and Brigham Young (or, as he is called in the new "Biographie Générale," Brigham, le jeune) confided to him his secret theory on the permissibility of marriage between members of the same family. He said that he would permit the marriage of brother and sister but for "prejudices." A large part of the two volumes is given up to accounts of the Shakers, the Spiritualists, the Oneida Communists, and the other curious religious organizations that have started here. We have some fear that the prominence given to these excrescences as characteristics of the "New America" will make the matter-of-fact British public believe, with Elder Frederick of the Shakers, that "the sentiment of free love is rooted in the heart of New York."

—Earl Russell has published in collected form all the documents bearing on the case of the Alabama, assigning as a reason the many misrepresentations of the newspapers, both English and American. Whatever misrepresentation there may have been, it is certainly very convenient to have these papers collected and printed. The feelings of both parties have cooled down, and the question stands now on a different basis. No one cares now about the diplomatic victory, and it matters little whether Lord Russell shows, as he tries to do, that we were previously guilty of similar acts. Now the question of whether the British authorities had complied with the provisions of their statute law is not discussed; but it is narrowed down to what are the obligations of international law with regard to the preservation of neutrality. The decision of the case will probably turn less on the facts than on the benefits to future belligerents and neutrals arising from the judgment. Probably no one will read this book now without in some way modifying the opinions he may have previously held as to the justice or injustice of our claims.

—One of the prettiest of the convenient "Clarendon Press Series" is the "Golden Treasury of Ancient Greek Poetry," by R. S. Wright, M.A., fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. It is similar in plan to some of the collections of English poetry, and is intended to bring together the choicest passages of all the Greek poets in a form convenient to the scholarly man who occasionally amuses his leisure hours with the classics. It is also fit for school use. Its management is very convenient: it divides the poets under four heads—Epic, Lyric, Dramatic, and Alexandrian (with which last are coupled the epigrammatists)—and the literary history of each of these divisions is briefly but well written in the preface to the annotations accompanying that part. The account of lyric poetry and of the gradual transition of the metres is excellent. Each poet has his date prefixed to the extracts, and every extract is headed by a short argument to show its connection, where such is at all needed. There are, besides, about two hundred pages of annotations, mainly very good. The selections are admirably made, and include many beautiful fragments and passages—among others the "Swallow Song"—that, being scattered through such authors as Athenæus, are unfamiliar to ordinary readers.

EDUCATIONAL.

WE find a contribution to the literature of "Agricultural Colleges" in a paper by Mr. H. F. French, lately president of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, published in the new annual report of the Agricultural Bureau in Washington. Mr. French has gathered in a fragmentary form much information otherwise inaccessible in respect to institutions of this class now established in the United States, whether aided or not by the national grant. The facts are accompanied by statements which are rather suggestive than argumentative, in respect to the utility of manual labor in schools, the value of experimental farms, and the expediency of uniting agricultural colleges with other institutions. In the whole document Mr. French implies that all the schools of this kind in the country should be organized on a similar basis, instead of recommending, as the wisest educators do, that each State or region should have such an institution as is best adapted to the peculiar wants of the community there resident. Illinois needs a very different school from Rhode Island, and Ohio from Massachusetts.

Mr. French does not favor the union of agricultural with literary colleges; he recommends but one farmers' college for a State; he considers an experimental farm essential; and he advocates the requirement of manual labor on the part of the students.

This is hardly the place to discuss these views. We merely call attention to them as deserving consideration not only because of the writer's position, but because of the semi-official character which is given to them by the mode of publication.

—Let Cincinnati have the credit of publishing one of the very best local school reports which have appeared in this country outside of Massachusetts. We refer particularly to the thirty-seventh annual report, that for 1866, one of the conspicuous merits of which is a series of carefully prepared tables, showing a close study of the operation of the school system established in that thriving city. Some of the particulars given will be of value elsewhere, especially to the guardians of public education in other large towns. We present one of the more significant facts: The number of children in Cincinnati between the ages of six and sixteen years is 48,395, of whom 24,498, or a little more than one-half, were members of the public schools during some portion of the year. Not far from 17,000 children were enrolled in church and private schools, leaving more than 6,000 children who are not known to have attended any school during the year. It is estimated that two or three thousand of these may have been detained by useful occupations; but in the most favorable view, the schools fail of reaching large numbers of those for whom they are designed.

THE LIFE OF ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.*

The history of a man who, changing more than once his allegiance both to party and to country, and frequently refusing to follow the lead of the party to which he nominally belonged, yet always exerted a commanding influence in legislatures and kept an unshaken hold upon the confidence of his constituents, widening the range of his popularity with every change of his position, and never so powerful as when debarred from all official honors—such a history should be one of the most interesting of political biographies.

Such a man is Alexander H. Stephens. He commenced political life as a Whig, in a Southern State in which the Whig party was in a decided minority. Nevertheless he was elected to Congress in 1843, a year of peculiar disaster to the Whig party; and was re-elected as long as he was willing to serve, a period of fifteen years. His first election was by a vote of the entire State; his subsequent elections were from a single district. In 1853, he forsook the Whig party and joined the Democrats; and though his district did not entirely share his change of views, it never failed to give a large majority for Mr. Stephens. Even in 1860, when he supported Mr. Douglas for the Presidency, who received barely one-ninth of he vote of Georgia, there was no doubt that Mr. Stephens could have been elected to Congress as usual. So he stood out against secession until it was accomplished; and yet was the favorite candidate of his State for the highest honors which its secession could procure. When the Southern Confederacy was crushed, and he was a prisoner of state, his influence only ncreased among his people; and the Legislature of Georgia faithfully eflected the sentiments of their constituents, when they asked for his advice, listened with applause to his words, and instantly put his counsels nto the form of law.

Nor has the influence of Mr. Stephens been merely local. His opposition to the Mexican war, and to the Clayton Compromise of 1848, gave him a strong hold upon the confidence of the North, which erroneously imagined that at heart he was unfavorable to the extension of slavery. In the winter of 1849–50 he dispelled these illusions by persistently refusing to vote for so very mild an anti-slavery man as Robert C. Winthrop for Speaker; and further estranged himself from Northern sympathies by his vehement opposition to Gen. Taylor's administration. But having secured the repudiation of the Wilmot proviso, he resolutely and successfully opposed the secessionists of his own State; and, with the aid of Messrs. Cobb and Toombs, defeated the whole plan of disunion in 1850–51. In 1852, he abandoned the Whig party, upon its nominating Gen. Scott; not that he distrusted the general himself, but because the nomination was made to please the free-soil wing of the Whig party. Mr. Stephens did not, however, join the Democratic organization until 1853 or 1854, when he practically took the leadership of the House of Representatives from the incompetent hands of Richardson, of Illinois, and, by an application of the shrewdest parliamentary tactics, aided by the unscrupulous decisions of Edson B. Olds, of Ohio (fit conjunction of Southern master and Northern tool), drove the Kansas-Nebraska bill through the House, where, but for him, it might have dragged for ever.

The absorption of the Southern Whigs in the Know-Nothing organization completed the separation of Mr. Stephens from them, and confirmed his alliance with the Democratic party, of which he was ever after one of the most trusted leaders. Throughout the excited session of 1856 he was the ablest opponent of the Republican party in Congress; and as Lewis D. Campbell was the nominal, though distrusted, leader of that party, it may easily be supposed that Mr. Stephens did not appear to much disadvantage. In 1858 he undertook the responsibility of carrying the Lecompton bill through the House, and again distinguished himself by the ability with which he engineered that infamous measure, although he failed to secure its passage.

At the close of that Congress, Mr. Stephens declined to serve another term, and retired to private life. In 1860, notwithstanding their antagonism upon the Lecompton issue, he warmly supported Stephen A. Douglas for the Presidency; being sincerely desirous of maintaining the Union so long as it could be ruled by Southern influence, and knowing that the Breckinridge movement was intended to make dissolution unavoidable. He followed up this line of action by an able and vigorous opposition to secession. His speech before the legislature, in reply to one from Toombs, will be universally remembered as the ablest and most eloquent vindication of the Union ever made at the South from a pro-slavery point of view. All his eloquence was, however, neutralized by his avowed intention to abide by the decision of his State; and when Georgia voted to secede, he unhesitatingly went with her. His "devotion" to the Union was a belief that for slaveholders to destroy a slaveholding Union would be inexpedient; it was a sentiment of expediency merely, not of paramount duty.

Elected Vice-President of the "Confederate States," Mr. Stephens threw all his energy into the support of the rebellion. His subsequent dissatisfaction with the conduct of the war prevented him from taking as active a part in public affairs as would have been natural for him; he did not feel at liberty openly to oppose that which he could not approve. Since the destruction of the Confederacy, Mr. Stephens's popularity and influence at the South have been greater than ever, his foresight having been proved at least equal to his other great abilities.

This is, in brief, the story which Mr. Cleveland has to tell. It is one of which more could be made than he has made of it, for the memoir is a mere sketch introductory to the speeches which constitute the bulk of the book. The author is, of course, a Southerner, writing with Southern feelings, but he manifests a praiseworthy desire to deal fairly with the political questions involved, and a consciousness of the permanent character of the Southern defeat highly creditable to his good sense. There is no rant in the book—nothing to remind one of florid boasters like Simms, or truculent—what shall we say? There is really but one thing to say—truculent fools like Pollard. It is a modest, honest, and sensible work, which will be found extremely useful to every one interested in Southern politics. Of course there are some passages in it which excite a smile, such, for example, as the author's unaffected admiration for Judge Lumpkin, whose pompous absurdities have made the Georgia law reports amusing reading for many years. But all this gives an air of simplicity and sincerity to the book which is attractive to those who want to know what is really thought by Southern men of a Southern man; and although we hope that at some future day so excellent a subject may receive more ample treatment, we are glad that Mr. Stephens has fallen into the hands of a biographer honest if not brilliant.

GERMANY—ALGIERS—GALICIA.*

On the principle of qui s'excuse s'accuse, Mr. Brown has robbed the critic of a large part of his occupation by a preface in which he announces by defending the superficialness of this his latest book of travel. It would have been briefer and just as conclusive to have said that superficial observations are not of necessity mistaken or delusive, and that they are certainly more instructive than no observations at all. And it would have saved him the superficial interrogatory, for which perhaps our stage-players are responsible—"What would you think of a lean Falstaff or a fat Hamlet?"

It is now nearly a quarter of a century since William Howitt published his "German Experiences, addressed to the English, both stayers at home and goers abroad," drawing a most lamentable picture of German society and sounding an anxious alarm against the threatened invasion of German ideas into his beloved country. He wrote with a seriousness that was almost like temper, and was pronounced by the Germans an unscrupulous and audacious libeller. Time has shown that the dangers apprehended were unreal, and that Sir Robert Peel's rural police were not exactly trained or handled after the Continental pattern. But if Mr. Howitt exaggerated, he was too honest to invent, and too intelligent to blunder in generalizing, his experiences; he told mainly the unwelcome truth. Mr. Browne, who is merely a traveller and not a philosopher, corroborates Howitt's testimony in very essential particulars; and more than once, in a spirit evidently removed from patriotic narrowness, thanks his stars that German ways are not our ways, even on the Pacific coast. His stay was principally in Frankfort; Mr. Howitt's in Baden and Bavaria. Both denounce the vexatious regulations of police, and both are wrought up to the highest pitch over the delays and secrecy of the courts, the ex-parte character of judicial enquiries, the difficulty of obtaining protection or redress, and the barbarous nature of the punishments still in vogue. At the time Howitt wrote, wheeling was a not infrequent mode of execution, and is perhaps still allowed, even in Prussia. He charged the Germans also with employing the rack, though torture had for some years been legally abrogated. Mr. Browne has a painful chapter on the collected relics of "superstition and force" which he saw in the castle and Rathhaus of Nuremberg; and he describes, as if an eye-witness, a public beheading, accompanied by the revolting spectacle of men drinking the warm blood of the corpse as a pretended specific for certain diseases.

In their purely domestic experiences Mr. Browne and Mr. Howitt were not equally unfortunate. The latter was fleeced by his servants, fleeced by his landlord, fleeced by his tradesmen, and suffered to get wisdom by himself without the smallest hint from persons who ought to have warned him against the conspiracy of all these parties, and whom he very naturally, therefore, regarded as accomplices in the pillage. He learned, as Mr. Browne did not, "the excellent system of furnishing empty rooms in a single day—a fact generally unknown to strangers;" but that was about his only advantage. What the lodging-house "rings" left in his purse was appropriated by pickpockets and thieves on the Rhine steamers. He lost, if we remember rightly, a son or near relative through shameful neglect at a boarding-school. He found, the very reverse of Mr. Browne's experience, the school-boys rowdy terrors of the street. Finally, he was intensely annoyed in the small and especially the university towns, Heidelberg not excepted, by the Kleinstädterei that prevails in them all.

As to the social position of woman in Germany both our authors, unhappily, are again agreed, Howitt emphasizing the conjugal tyranny of the professors. Both trace much of the prevailing sexual looseness to the state restrictions upon marriage, which the poorer classes are thus debarred from contracting in proper form. Mr. Browne says:

> "There is something very peculiar, take it altogether, in the relations of the sexes in Germany. With much that is commendable in the frank and genial manners of both, there is, in my opinion, an utter absence on the part of men, whether in high or low life, of that chivalrous respect for women which prevails in the United States. There seems to be a separation of interests and pursuits, of pleasures and associations, everywhere perceptible. A barrier appears to exist between them. Somehow they are not as inseparably bound together by 'passional attraction' as in most other countries."

What our traveller says of the feelings of American Germans who return to their native land with pleasant memories that are not realized is, we believe, an entirely truthful account. The old country seems "slow," and its government intolerably oppressive. The emigrant revisits hurriedly his birthplace and kinsmen, and then departs anew and for ever.

"A Whirl through Algeria," which is bound up in this tripartite volume, is unsatisfactory, not more from the little that was seen than from the extent to which the author borrows his facts and judgments. He stayed so short a time as to discredit the naïve remark of an imperialist geographer that, since the prevailing wind of the Mediterranean is northwest, "there results the quite remarkable fact that it is easier to go to Algeria than to quit it." France has not been unmindful of this fact since 1830, notwithstanding Mr. Browne believes that "since that period the progress of the country toward civilization, under the French dominion, has been almost unexampled in the history of colonies." He may have guessed this from the concord he observed in Algiers, the happiness and contentment, "the largest liberty consistent with public order;" or he may simply have repeated the assertions of that military régime which has been contending with the civil in irreconcilable dualism under king, republic, and emperor alike—a régime marked by the most flagrant military errors, by the grossest cruelty, and by all the inconsistencies of arbitrary power; which has stimulated revolt by harassing the aborigines, opposed the settlement of the colony by Europeans, nullified every law releasing the Arabs from its clutches, and demoralized the army itself by the promotion, without service, of its own incompetent agents—a régime which professed to be the only one possible for the country, the most economical, the justest, the most heedful of the manners, religion, and character of the aborigines, and which witnessed, and probably provoked, in April, 1864, the most formidable insurrection since the capitulation of Abd-el-Kader, if not since the taking of Algiers. It is not simply undemocratic but imprudent to praise Napoleon's government of his magnificent dependency, which he has used as a retired training-ground for the army by whose grace alone the Second Empire exists.

Two excursions which Mr. Browne made from Algiers were notable: to the Trappist convent at Staouëli, the scene of the first battle in the French invasion; and to the villa of Dr. and Mme. Bodichon, at Mustapha Superior. Some of our readers will recall with pleasure the visit of this estimable couple to America not many years ago. Mme. B., as Miss Barbara Leigh Smith, had won an enviable distinction as an artist in water-colors. We have just received from her, we may mention parenthetically, two pamphlets, in one of which she considers the objections to the enfranchisement of women in England, taking for her text the petition presented to Parliament last June by her kinswoman Florence Nightingale, Miss Martineau, Miss Burdett Coutts, and nearly fifteen hundred other women of high social position or intellectual worth, "for the representation of all householders without distinction of sex." The other pamphlet is entitled "Reasons for the Enfranchisement of Women," being aggressive instead of defensive, and was read last October before the Social Science Association at Manchester. In both the argument is purposely restricted to single women and widows, and is founded on that principle of the British Constitution which connects the possession of property with the right to govern; but they are full of suggestions for the women and the men of every country.

A glance at the characteristic features of Marseilles, a suggestion of a journey through Spain to Cadiz, and a pretty graphic account of a voyage thence to Lisbon, of five days' detention in the Lazaretto, and a ramble about the dirty city, terminate the "Whirl." On turning the leaf, we are transferred to Breslau, and presently to the salt mines of Cracow, with their crystal wonders. And having emerged from this subterranean entertainment, we are prepared to say for our versatile voyager that he is a rather agreeable companion, with a Californian negligence of style and grammar and spelling of foreign words, and a humor which resembles Artemus Ward's and therefore is hardly fresh, but, having more heart, is not distasteful; with imagination enough to construct a very creditable Christmas story; and whose greatest indiscretion consists in adopting the "illustrations" as his own. The drawings are neither after life nor after the text of the author, as witness the impossible "Kellner" on page 17, "with a crop of hair that would have been an ornament to any barber's block!" presenting "a bill measuring precisely (!) three feet in length." We feel bound to say that the admission of such caricatures in a book from which otherwise much may be learned, and which is valuable only for the truth which it purports to convey, is a serious offence on the part of the publishers.

SOMETHING FOR FARMERS.*

That agriculture is a calling in which a great number of ignorant and stupid men are trying to get their living, that they are greedy for novelty and cheap, unintelligent speculation, that consequently they offer an inviting field to all manner of petty quacks, wonder-workers, and Cheap Johns of art and science, no one could be left in doubt who would take the trouble to examine the agricultural periodicals and books which have been sent to the office of The Nation during the last year. A prodigious amount of rubbish must needs be washed over before a few grains can be panned out having any real interest or value to a man of moderate education and intelligence, who has enjoyed the smallest opportunities for indulging a taste for rural pursuits.

Few men who are successful, or who deserve to be successful in life, possess the patience or can afford the time for a process of this kind. When, therefore, the reducing operation is undertaken, as in the case before us, by a competent editor, and the result is fairly presented in a hand-book at a very low price, we feel bound to express our sincere gratification. The common faults of our agricultural press are not altogether absent from its pages; there are a number, indeed, which might have been omitted, and others which might have had more rigorous editorial pruning with advantage; and we could wish that for once the publisher had depended for his profits wholly on the ostensible contents of the book, and not at all on its advertisements, either direct or indirect. Much the larger part, however, is occupied by a series of clear, concise, intelligible, and unpretending reports of the latest attainments of agricultural science, practically applied, in which the line between that which is established and which may be calculated upon, and that which is probable and may be hoped for, is remarkably well defined. The directions for practical operations, without being elemental, are specific, easily understood, and as complete as a moderately well informed farmer need require. Every writer seems to have mastered his subject, and, whatever his literary skill, at least to have an honest and respectful purpose to aid the reader to master it.

Last week the president of the New York Agricultural Society stated at Albany that the average yield per acre of six adjoining farms, in a certain locality named, was more than double the average yield per acre of all the other farms in the State, and that while the average yield of certain crops throughout the State had been steadily declining for many years, on these farms it had been as steadily increasing. He did not mention the fact, which happens to be within our knowledge, that this exceptional state of things is due, in a considerable degree, to the influence of a single man, who applied energy, enterprise, and capital to the management of a farm, with the advantage of a thorough mathematical and scientific education, and that each of these farms is managed simply with a view to profit upon ordinary staple crops and stock-raising, and not at all as a pastime.

It would add millions to the national revenue in a few years if it were generally understood that the business of agriculture, when thus undertaken with the advantages of capital and suitable education and means of information, is the safest and on the whole the most surely prosperous business that is carried on in this country, although, as things now are, no men work as hard for such miserable pay as the great mass of our agricultural population.

That it is from a general want of wisdom, information, and enterprise, and a general prevalence of stupid self-conceit and short-sighted economy among our farmers, that the average crops and the profits of agriculture are so small as they are, there is abundant evidence, and perhaps we ought not to complain that most of our agricultural publications are cautiously adapted to the average taste and requirements of the whole body of agricultural readers; but there are also among our farmers and those interested in agricultural science a considerable and a constantly increasing number of men of fair education and enlightened spirit, and although the publication of a quarterly journal of agriculture adapted to this class of readers failed at Albany some twelve or fifteen years ago, we can hardly doubt that if undertaken in the plucky spirit which has already made a fortune for the publisher of this annual a similar enterprise would now succeed. And if writers capable of preparing a class of articles like that in this annual on recent progress in the science of agriculture, and those on draining, on wheat, on sorghum, on potatoes, on sheep-feeding, and on the Rinderpest, could be made to feel that they had a worthy audience ensured them, and could be offered sufficient pecuniary inducements to draw them off from other labors for the purpose of engaging in a similar duty, quarterly or monthly, a service would be rendered the country of incalculable value.

THE NEW A B C BOOKS.

CONSIDERABLE rivalry is manifested just now among the publishers of school-books in attempts to provide the most useful and attractive primers for those who are beginning to learn to read. The revival of the book trade at the South, the necessity laid upon the present generation to impart the art of reading to a race but just enfranchised and admitted to one of the greatest of "civil rights"—the right to learn the alphabet—and, besides all this, the progress making in normal schools and elsewhere in the modes of teaching primary scholars, give zeal and vigor to a discussion, by no means new, in respect to the wisest and quickest way of acquiring that art of arts, the art of reading. There are some who ridicule this enquiry, claiming that a bright child in an educated family or a dull child in a good school will learn to read, no matter how, as naturally as the young duck will take to the water; but teachers who have had the dull and the bright in their classes, and especially those who have taught adults to read, are well enough aware that there is a great difference in the value of the methods which are employed, and of course in the first reading books which are made use of in schools. Bad habits acquired in learning the alphabet last for years; bad articulation and pronunciation can only be rooted out of a class by persistent efforts. In short, there is a philosophy which belongs to the art of reading as well as to every other art, and those who teach in accordance with it will find their scholars make the surest and most satisfactory progress. The philosophy should never indeed be intruded upon the young scholar, but should govern, nevertheless, the good instructor. As the true philosophy of education comes only from an acquaintance with the youthful mind and the adaptation of artificial helps to the natural laws of mental development and growth, none need be afraid of a really scientific method.

The pile of primers and first reading books which lie before us from the various publishing houses are most of them exceedingly attractive in their outward garb. Good paper, clear black type, and, with one or two exceptions, excellent wood-cuts, have been employed in the manufacture of these books, so that there is really no improvement to be desired in their outward garb, and any one who should select a primer by its aspect only would be at a loss to choose the best.

A closer scrutiny shows that in the preparation of these little manuals, these undeveloped polyps in the kingdom of books, there are three predominant types. There are the old-fashioned "A B C books," which suppose that the child is first to learn letters and then to learn words; there are next the "Improved Word-books," which suppose that the child is first to learn words as they appear in print, and then to learn the letters of which they are composed; and third, there are the new-fashioned "Sound-books," which are constructed upon phonic or phonetic principles, and assume that the scholars ought to begin by learning the sounds, be they many or single, which pertain severally to the letters of the alphabet.

The first of these methods is now regarded with little favor by the best teachers, few or none of whom employ it, and yet because it is the traditional mode, and because children will ask the names of the letters which they see on their blocks and on the newspapers, "the A B C way" is not likely to be wholly abandoned. By the second method, "the word method" as it is called, now the favorite mode in most good schools, children learn to read with very little drudgery, and "before they know it" are out of the primer and in the story book. The new methods, commonly known as "phonic" or "phonetic," are strongly advocated by some of the best instructors, and are likely, in spite of the opposition to the system which must be expected from routine teachers, to become adopted in one form or another in all our best schools. Two of these "sound-primers" are obviously the result of so much study and skill that they deserve attention, not only from practical teachers but also from all scholars who are interested in promoting an accurate study of the English tongue. The books we refer to are Leigh's edition of Hillard's well-known primer, published by Brewer & Tileston, and Wheeler and Soule's "First Lessons in Reading," published by Lee & Shepard. Both these New England notions involve the principle that it is an awkward and unnatural procedure to teach first the names and afterwards the powers of the letters of the alphabet; for example, to teach a child to say "aitch" for h, instead of giving an aspirate sound, or "double you" without knowing what sound w represents (and so of the other letters), is not only a loss of time and effort, but a positive obstacle to future progress. The methods employed to introduce a knowledge of the rightful sounds of letters are necessarily complicated because in our alphabet almost every character is a representative of at least two sounds, and some even stand for four or five. Both writers with great ingenuity have given simplicity to a somewhat intricate undertaking.

In a former number of THE NATION (Vol. III., p. 229) we called attention to the romantic history of Leigh's attempts to simplify the art of reading and to some of the merits of his book. The peculiarity of his system is that every sound employed in our speech is represented in style by a character appropriate to that sound alone; and the characters so employed are not outlandish or arbitrary symbols, which look as if they had strayed into English books from Greek or from Sanskrit, but they are our ordinary letters of the alphabet and certain slightly modified forms of them.

Thus, the six sounds of O, found in nor, not, hole, whole, move, and wolf, are represented by the usual character O, and by slight dashes touching the O in five different ways. So with the other letters which represent more than one sound. Now, there can be no question that if such typography were employed in all books and papers good reading would be much easier and more general than now. The characters devised by Mr. Leigh are most ingenious, differing in the slightest possible degree from the ordinary letters. We have never seen a phonetic alphabet in type so little objectionable as this because of unfamiliar looks. Yet, after all, the question arises whether the child who has learned to read in a book with this type will not feel the want of similar type in other books, and really have to learn a little later what most children learn at the outset, that most of the letters have in words more than one sound. We understand that this system is now having thorough trial in one of the best public schools in Boston, and the result of the investigation will be looked for with great interest.

The "First Lessons" of Wheeler and Soule employ a phonetic method without phonetic type. They are based upon a plan recommended, but not elaborated, by Professor J. C. Zachos, now of Meadville, Pa. Only our ordinary alphabetic characters are employed; but a few orthoepic dots and dashes are made use of, as in the old-fashioned spelling-books and definers, to indicate pronunciation. The scholar learns these gradually as he learns the letters, and has nothing to unlearn when he is further advanced.

In determining the primary question as to what are the sounds employed in the English language, the authors, who are themselves special students of pronunciation, have availed themselves of the well-known investigations of Professors Lepsius and Whitney, and they give in an appendix a full scheme of the sounds which occur in English, as analyzed and arranged by the last-named scholar in his acute and masterly discussions of the subject. (See Am. Or. Soc. Jour. viii. 1866). This scheme substantially forms the basis of the new primer, and it is presented by the "First Lessons" in so clear and natural a way that any teacher can impart it and any child acquire it. Very short lessons are proposed, and each is prepared for the teacher as well as for the pupil, hints being given in fine type for the guidance of the class, with very clear and minute directions as to the mode in which each sound may be rightly uttered. The six vowels are first taught with their long or alphabetic sounds only, then the consonants are taken up in six groups, namely: P, B, F, V; S, Z, T, D; K, C, G, J; M, N, L, R; W, Y, H, and finally X. The student of pronunciation or of phonography can see at a glance the reasons for this arrangement, and yet, strange as it may appear, we have never before seen in a primer any attempt at classification except "consonants" and "vowels." After the long sound of the vowels and one sound of each consonant is learned, the other sounds are made known to the scholar; and all the way along short words, involving the use of the knowledge already acquired, are introduced for practice. Presently the mode of forming the letters is exhibited, and short lessons in reading and spelling follow. Throughout the volume there are evidences of great care and skill in accurate and in simple statements, and in the easy, natural mode of going on from the simple to the difficult.

After a careful scrutiny of this unpretending volume, we are of opinion that it is altogether the most thorough and scientific presentation of the elements of speech to be met with in the language. Any intelligent teacher, whatever primer he prefers to use, will be rewarded by the careful study of the principles here involved. A good teacher who has mastered the volume will make better readers and more distinct speakers than can possibly be made by the ordinary methods. Poor teachers will be likely to turn away from the volume in contempt because of its unusual garb and the absence of pretty pictures, but we earnestly hope that city superintendents of schools through the land will follow the Boston example and make a fair trial of the book, and let us know the practical results. The value of a text-book can only be determined by employing it in a class. This is the test to which all the primers must come. Our conviction in advance is that teachers who are intelligent and painstaking will welcome the "First Lessons" as a decided advancement in primary instruction.

Those who wish to look into this whole subject will do well to compare with the primers we have named those of Sargent, who was one of the first to advocate the word method; Hillard, whose book is designedly adapted to the word method, the phonic method, and the old A B C method; Willson, Saunders, and Lovell, whose books begin with words of two letters, three letters, and so on, instead of with the household words (father, mother, house, etc.) which are the vocabulary of children; and the English books, "Reading without Tears," etc., etc., republished by Harpers.

Those who wish to be amused by a Greek primer constructed upon the word method, with pictorial cuts, should look up "Greek for Little Scholars," one of the "Pantagraphic" series published by the "Polytechnic Institute" of Camden, N. J.

FIRST YEARS IN EUROPE.[*]

Many men, many women, and many children, Dr. Johnson insisted, could have written "Fingal;" and so they could, perhaps, excluding certain portions which were a little above Dr. Johnson's appreciation. It is not alone for this reason, but because, very likely, many men, many women, and many children will, unless prevented, print books like this "First Years in Europe," that we feel bound to speak a word in condemnation of it. The author's impunity has given us three or four such volumes from him alone. It may be said that no child could find publishers; but apparently nothing hinders a youth from keeping a diary like this following, and in his mature years getting it printed with comments:

> "January 12, 1824; Monday. Crossed the Rhine in a boat; current strong and much ice—bridge of boats removed during winter—mills in the middle of the river, turned by the force of the current. Started from Cassel, opposite Mayence, for Frankfort, in the cabriolet of diligence—weather gloomy and cold. Arrived at half-past two at Frankfort, and lodged at the Hotel d'Angleterre; good inn. Dressed, dined, and took a domestique de place to conduct me to Mr. E. Mueller—left the letter, which Mr. A. Cogels gave me at Antwerp, my card and address. Went to the opera at six. German music good; execution of orchestra admirable. Returned at nine and to bed."

We should say that Mr. Calvert may be best described as a morbidly epexegetical person; there is nothing so easy and obvious that he cannot explain it. "For me," he says, "for me, as for so many, it is a need of my being to think for myself." Thinking for one's self is a fine thing, but thinking in a book is thinking for other people, or else it is being so impertinent as "to carry on the processes of one's education in public." As a thinker for other people, we consider Mr. Calvert not immensely successful. For example, youth is very ready to pass judgments, yet youth has very little judgment. Mr. Calvert brings his mind to bear on this truth, and the imperious need of thinking for himself is finally cause of this result:

> "Men who are to come to a rich ripeness, signalize their entrance into manhood with the uttering of crudities. Many joyous blossoms miss the happiness of fruitage; but fruit there were none without blossoms. These intellectual tadpoles will often be found wriggling vivaciously in youthful diaries."

That a man should imagine that he has been thinking, thinking for himself or for anybody else, when his mental machinery produces this sort of thing, is really matter for astonishment. There is no specific name, so far as we know, for the person whose brain habitually evolves aged truisms. A person who habitually utters them with tongue or pen is said to twaddle; and we do not feel that to say so, even though personal application of the remark should be made, is sinful severity of criticism. The evidence in support of such a charge in this case is writing of this sort by the page and the score of pages:

> "Man's business—did he but know it—is to learn, ever to learn, never to cease learning; which business the young carry on only more briskly, learning unconsciously even more than consciously. Passively or semi-passively they absorb knowledge—as growing leaves their sustenance from air—silently receiving, in periods of seeming inaction, images and impressions which are to be aliment for the opinions and convictions of later years."
> "Were one to say, For Germany, for Europe, it was a misfortune that Frederick (called the Great) inherited from his father a well-appointed army and full coffers, seeing that this inheritance tempted a capable, ambitious young king into the monstrous wrong of seizing Silesia, which seizure was the first act in a bloody drama of wars; such comment were a presumptuous censuring of Providence. And what work does the critic hereby lay on himself? Nothing less than the recasting of history! He might, in his impotent contumaciousness, carry sympathy with Brutus so far as to deplore the battle of Philippi, thus seeking to wrest from the Supreme guidance the procession of Roman events. And what will he do with them? He might go on to wish the Saracens victorious at Tours, or the action of Pontius Pilate stayed. Whoever should so misplace himself has no vocation to be an interpreter to his fellows, nor can he even draw due personal profit from the lessons recorded in the pages of the past."

There is almost nothing else in the volume. Mr. Calvert was at Göttingen when among the professors in the university were Heeren, Ottfried Müller, Eichhorn, and the famous Blumenbach; he visited Weimar and talked for half an hour with Goethe; he made the voyage to England in company with his father's friend, Mr. Stratford Canning, Kinglake's "great Elchi;" he had admittance to the best circles in the society of Edinburgh, London, and Paris, and he hardly has so much as one interesting anecdote to tell us; three pages would contain all of his reminiscences that is not vapid and pretentious and tiresome. In the three pages we should put this about Coleridge:

> "Benecke told me that Coleridge, when at Göttingen, toward the close of the last century, was an idler, and did not learn the language thoroughly, and that he got a long ode of Klopstock by heart and declaimed without understanding it, playfully mystifying his countrymen with the apparent rapidity of his progress. When the 'Opium-Eater' appeared, Benecke at once attributed it to Coleridge, from knowing, he said, that Coleridge took opium when at Göttingen."

Dr. Pusey is casually mentioned as follows:

> "Coupled with Dwight in my memory, is a distinguished English celebrity, Dr. Pusey, who accompanied him one day in a brief call at my rooms. He was a slight figure of medium height, with a thin face, exhausted by study. He worked, it was said, sixteen hours a day at German, whereby, at the end of six weeks, he had so far mastered the language as to be able, by limiting his application to the one branch, to read all German books on theology, the cream of which—so much of it as had risen in 1824–5—he collected at the book-stores and carried away, to be digested in England, where, through the marvellous transformations and eliminations wrought by the cerebral chemistry, it was, some years later, precipitated from his brain in the form of 'Oxford Tracts.'"

> "The elder Eichhorn, the redoubtable rationalist commentator, who, in his handling of Isaiah or Moses, cut sacrilegiously through the adipose deposits of tradition, was in figure inclined to rotundity; as though in the excessive sedentariness of his life—sitting fifteen or sixteen hours a day at his desk—his flesh stagnated about his bones. His face, in its expression, but not in its mould, intellectual, was sallow and fleshy, and lighted by a dark eye full of life, which contrasted well with his thick white hair, combed up and back from his not high forehead. In spite of his fifteen studious hours, and by virtue of the extreme regularity in all things of the habits of most German professors, he had good health. One day a friend finding him unwell, and asking the cause of this rare interruption to his ordinary condition, with self-reproach he replied, 'Yesterday I was fool enough to go and take a walk.' He was now past seventy, and in 1825 I witnessed the torchlight procession of the students who came under his windows to do him honor on the fiftieth anniversary of his professorship. It would not be easy to forget the kind, almost affectionate greeting this venerable scholar would rise to give me on my visits. With amiable interest he would ask about my studies, and the lectures I attended. When I told him that I heard no metaphysics—'In that you do well,' he said. 'Metaphysicians busy themselves with questions they can never solve—the essence of the mind and soul, the freedom of the will, immortality. What can we ever know about these?' Herein he betrayed the limitations of his own nature. The widest and most aspiring minds will and, by their very breadth and loftiness, must put such questions, and will have answers to them; and when they cannot discover the answers," etc., etc., etc.

MONTALEMBERT'S MONKS OF THE WEST.*

NOT being able to foresee when his malady would allow of his taking up his work again, Count Montalembert has permitted his publishers to issue by itself the third volume of "The Monks of the West." Volumes IV. and V., which with this third volume will form a series devoted to the history of the conversion of Great Britain by the monks, being less easily separable from each other, these volumes will be published together, and we are promised them after as little delay as possible.

This third volume contains a view of the condition of Great Britain before the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, an account of the monastic successors of St. Patrick in Ireland, of the life of Columba, and of the work of Augustine and his successors among the Anglo-Saxons, so that we are carried down to the death of Edwin in A.D. 633. It is a volume of very much less value and interest than either of its predecessors. The conversion of England to Christianity was indeed a very important event. It was an event whose influence on the English race cannot easily be overestimated; an event to which the Christianity of half Christendom is owing. Yet because an epoch was most critical in the movement of the world, its history is not necessarily particularly interesting. Much of the history of this time is obscure and inextricably entngled, consists only of petty details and records of undistinguished characters. The most important facts and striking episodes are already familiar to readers of English history. Montalembert gives these materials all the interest that can be afforded by easy and often picturesque narration, and by a warm and copious eloquence. It is true, however, that both narration and eloquence might well enough have been not quite so copious. But these qualities of style are far from being sufficient in a writer with such a task before him; there is needed, also, the illumination of philosophical reflection and critical analysis. These Montalembert does not exhibit; in truth, he is too good a son of the Church for either the one or the other. His fervent reverence casts its halo of eulogy upon every monastery and saint, and covers his pages with superlatives that hardly savor of the coolness of historic impartiality. The pious stories and miraculous legends which the monkish chroniclers believingly treasured up he delights to rehearse again in all their details, with an equally unquestioning faith, by way of rebuke, of course, to the scepticism of the modern world.

The most interesting part of the present volume the reader will find to be the chapters devoted to the life of Saint Columba. Columba is noticeable not only as the founder of Iona and the apostle of Christianity to the natives of Scotland, but for his strongly marked character and his adventurous career. Born of the royal family of Ireland, eligible to the throne, he early enters one of the monastic schools, which then were the only places of learning. While still a youth, he is said to see supernatural visions and work miracles. At twenty-five he commences founding monasteries. He is also a poet, one of the very earliest of the Irish bards. He has a great passion for travelling and for fine manuscripts. The last fancy gets him into a curious quarrel which proves the crisis of his life. On one of his travels he makes a clandestine copy of the fine psalter of an abbot. The abbot is indignant at what he considers a larceny, and demands back the copy on the ground that the copy is the son of the original book. The dispute is referred to the king. The king decides against Columba in a decision which passed into a proverb, "to every cow its calf, to every book its copy." Columba is now indignant, and on the king's soon after violating the sanctity of his person, as he considered it, by causing a malefactor to be put to death in his presence, he flees to his own district, excites a rebellion, and in the battle which ensues, though he does not fight in person, gains the victory for his side, it is believed, by his fasting and prayers. But the overthrow which arms could not accomplish is effected by the excommunication of the synod. By the intervention of a friend the sentence is commuted into that of becoming a missionary to pagan nations, and with deep reluctance he embarks with twelve companions in one of those large canoes of osiers, covered with ox hide, which the Celtic tribes employed in their navigation, to sail, as the author says, to those bleak and sombre islands on the west of Scotland whose grandeur is destitute of beauty and whose picturesqueness of charm. He lands in Iona, one of the smallest and most sterile, founds a monastery which afterwards becomes famous as a seminary of Christianity and a centre of learning, as men counted learning in those times. The rest of his life he passes here in charge of the monastery or in voyaging and preaching among the neighboring tribes of unconverted barbarians; by his prayers working, it was believed, all sorts of miracles, healing the sick, calming the waves, bringing punishment on the guilty, turning the bitter fruit to sweet; even by the spell of his name, whenever invoked, changing the direction of the wind. Uniting in his character tenderness and sternness, affability and imperiousness, the poet and the missionary, the patriot and the monk, the soldier and the saint, Columba is indeed a fine and striking figure, standing out in a confused epoch and in an obscure theatre, and the picture of whom is the more acceptable from the very meagre notice which is all we get in the common church histories; yet after all he seems to us neither so great nor so important a figure as to justify the devotion to him of half a volume. At this rate, St. Bernard's time will not be reached and finished short of some score or two of volumes.

In the first pages, also, the reader will find a noteworthy sketch of the traits of the English nation. A few sentences are well worth quoting:

> "At once liberal and intolerant, pious and cruel, fond of order and security as well as of movement and noise, it unites a superstitious respect for the letter of the law with the most unbounded practice of individual independence. . . . Now it measures everything by the yardstick of its profits and prejudices, now it is on fire with an idea or a disinterested passion. Eager for conquests and discoveries, it runs to the ends of the earth, then returns more attached than ever to the domestic hearth. The implacable enemy of restraint, it is the voluntary slave of tradition. . . Neither the sometimes barbarous selfishness of the islanders nor their too frequent cynical indifference to the sufferings and servitude of others should make us forget that there, more than anywhere else, man belongs to himself and governs himself. It is there that the nobleness of our race has developed all its splendor, and attained its highest level. It is there that the generous passion of independence, united with the associative spirit and the constant practice of self-government, has produced those prodigies of furious energy, of unconquerable vigor, of stubborn heroism, which have triumphed over seas and climates, time and distance, nature and tyranny, exciting the perpetual envy of all nations and the proud enthusiasm of the English. . . . .
> "It can choose and act for itself, controlling, sustaining, and inspiring its great men, instead of being decoyed, misled, or taken advantage of by them. . . In spite of a thousand inconsistencies, a thousand excesses, a thousand stains, it is of all modern races and all Christian nations the one that best preserves the three fundamental foundations of all society worthy of man—the spirit of liberty, the family spirit, and the religious spirit."

A vigorous and notable characterization of the English race, especially notable from an ardent Frenchman and Catholic! Montalembert is not only a lover of France and a lover of the Church, but is also a lover of liberty.

CONGRESSIONAL RECONSTRUCTION.

AT the end of the session, Congress has undertaken in earnest the work of reorganizing the Southern States; and both Houses have passed bills designed to break up the governments organized by the President, and to subject the rebel States to military rule while new governments are being organized upon the basis of universal suffrage. At the time of our present writing, the two Houses have failed to agree upon any precise measure; and although there is no doubt that they will agree upon something immediately, the bill will now be subject to the risk of a pocket veto. We are not without hope, however, that Mr Johnson will for once be wise enough to resist the temptation to commit this act of folly, and will either sign or openly veto the bill.

We stated last week the reasons for our approval of the main features of the bill providing military government for the South. The condition of society there is so thoroughly unsound, and the forms of law are so systematically perverted into oppression, and so unblushingly overridden when perversion is too troublesome a process, that it is a mockery to refer any loyal man to an average Southern court for justice. The existing governments of the Southern States were founded by military power, exercised in a totally unconstitutional manner by the President, who usurped to himself the whole authority of the legislature, and used powers conferred only for the purposes of war to establish institutions designed to be perpetual through times of peace. Delay has so strengthened these usurpations that they can be set aside only by a vigorous exercise of the same military power which set them up. To effect this is the purpose of the "military bill," as it is commonly called; and with this purpose we heartily sympathize. On account of their origin in executive usurpation, their total exclusion of the colored people, and their practical exclusion of all loyal white men, we are opposed to any kind of recognition of the de facto governments at the South. We believe that the wickedness of their course thus far, atrocious as it has been in Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, and elsewhere, is a mere trifle compared with what it would have been if Mr. Johnson's policy had been adopted by Congress; and we are unwilling that the work of reorganization should be in any degree entrusted to men who have shown such malignity and bigotry as the majority of Southern officials.

But we have felt anxious that it should appear not merely by speeches in Congress, but by the text of the law itself, that a measure so stringent, and in form so anti-republican, is purely transitionary in its nature, and intended to pave the way with all possible speed to a reorganization of the States upon a democratic basis. Accordingly, in our judgment, the amendment offered by Mr. Blaine in the House, and substantially adopted by the Senate, greatly improved the bill. Nor do we suppose that this amendment would have excited any opposition but for its indiscriminate admission of disloyal men to the right of suffrage. This is a point of no small difficulty, since without such an administration of the law as cannot be hoped for while Mr. Johnson remains in office, it is vain to suppose that the loyal voters of the South will have a fair chance at the polls. Their enemies are, at least, nearly as numerous, thoroughly organized, trained to political action, in possession of all the wealth of their States, and unscrupulous as to the means of victory. We believe that all these advantages will fail them in the long run, if they persist in maintaining unjust laws, and administering them as they now do. But we cannot wonder that Southern Radicals, like Messrs. Stokes and Arnell, should be unwilling to adopt any system of government which puts their necks in present peril, no matter how confident they may be that it will work beneficially for their posterity.

Mr. Eliot's bill for the reconstruction of Louisiana is much harsher in its operation upon rebels and rebel sympathizers than the amendment to the military bill, since it requires all voters to take the test-oath. This of course puts the government of the State exclusively into the hands of those who have always been loyal: three-fourths of whom are colored people. This is too severe a rule not to be highly injurious if permanently maintained; and the probability is that when once established it would be kept up too long, and finally be broken down by wholesale perjury, as in Maryland, or nullified by the rising up of a new generation able to take any oath as to their freedom from acts of disloyalty, and yet embittered by the exclusion of their parents and friends. Months ago we urged that no plan of mere exclusion would avail to deprive rebels of power, and that the remedy should be sought in the opposite direction. We are still of that opinion, which has received strong confirmation from the total failure of the exclusive system in Maryland and Kentucky, and the acknowledged certainty of its failure in Tennessee, where it has owed all its limited success to the intense zeal of Governor Brownlow.

No plan can be devised by human wisdom for the organization of States having such discordant elements as those existing at the South which will not be defective in its working. It is easy to say that a system which operates harshly upon rebels should be preferred to one which fails to do entire justice to the loyal; but it must be remembered that the whole community will be injured by the undue depression of any of its parts, and that the loyal will gain no real advantage by an unfair monopoly of political power. The best solution that occurs to us is a middle path, by which the Government should be secured to the loyal citizens for the first year or two, but afterwards left to the operation of universal suffrage. Even this restriction would not be favored by us if we believed that Mr. Johnson would use the military power to organize and thoroughly protect the Southern loyalists; for every restriction gives rise to a bitterness of feeling which breeds trouble for years after its cause is removed. But with such a President as we have, the country must be content to stumble along, as it best may, over the difficulties of its path. If Mr. Johnson will execute the law, however grudgingly, he is not likely to be impeached. If he refuses to do so, the questions of reconstruction will be speedily simplified by his removal from office.

In looking back upon the past, it is impossible not to be impressed with a deep sense of providential guidance in the various conflicts which have brought the American people to such comparative unanimity in favor of justice toward the colored race. Every difficulty thrown in the way has but increased the popular determination to establish equal rights. Six years ago, the North would have rejoiced to accept any mild restrictions upon the spread of slavery as a final settlement. Four years ago, it would have accepted peace upon the basis of gradual emancipation. Two years ago, it would have been content with emancipation and equal civil rights for the colored people without the right of suffrage. One year ago, a slight extension of the suffrage would have satisfied it. All these demands were in their turn blindly resisted in a manner that reminds us of the vision of the old prophet, who saw "an evil spirit from the Lord" go forth to deceive the wicked King of Israel into his merited ruin.

Now the nation has been brought up to the demand of absolute justice—nothing less, and nothing more. No confiscations, no oppressions are sought to be imposed by the majority of the Republicans in Congress; but on equal justice they unanimously insist. Again the short-sighted folly of the Democratic party interposes to defeat this measure, more liberal than conquered people ever knew. Again the demand rises higher, and the amendment offered by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, excluding a large class of rebels from the ballot-box, is almost certain to prevail. Here we would gladly stop. We desire nothing in the way of punishment to be imposed upon the masses of the Southern people. But it may be the Divine decree that they shall not be saved from the madness of themselves and their friends; and that they shall be placed under the yoke which they have done everything to invite.

If Mr. Johnson kills the measure of reconstruction now to be submitted to him, by depriving Congress of an opportunity to repass it over his veto, the doom of the South is written. A sterner law will soon be passed over his head, and the sullen population excluded from the privilege of self-government may thank their Northern allies, and their own obstinacy, for a result which we deprecate and which the strongest anti-slavery men never desired.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN "THE PLENARY COUNCIL."

During the recent assembly in Baltimore of the archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States, a learned and dignified body of nearly fifty prelates, the most eminent in the land, it was understood that the subject of public instruction was under discussion, and a good deal of curiosity was excited in the outside world, not speaking Latin, to know what conclusions would be reached by this august council respecting an institution so dear to the people generally as the non-parochial public school.

At last this curiosity may be gratified. The proceedings of the council, having been submitted to and approved by the Holy Father still resident in Rome, are proclaimed publicly for the guidance of the faithful, and we have taken the pains to procure an authentic copy of this remarkable document. It breathes the spirit of the Middle Ages. It is redolent of the odors of aristocracy and ecclesiasticism. Protestants who have listened hopefully to the earnest sermons of those devoted and progressive American Catholics, the Paulist Fathers, and have been led to think that Rome in America was to be an American Rome, will be disappointed as they read the edicts herein set forth; and those who have watched the emancipation of well-educated young Catholics from the political thraldom of the Church will be sorry to find no corresponding signs of progress in the action of the bishops, at least on the subject of public education. The dignitaries of the Church still dwell in the past, and the influence of their retrograde advice is likely to be felt before many months, in town meetings and school-district meetings, from Maine to California.

We have no fears for the result. Public schools, maintained "by all for all," without denominational or ecclesiastical bias, are no more likely to be abandoned by the people than the right of suffrage or the freedom of locomotion; and the part of wisdom in all ecclesiastical bodies, both Catholic and Protestant, is to recognize this fact and provide for the spread of the faith by other means than the primary day-school. But since the council has decided otherwise, we must expect for a while local opposition to public schools, until the deep-seated convictions of the American people are emphatically and finally expressed.

It is but just to the Catholic laity to say that there are many of their number who are far from accepting these views of the clergy. There is a party, growing stronger every year, of Irishmen and Germans, not to speak of others, who know the value of good schools, and who know that they have nowhere been provided for all the people by the action of the Church alone. There are towns which we can name where the public schools have swallowed up the parish schools which the Roman Catholics have endeavored to maintain as substitutes for the free school of the people, and where this retrograde advice of the bishops will have but the slightest influence. On the other hand, we must also admit that there are many Protestant Americans, in different ecclesiastical bodies, who are not yet willing to leave the primary school to the work of imparting the rudiments of knowledge, but who claim with the Catholics that it must also be the place for religious and theological culture.

Both these sets of men, Catholic and Protestant would therefore, if they could, do away with public schools and substitute church schools, to be aided, perhaps, by subventions from the state, which would bring them under its general oversight. As the latest manifestation of such tendencies, guarded and covert, and yet unmistakable, the action of the Baltimore Council demands consideration. The word "Public School" is not mentioned, we believe, in the Pastoral Letter; but the opposition to this institution is none the less significant because expressed in smooth generalities. Parochial schools are earnestly recommended because, say the bishops, "religious teaching and religious training should form part of every system of school education." This is a new phrase of the old cry, "The godless schools of America." In vain have the shrewdest observers, both Americans and foreigners, from De Tocqueville to Cobden and from De Tocqueville's time to Goldwin Smith's time, pointed out the fact that the severance of religious from secular training does not tend to irreligion, and that the best systems of parochial schools fail to reach the masses of the people. The cry is echoed still, "Reduce the school to the authority of the church." This is, in plain English, the maxim of the latest council of the Catholic Church in America.

We perfectly understand how an institution like the Church of Rome sees with reluctance the removal of one after another of the pillars on which its mighty structure rests. The changes must still go forward. It protested against the free action of the state, when the state merely meant the emperor's will; it protested against the freedom of the press, of open discussion, of popular opinion. But to all these "modern innovations" the Church has adapted itself. It still protests against the freedom of the public school. To this innovation likewise the Church must become reconciled, and all high churchmen, whether they acknowledge the Bishop of Rome as pope or not, must learn that the everlasting principles of true religion are not to suffer with the spread of light and liberty and public schools.

The council is not satisfied with protesting against the exclusion of religious training from the public school. The reverend fathers censure parents for training their children in studies not appropriate to the stations in life which the children are likely to hold. This is an indirect censure of the public high school, although the high school is not mentioned. It means simply this: Don't try to elevate your children for higher walks in life. Let them be contented in the station to which they are called. We should like to ask the reverend fathers how many of their own number were born to rank and station, and how many of them have risen from poverty to their high ecclesiastical positions. We should like to know what pope was more eminent than Hildebrand, the son of a carpenter, and how many other poor boys became successors of the Fisherman of Galilee.

The true American theory of education is to give to every child the best education that is possible with the time and means at command, and trust to the future all questions of station. We do not train our youths for places in certain classes or castes, as they do in some other countries, but we train them to be sensible and well-informed men and women. It may be very disgusting to think that the country schoolmaster of to-day may be chief-justice of the nation a few years hence, or that the boot-black of to-day will be the millionaire of a few years hence; but just such changes are all the while in progress—and we say with emphasis that it is like going back to the Middle Ages to hear American parents cautioned against giving their children so much education as to unfit them for their station in life. We acknowledge that idleness and love of display and the practice of insincerity and sham may unfit a youth for any honorable station in life, but we protest against the theory that useful knowledge, thorough and accurate, will come amiss to anybody anywhere. Lincoln, with his Shakespeare and Burns in the log-cabin of the West, was fitting himself to write the speech at Gettysburg and the second inaugural in words that will never die, and Archbishop Hughes, in the moments saved from his tasks as a florist's boy, was fitting himself to speak with authority and eloquence from the metropolitan see of New York.

The time is gone by when it is enough for any one "to read and cipher and say the catechism." Not even the freedmen will be restricted to these rudiments. With liberty for all will go the school for all.

"A PLEA FOR CULTURE."

A recent number of the "Atlantic Monthly" contained, under the above title, a strong argument from the pen of Mr. T. W. Higginson in favor of the creation, by some means or other, of an educated class amongst us, to be the guardian of the traditions and feelings and aspirations of high culture and the diffuser of an atmosphere of thought and study—a kind of barrier, too, against the growing materialism of the time, the growing tendency to estimate the value of everything in dollars and cents, and to despise or shirk all discipline of mind or body which does not promise a speedy return in hard cash. The absence of this class, and the apparent failure of the universities to hold out even any promise of it, and of society to appreciate it or call for it, furnish to most cultivated Americans a standing theme for lamentation. But an excellent illustration of the very small extent to which Congress shares in these regrets or longings has just been furnished by the action of the Senate in passing the Tariff bill with an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. on all English books printed since 1840. The publishers, we are told, not satisfied with this, are endeavoring to have the duty changed in the House to thirty cents a pound, and have got the Committee of Ways and Means to clap on ten cents a pound on all English books printed prior to 1850, and twenty-five cents a pound on all books printed since then.

Now in legislation of this kind of course the interests of the public—of the men and women and children of this country—are totally and openly disregarded. The class interested in having books made scarce and dear—if it be not an absurdity to say this of any class in a community like ours—is, as compared to the total population, of course exceedingly small. It will astonish many people to learn that the whole number of persons in the United States, male and female, engaged in paper-making, printing, type and stereotype founding, printing-press making, in making bookbinders' tools, in bookbinding and publishing, was, in 1860, 37,723. The sole reason for the existence of this class, their sole use, is to furnish the remaining thirty millions with the means of acquiring knowledge with the least possible expenditure of time and money. That the people of this country shall acquire knowledge easily is of paramount importance. Compared with the question of education all other questions of our time sink into insignificance. Except man's destiny in the world to come, we know of no theme of such tremendous moment as the cultivation of his mental powers in this. Suppose all our publishers, printers, and bookbinders in the United States swept into the sea to-morrow, we should have to deplore the loss of many most respectable and most useful citizens, but would the effect of the catastrophe on the wealth or welfare of the community at large be for a moment comparable to the evil which these gentlemen are now inflicting on their fellow-countrymen? In a few months we might get thirty thousand other book manufacturers, not perhaps as good as they, but good enough for the time being. But whatever makes it difficult or impossible for any considerable number of the people to cultivate any field of knowledge is an injury to society of which the effects are incalculable and last through generations.

It would be better for the nation, we say deliberately, to settle large pensions on every paper-maker, printer, and publisher in the country, than have ten poor men forced to deny themselves a good book or ten scholars forced to limit their purchases. And yet publishers have apparently succeeded in impressing Congress with the idea that the use of books is to maintain publishers in comfort, and that authors and readers are mere appendages or ornaments of the great bookstores, whose wants and wishes are of no importance. In fact, in all that regards the acquisition and diffusion of knowledge, the legislation of the last two Congresses has been little better than might be expected from an assemblage of Goths or Huns dealing with the fading and to them incomprehensible civilization of the fallen empire. They have made books dear in a republic to whose existence and prosperity the habit of reading and thinking is as necessary as light and air to individuals. Of their forgetfulness of the interests of science a fine example has been afforded in the tax on alcohol, which is so enormous as to have almost completely arrested in this country all researches in organic chemistry. The heavy internal taxation has raised the price of all books produced and reprinted here; the duty and high price of gold have all but put a stop to the importation of foreign books. Most of the libraries may be said to have ceased to import them, and very few are now called for except by that exceedingly small band of wealthy men who devote any attention to literature.

Nothing can be more disheartening, we had almost said barbarous, than the indifference of politicians—we do not use the word in any opprobrious sense—to the interests of authors and readers; in other words, of the class who keep civilization alive and make progress, either mental or material, possible. There are very few men in Congress—we cannot name one with confidence except Mr. Sumner—who have kept the interests of literature and science in view during the confused financial legislation of the last four or five years. We have before us a letter from a gentleman, himself an author, who has taken a good deal of interest in the copyright question. In telling us of the results of his efforts to call the attention of some of our legislators to the concern which our writers and thinkers have in all legislation affecting literary property, he says that one orator, not unknown to fame, and who, doubtless, can spout by the hour on great moral questions, cut short their conversation by saying: "I do not take any interest in the question of authorship, and I do not believe anybody can make me take an interest in it." Just such a reply as a Gothic warrior of the sixth century might have made to a Roman jurist pleading for a guard for his library in a town captured by the barbarians.

There is a class of books which can be produced, and are produced, just as well in this country as in England, and with regard to which the American author and publisher might, with some decency, ask for protection—we mean school-books, novels, epic and lyrical poetry, tragedies, sonnets, and books of travel. In these particular fields of literature the reading public does not suffer very much from heavy import duties. Any portion of this class of works which is at all valuable American publishers are likely to reprint, or would reprint if the internal revenue system were reformed. Those which they would not reprint society here would not suffer seriously from never seeing. But there is a large class of books, historical, scientific, legal, politico-economical, and metaphysical, of which the English press is very prolific, either original or translated in London from the French or German, for which there is in America no popular demand, and which therefore publishers do not reprint, and for which no substitute is provided here. It is the product of the higher cultivation of the Old World, and of which it is not only our interest but our duty to avail ourselves, if we mean to maintain our place or win a higher one in civilization. This class of books is mainly sought for by scholars and students, whose means are generally limited, and to the wealthiest of whom an addition of forty or fifty per cent. in the price of books is a serious matter. The tax gain to the Government from even a light duty on books of this kind would be too small to be worth counting; the gain from such a duty as is now proposed would be absolutely nothing, for the tax is all but prohibitory. The publishers will not profit by it, for, as we have said, they would not reprint these books, and native authors can hardly produce any books to compete with them, if the word compete can ever be applied in a commercial sense to the efforts made by men of thought and learning to swell the sum of human knowledge.

It cannot be too well understood or too often repeated, however, that the progress of a nation is not kept up simply by the general diffusion of a small degree of education, such as men get in district schools or "pick up" in the spare moments of a busy life. We might all know how to read, write, and cipher, and might all possess a passable acquaintance with what is called "polite literature," and have a high respect for knowledge, and yet settle down for ages in a state in no respect superior to that of the Chinese. The movement of the world towards purer manners and nobler laws; towards larger liberty, deeper insight; its growth in faith and hope, and in moral and material power, is due to the labors of a comparatively small number of thinkers. Nearly all great advances in civilization are brought about by the labors of men of high culture and deep thought. They conceive what others execute; and it is the duty and interest of every nation, even of those who conceive material comfort to be the highest good, to make, by all available means, the labors of its men of science easy and, if possible, pleasant. So far from discouraging them here, there is no country in the world in which they need to be more cherished and encouraged. We could name half a dozen men of letters and of science in this country who are of more value to the nation than double the whole number of booksellers and printers which it now contains, to whose door it would "pay" for the Government to deliver gratis every work of importance that appears in any part of the world. To make it difficult for such men to become acquainted with the result of the labors of their confrères in other countries, is to attack civilization itself. Those who suppose, as some Congressmen seem to do, that the newspaper is the only kind of literature that America needs, and that the "reportorial corps," as it calls itself, can supply all the facts that American students need to know, differ less than they imagine from the caliph who burnt the Alexandrian Library on the theory of the all-sufficiency of the Koran.

THE SOCIAL EVIL AND ITS REMEDY.

In response to a resolution offered in the Assembly, "that the Board of Metropolitan Health Commissioners and the Metropolitan Board of Police be requested to communicate to the House, at their earliest convenience, their opinion as to the necessity and probable result of legislation looking to the more thorough restriction of prostitution in the city of New York," the Sanitary Committee, which is composed of three honest, able, and experienced physicians, have reported in favor of such legislation as is resorted to in the great cities of continental Europe, where they say it has been found necessary for the control of those by whom the evil is encouraged and sustained. The report is sensible and temperate. It deals in no extravagances, preaches no high moralities, leaves sentiment to those whose duty is to deepen and purify it, and very properly confines its attention to the measures by which society, acting through laws and public officials, may restrain the evil within certain well-defined limits, may keep it under police and medical inspection, and may diminish to some extent its disastrous effects on the health and, indirectly, on the order and peace of the community. The committee justly regard the evil as a fact, whose permanent removal or even essential reduction is not in question, the causes of which lie in voracious and permanent appetites which do not materially change in their character or their vehemence, and which will, under one form or another, have their way. It does not appear that the magnitude of the evil varies much in different years, though it certainly varies in different climates and in different communities. It would not be difficult, probably, to determine the conditions of its increase or decrease at any particular time or place. Its existence is at least as old as civilization, and, so far as we can see, will be as long-lived as civilization under its actual forms. It is to be reckoned among the fixed causes of mischief in society, and it is as such that it is to be dealt with.

All attempts at the sudden eradication of such an evil must, therefore, be fruitless. Its causes cannot be reached by any agencies at our command. Nothing less than the moral regeneration of individual men and women will go deep enough to touch its roots. And the moral regeneration of men and women is a thing to be prayed for, hoped for, labored for; but it is not a thing to be assumed or reckoned on for immediate effect. Ages hence, centuries on centuries hence, when knowledge, refinement, culture, religion shall have produced an amount of respect for personal character, for the laws of health and happiness, for the mutual rights and dignities of persons, for standards of purity undreamed of now, the roots of this hideous vice may die from lack of nourishment. At present little or nothing is doing to effect such a result.

The attempt to suppress the evil would be as fruitless as the efforts to extirpate it. Were all the officinas of lust closed to-morrow, the houses of assignation and prostitution, the dance-houses and concert-saloons, the "bar-houses" and "parlor-houses," lust would still burn, the purveyors of lust would still find means for plying their infamous trade, still the victims of lust would die and spread pollution all around them. There is reason for thinking that, as things are, many of these resorts escape the vigilance of the police. Superintendent Kennedy gives the whole number of public prostitutes in New York as 2,574; the number of houses and saloons as 697. But another authority, more familiar it may be presumed with the facts, because concerned professionally with the interests of the traffic, gives the number of houses as 773, at the least. The number of inmates of "parlor-houses" and "bar-houses" alone he estimates at 4,600; the "street-walkers" are set down at 6,000; and the total of criminal women at not less than 12,000. It is difficult to understand how such an immense discrepancy in statistics could exist between recognized authorities, and we are inclined to believe that the latter statement is perhaps exaggerated and the former incomplete. Still, making all possible allowance for exaggeration on the one side and for incompleteness on the other, we are constrained to think that the evil succeeds already in eluding to some extent the scrutiny of the police. The extent to which it might elude it, therefore, is quite incalculable. There is great reason for supposing that it would flourish in spite of the most strenuous efforts at suppression, retiring into deeper and deeper shadow as it was pursued, and becoming more virulent and deadly the more secret it became.

Seeing, then, that the evil can neither be eradicated nor suppressed, but one course remains to be pursued, and that is the course recommended by the Sanitary Committee, namely, to accept the mischief as a fact, to recognize its existence by the authorities, to place it under official inspection and regulation, with a view to the utmost possible diminution of its deadly effects. By this means some beneficial results may be attained. The physical disease engendered will be greatly reduced in amount and in violence. The class of bad women will comprise none but those who will consent to be registered as such; the pavement will be cleared of the "street-walkers;" the eyes of decent people will be spared the disgusting and demoralizing sight of depravity in its most degrading aspect, and we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that the sin, while covered up and driven to its haunts, is under such treatment as it is in a condition to receive at the hands of the ministers of the public order and the public health. We have not before us the data requisite to show the extent to which these desirable results have attended the experience of Continental cities, but they must ensue from the very nature of things, in some degree. Owners of houses would be more regardful of the character of their tenants, and would take more pains than they do to prevent their being sublet for infamous purposes. The police would be enabled to close many houses that are made the primary schools of vice, and in that way would have it in their power to stop some portion of the evil in its early stages. Registration would in some measure check resort to the houses on the part of those who might dread even the notion of publicity; and the kind of legitimacy that would be affixed to the vice might possibly, by making it less attractive to the imagination, make it less universal in practice.

The objections to this method of dealing with the evil in question are, to our minds, rather specious than powerful. They seem to be based on the idea that an evil which legislation takes cognizance of is to that extent withdrawn from moral rebuke and protected from moral assault. To reason against such an impression as that would be idle, for there is no reason in it to combat. Society, through legislation, merely protects itself against a mischief, which is all it can do or has a right to do in its organized capacity; it does not pretend to assail a sin. That duty devolves on the sociologists, the moralists, the preachers, and other guardians of the public ethics; and it is a duty from which they are in no manner or degree absolved. On the contrary, they are enabled to fulfil it with a more encouraging hope of success, for they undertake it with a better knowledge of its proportions, a more complete acquaintance with its conditions, and with the intelligent co-operation of the ministers of justice. To acknowledge a vice is not to applaud it. To circumscribe a mischief is not to approve of it. To allow the practice of an abomination within certain fixed limits is not to sanction it. The allowance within the limits is a prohibition beyond them, and that prohibition fastens reproach on the evil that is so confined.

A more singular objection has been raised against the regulation of the social vice by law, on the ground that it interferes with the operation of those natural laws by which divine Providence inflicts punishment on physical and social transgression! God, it is said, has decreed terrible penalties for this peculiar iniquity; sickness and disease, rotting of the bones, prostration of the nervous system, imbecility of mind, idiocy, beastliness, the loss of reputation, domestic misery, social degradation, the ruin of all that makes manhood and womanhood, the degeneracy and decay of offspring, the transmission of the frightful curse of tainted blood to the third and fourth generation; by legalizing the vice, you make it safe to practise it; and by making it safe to practise it, you thwart the divine intention, elude the divine justice, and release mankind from that salutary terror and that saving doom which are the conditions of their progress towards virtue; it would be wiser to stand aside and let God's vengeance have full play on the miserable offenders; instead of shielding them, we should thrust them out into the full tempest of wrath; instead of sending physicians to guard them from disease and to arrest the contagion they engender, we should pray that every horrible consequence of their sin might be tenfold more horrible than it is; we should rejoice in their destruction, and wish it could be so swift and sure that it would come upon them in a moment and smite them dead.

But, if the destruction is not so swift or horrible, if the consequences are not so instant and appalling, if the divine laws do not execute them selves by such summary vengeance, what then? Society must be protected against disease and disorder, and if "natural laws" will not protect it, it must protect itself by resorting to human laws. And the "natural laws' do not protect it. Long before government thought of restraining the social vice, long before legislation took cognizance of it, long before it occurred to anybody to have an oversight of it, or to inspect the traffic in it, these "natural laws" were in full force. They were enacted when the organization of man was built; they were published when that organization began to perform its functions; they were executed at the first time of its violation. Still, the crime we speak of had a beginning. Beauty was blighted, strength decayed, happiness ruined, life wasted, virtue spoiled; still the sin went on. Communities were menaced with devastation, still the iniquity prevailed. Human law did not prevent or anticipate natural law; it came after it; it stepped in because natural law was insufficient, and there was necessity for supplementing its force. The bare fact is that God does not visit the sin with swift and sudden vengeance. If he did, we might leave the matter to him. His mills grind slowly. The penalties he inflicts are indirect, far-off, uncertain; too subtle, often, to be felt by any but the finely organized and sensitive. They work underground or overhead; they leap intervals. The ignorant know nothing about them; the instructed hit on expedients for evading them the reckless defy them. Terrible as they are, and sure as they are, ultimately, to fall, the consciences of passionate men are not touched by them. The terror of them is seen when we look back; but appetite looks forward.

To most men it is human law that makes divine law palpable; and reasonably enough, too, for man is a part of Providence; his action is a part of the action of Providence. The natural laws are not in full operation till man comes in with his intelligent determination and will, and applies such directing and restraining power as he possesses to the regulation of his private and social life. To strike the human element out of the elements that control human existence would make existence inhuman, and condemn men and women to the animal economies of the beasts. Legislation does what it can to interpret the natural laws, and government does what it can to execute them. We are very sure, for our part, that if men did not interfere to regulate vices like intemperance and licentiousness, other laws than those ordinarily called the "laws of God" would begin to play uncontrolled, and the communities of mankind would rapidly degenerate into bestiality. If we must let prostitution work out its own doom, we must let drunkenness do the same. We must not arrest, prosecute, or punish any offenders; we must give evil of every sort its full swing, in hope that having sufficient rope it will hang itself, as no doubt it will—but society will find its neck caught tight in the same noose. It may be that legislation should do no more than is necessary for the protection of the community from danger, but less than that we do not see how it can do. For the rest we must look to intelligence, affection, conscience, and all the other elements of moral power stimulated to their highest action. It may be very humiliating to reflect that at this epoch of the world a civilized and Christian people can do no more than legalize, inspect, and register a sin like this, throw a few disinfectants upon it and provide against its outrageousness; but to blink facts is no way to escape the humiliation; the only remedy for that is virtue. The awful consequences of this kind of sin have made it necessary to put it under the ban of law. That may not be much, but it is something. The time will yet come when we shall so revolt against it as to put it effectually under the ban of the moral judgment.

SOMETHING ABOUT NEW BUILDINGS IN NEW YORK.

III.

THE new white marble building in Wall Street, at the corner of Hanover Street, occupied in part by the firm of Brown, Brothers & Co. and in part by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, is, on many accounts, very well worthy of study and, in some respects, well worthy of admiration. It is exceedingly well built; not solid and massive only; such desperate failures as the Stock Exchange building may be built with large stones and thick walls and immense iron girders; moreover, nothing seems solid and massive which is anywhere near the ponderous Custom House. It is well built, because the materials are used in an intelligent and organized way, and with good decorative effect. It is especially interesting as being a partial answer to the question, How to decorate modern fire-proof construction. It will be very possible to answer this question more satisfactorily, and to improve upon the interior fittings and ornament of this, which we will call after the occupants of its principal apartment, Brown Brothers' Building. But it is good enough to be improved upon, and suggests all sorts of possible improvements, and on these accounts is above the average, and immeasurably superior to the buildings we have considered before, which suggest nothing but the necessity of avoiding for the future the whole system of building and all the elements of decoration which have made them so bad.

To consider Brown Brothers' Building in detail—the exterior is quiet and elegant as compared with the exteriors of business buildings in New York or anywhere else. It is built of white marble, and the abomination of cast-iron used in imitation of other materials has been entirely avoided. Two polished red granite shafts, supporting a pediment, and forming with it a projecting porch over the entrance door, give to the exterior not indeed color enough, but enough to help it very much. The porch, of which these columns form part, in strange contrast to the two cast-iron porches which we have described before, is light and graceful, generally well composed, and helps the design of the exterior. The type of building chosen is a stately and effective one: the numerous objections to its adoption in this case do not make it less good in itself. The excellent material is freely used and trusted in long lintels, which are safe to last for ever when made of this hard marble. The two large windows close to the entrance door, one on each side, are very ingeniously managed; indeed, the successful introduction of them amounts to a positive merit, and argues flexible-mindedness on the part of the designer. It is noticeable how small have been the original advantages of location, frontage, and the like in this case compared with either of the two buildings we have discussed before. The Herald Building occupies a delightful lot, irregular and yet admirably adapted to the erection of a symmetrical and stately building, and is in perhaps the very best place in New York to show it off. The Stock Exchange monstrosity fronts on one of the widest streets in the city; the narrow entrance front in Wall Street is well placed to be seen; the oddly-shaped lot would have been a real delight to any architect who might feel a spark of enjoyment in his work, and to any such designer the chance for an entrance tower on Wall Street, for some strange and lofty thought in marble unlike anything that had been embodied before, would have been an opportunity to have heartily welcomed and diligently improved. But in these two buildings there is visible no improving of opportunities; a scorn of them rather. What is noticeable in both is the rejection of ideas and of originality. But Brown Brothers' Building has had rather a poor chance. It is so far down the hill of Wall Street that most observers see it from a point much higher than the base of the building. Its principal front has no good chance to be seen, and the longer Hanover Street side has almost none. Instead of being much the largest building in the neighborhood, the immense mass and weight of the Custom House reduce it to insignificance of size and of apparent solidity; as they would reduce any other building in the city, except perhaps the Distributing Reservoir, if that exaggerated dam be a building. But the architect of Brown Brothers' has done well under the circumstances, and his building is "an ornament to the city," and better than a vacant lot, which would not be true of many of its neighbors.

And yet, with all these merits, the outside of this building is not good architecture, and its failure to be so is a curious proof of the difficulty of the task assigned to the thoughtful architect nowadays, a difficulty which becomes impossibility unless he relies very confidently and frankly upon his own thought, and develops his building from à priori elements and from out of his consciousness of right. We have said that the type chosen for this building is a good one in itself. It is so, and a building founded on that type and as carefully designed as this one cannot fail to be noticeable and of a certain value. But the actual uses of the building are wholly inconsistent with the exterior design, and with any exterior design founded upon this general idea. It is that of the noble Renaissance palaces of the North Italian mainland cities, especially of Verona, of which class of buildings 1550 is the central time and Michael Sanmichele the greatest master. It consists of a heavy basement story with great entrance doors, but few and small openings beside these, an order of pilasters resting upon this, with the principal windows between them, and the crowning cornice, calculated for the height of the whole building, resting upon the pilasters. It is curious that this design, so common on the mainland, is almost unknown in Venice, where Sanmichele was constantly employed. But it seems to have grown out of different conditions from those of Venice, whose water streets were undisturbed by tumult and civic broil. But at all events it grew out of very different conditions from those of New York. It presupposes an interior arrangement which is usual in Italian palaces, the entrance floor occupied by unimportant rooms, and all the principal apartments up stairs. But it adapts itself badly to a plan which has its best rooms behind the architectural basement. In the case before us the architect has done his best, and has had reasonable success in getting the large windows he needed while still keeping the basement rather solid-looking and certainly simple. Complete success was not, from the nature of the case, possible. Moreover, several stories of windows within one order of pilasters is always a solecism. It can be endured when the design is very beautiful, and especially when there are but two stories of windows; but it is irrational always; it suggests, as Viollet-le-Duc has said in his Entretiens, that dwarfs are using what giants built. It seems to have grown up like the Papal Custom House at Rome, built in between the columns of the temple of Antoninus Pius.

To make a building interesting and alive which is so founded upon models as this is, would require an amount of artistic feeling and foresight very rare among our professional designers. And this design fails, as it might have been expected to. But some errors are apparent which might have been avoided. The rusticated basement needs to project further; as it is, it is only flush with the face of the pilasters in the piano nobile above, and the bases of those pilasters overhang it, making the angle-seen profile very awkward. This profile seems not to have received thought, for it is generally without character; it is here that the cornice shows to the worst advantage, having projection enough, perhaps, but not projection of mass enough, being much too concave and light. The window balconies on the Wall Street front seem to us much too heavy and too boldly projecting for a building of the kind, and cut the lines of the pilasters too vigorously. The columns dividing the windows of the ground story are badly managed; their presence, moreover, detracts very much from the simplicity which should be the principal characteristic of the architectural basement. Then, as no building is good architecture without refined and effective architectural sculpture, so this is seriously injured by the very badly designed capitals of the large pilasters. They seem to be emblematic of commerce, as their principal ornament is a caduceus, the wings much enlarged and reaching the corners of the abaci. They are not successful as decorative features, and certainly not beautiful in themselves as independent designs.

We say again that while a more nearly successful result than this is possible, even when the design is unfortunate in its borrowed principal thought, it is yet very rare that even such merit will come of it as there is here. A much franker trust of common sense, a much more ample and hearty confession of the needs of the building, are necessary, that good architecture may be possible. Architecture has hardly an existence without carved ornament; and yet it would be better for the future of architecture if no decoration were allowed for a quarter century, provided that it were required that all buildings should be enduring, and all frankly built to serve and express their purposes in the best possible way. A distant imitation of the Parthenon used for the Sub-Treasury is not a different but only a worse solecism than a Renaissance palace used for an "office building."

The interior of this edifice of Brown Brothers is better than the outside, because more rational and logical; because, as there was no type to imitate, the builder could only reason out the best way to build and then to decorate. The marble wainscot and foot-pieces in the hall and rooms, the ornamental flooring of narrow plank of two colors arranged in patterns, the excellent iron columns in the second story, where their construction is shown of four pieces bolted together, the very sensible staircase, which only needs more delicacy of parts to be very handsome and is already the best staircase down town after that of the City Hall, the generally good and always suitable and proper decorative painting—all are very uncommon virtues in New York. The more to be regretted are two or three bad faults; as, the casing of the columns of the first story with cast-iron fluted jackets, the injury done to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's rooms by the great pier containing a ventilator or some such "modern improvement," and, worst of all, the very ugly cast-iron door and window casings. Why a metal door frame should be cast in imitation of a wooden one made by a house carpenter is not easily seen. The presence of those in this building is an exceedingly great injury to its interior completeness.

A WORKING WOMAN'S STATEMENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

There are many essays and speeches on the condition of women; but there are few which touch the case of the working women, and as one of that class I should like to present a statement concerning them, before the great court of the people in general, only premising that it is drawn from experience and that it shall be as concise as possible.

As I have seen them, women move in two worlds. The one is a world of love, of a sweet and guarded domesticity, of drawing-rooms and boudoirs, f dainty coquetries, of quiet graces, where they flourish like fair flowers in a south window; and in this world men, as a rule, exhibit the chivalry, devotion, and generosity so much insisted upon in magazine essays. The other is a world into which thousands of women enter each year, mark you, dear conservative reader, not because they choose, but because they are pushed into it by a dilemma, on whose horns are written, Work or starve. It is a world of mud, carts, ledgers, packing-boxes, counting-houses, paste, oils, leather, iron, boards, committees, big boots, and men who have left any surplus generosity and chivalry at home, and who meet women on a cool, business level of dollars and cents. Here a woman, an average untrained woman I mean, is at a disadvantage, even before she opens her mouth to speak. The man who talks money is grim and concentrated, and holds his faculties well in hand; trained to the process by that expectation born with almost every man of making his own way, and standing or falling for himself. The woman's undisciplined thoughts flutter from the talk to her glove, her gaiter, her handkerchief, heroic abstractions, the man's moustache, the disorderly papers on his desk, the people at home, what is in the street. They talk, and she stumbles over technicalities which must be explained to her, very likely by the man with whom she is negotiating—her natural enemy on that particular occasion; they talk, she all the time profoundly ignorant of practice and precedent in similar cases. How are they to bargain, this well-balanced man, understanding himself and his craft, and this vague, timid woman, who knows nothing of the letter or the spirit of business, and who will need years of self-discipline and repression to achieve adequate notions of the "dollar-power," of the value of the "point" in a discussion? In Arcadia, or in the conservative essays, this ignorance and mental flaccidity would be so much on the credit side of her account—a positive advantage, overbalancing the trained acuteness of the man; but in the practical world in which the lot of the working woman is cast there is an almost universal and irresistible human tendency to make a shrewd bargain where a shrewd bargain is to be made. The weak are apt to be pushed to the wall, the timid to be bullied, the ignorant to be cheated, and where working women are concerned they are not made exceptions to the rule. The bullying and cheating is done in a coarse and violent manner to very poor and distressed working women by the lower orders of men; and to the upper grades of working women with courtesy and civility by men who, I think, mean to be fair, but for whom Mammon and the opportunity is too strong; and I do not think we should be very angry when we share the common lot, only more anxious and more thoroughly determined to get the better in some way of ignorance, weakness, and timidity; for the honorable and true-hearted gentleman is never blind to the quiet appeal of helplessness, and rates himself last when he reckons "pros" and "cons"—only up to the present age of the world such have not succeeded in getting to be the majority. That women should take the world as they find it and not expect special grace in virtue of their sex, is, of course, true. If a woman walks in the ways of commerce in the satin slippers that she wears in the drawing-room, she will bring home torn and bleeding feet, and it will be idle to complain of the roughness of the way. She should be prepared for that.

Is she so prepared? Certainly not by anything in the present system of education, which looks only to a marriage in which her thinking and planning will be done for her. One of the most painful facts and insurmountable difficulties attending female labor is that few women are thoroughly instructed in any occupation. The woman born in great poverty usually snatches at the branch of a trade that can be acquired in the shortest possible time, learns just enough to add a little to the family income, and is fixed in her groove for life. The woman thrust out of a woman's usual life to shift for herself looks about her, scared and bewildered, and grasps at the first smattering by which she can earn any money. There are so few departments of labor opened to women that in those departments the supply of female labor is frightfully in advance of the demand; and these facts—of ignorance, an overstocked market, and constitutional timidity—being attentively considered by a business world which is not quixotic, the business world, in consideration of the great fundamental principle, "get as much as you can," offers the lowest imaginable wages to the eager applicants, certain that it will be ravenously clutched; and, indeed, to see the mob of women that block and choke these few and narrow gates that are opened to them—the struggle, the press, the agony, the trembling eagerness there displayed—you might suppose that they entered on the temples of fame and wealth, or at least on some cosy little cottage in which a competence awaited the winner. Nothing of the sort! These are blind-alleys, one and all. The getting in and the keeping in are the meagre objects of this terrible struggle. A woman who has not genius, or is not a rare, exceptional case, has no promotion, no opening, no career. She does not make her way. She turns hopelessly about and about on a pivot. At every turn the sand gives way. At every turn she sinks lower. At every turn light and air are more difficult to get. She turns, you see, and digs her own grave. If you say these are figures of speech, here are figures of fact. There are thirty thousand women in New York alone whose labor averages from twelve to fifteen hours a day, and whose income—it sounds incredible, but I believe that I only record a fact when I say that the income of these women seldom exceeds thirty-three cents a day. Operators on sewing-machines, of course, are not included in this last statement. They enjoy comparative opulence. They earn, I believe, from five to eight dollars a week, though this sunshiny fact is rather darkened by an onerous tax of three or four dollars for a bed in a wretched room, often with several other occupants, and without a window, and for board as wretched as the room and the locality in which such rooms are to be found. There are also thousands of ladies of good family and education who act as teachers, governesses, etc., and receive from two hundred to six hundred dollars a year. Few women ever get beyond that. A large proportion of these women are mothers with several children. Of the rest there are few who have not parents or brothers and sisters depending on their earnings.

Masculine reader, can you imagine life for yourself and your children on thirty-three cents a day, and no prospect of anything better; or supposing that you have education, refinement, traditions of gentility, and two or three children, or an ailing wife, or a helpless mother, or little brothers and sisters, would you like to try it on four hundred, or at the best six hundred a year, if you were quite certain that, work and struggle and grow mentally as you might, you would be as fast in that salary as Lot's wife in the pillar of salt? You may answer that it costs a woman less to live, as is often said; but where does it cost her less? Nobody charges a woman less rent than a man, but they do affix more stringent conditions to the renting of rooms and leasing of houses in such cases. The woman will pay as much for her coal, groceries, and meats as you; if she is much pinched, she will pay more in proportion, for she will buy on credit or in very small quantities. She must pay as much for her children's shoes and clothes; just as much for her car fare, ferry ticket, and stationery. Nobody makes a discount because of sex, except in paying wages—there, I frankly admit, it is remembered that we are women—and when the labor, responsibility, and ability exerted are equal, women are paid one-half or two-thirds of the wages received by men in the same department.

Over this labor broods that sense of eternity that maddened De Quincey's dreams; the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever! There is no brightening future. The woman who is fevered and hurried and aching, and who works from daylight till midnight, loathing her mean room, her meaner dress, her bread and black tea, her joyless life, will, in ten years, neither better herself nor make the future clearer for her children. The lady in birth and feeling, trying to hold her children above the grime of the streets, resisting for them and herself the squalid agencies surrounding her, and experimenting in that difficult art of making three dollars out of one, is simply on the treadmill of a life-long series of such resistance and experimenting, for working women have no share in that American privilege which sets in full view of the poorest white male laborer a growing income, a bank account, the possibilities of an Astor, and every office within the gift of the Republic if he have the brain and the courage to win them. There are, in fact, all grades of working women, very much like the traditional boat's crew who, in nautical stories, upset their boat and cling to the side, in tempting neighborhood to very large and sagacious sharks, with this difference, once out of the boat, the undevoured and successful women never get back. Henceforth, it is the object of their lives to hold their heads above water and keep the sharks at bay.

It seems to me that these few prominent facts, which I have tried to set forth fairly, embody some injustice, much folly, and a serious defect in the present system of female education. I do not assume to know or to suggest a remedy. I only add the record of my experience as a possible atom of force to that lever which shall one day topple the rock out of our road. C.

A NATIONAL MILITIA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

As you have introduced this vexed subject in the columns of The Nation, perhaps you will allow me to discuss it as briefly as I can consistently with its importance.

I assume that we need an organized force ready at all times and adequate to repel invasion, suppress insurrections, and enforce the laws. A retrospect of our past disasters and dangers, a survey of our present internal and external relations, a consideration of our daily increasing importance in the family of nations, from whom we are no longer isolated, geographically or politically, will, I think, justify this assumption:

That we need this force not only as a defence in, but as the best insurance against, war.

In considering what this force should be, we must have reference to efficiency, economy, and also to the nature of our institutions.

Economy and efficiency recommend a standing army; the law of division of labor assigns each man his specialty, thus developing the extremest skill and securing the utmost product.

Economical considerations would induce us to make civil offices tenable for life, to save the country from the costly experiments of a rotation of new legislators and administrators of government.

Economy is a virtue too little practised here in public or private—publicly rather impracticable under our form of government; we may be frugal, having no brilliant court, no costly palaces, no great army of retainers and pensioners to support, but apprentice legislators and administrators are not likely to save our money or lay it out wisely.

Constant practice and devotion to the military art must render a standing army more efficient than a possible militia, as a life-long tenure would civil officers; but efficiency is not a characteristic of a republican government.

Economy and efficiency would be virtues of a wise despotism, where the unconsulted many should yield prompt obedience to the decrees of the instructed, experienced, reflecting few, pursuing a steady policy based on the lessons of the past and foresight of the future, rather than the clamorous importunities of the present.

But despotisms, however wise, tend to make lifeless automata of their subjects, while, if unwise (and history warns us that they are apt to be, that the possession of absolute power dulls the head and the heart), they not only cramp the growth and arrest the progress of the people, but inflict great misery upon them.

A philosopher says "that the object towards which every human being must ceaselessly direct his efforts is the individuality of power and development; that for this there are two requisites, freedom and a variety of situations;" "that human nature is not a machine to be built after a model and set to do exactly the work prescribed for it; but a tree, which requires to grow and develop itself on all sides according to the tendency of the inward forces which make it a living thing."

We prefer that every citizen should have a chance in the administration of affairs even though the work should not be so well or so cheaply done, "as a means to their own mental elevation—a mode of strengthening their active faculties, exercising their judgment, and giving them a familiar knowledge of the subjects with which they are thus left to deal." Now, John Adams tells us that the four subjects with which all citizens are here left to deal are, the churches, the schools, the towns, and the militia; that these are the four institutions upon which our republican liberty is founded, by a faithful devotion to which that liberty is ensured.

The jealousy of a standing army inherited from our fatherland, where this day the Queen has but a year's lease of their service, and its obvious incongruity with our theory of self-government, impel us to reject this force, and to adopt militia as obviously in harmony with that theory.

We must keep an army to preserve our fortifications, garrison our frontier posts, and skirmish with Indians; but we shall be more likely to reduce it to an inadequate number than to increase it to a number excessive for these requirements. Our chief reliance against traitors within or foes without must be a militia, and their organization must commend itself by its efficiency, economy, and the reasonableness of its demands upon the patriotism of the citizens.

To create an efficient army on democratic principles is certainly a difficult and, except in Switzerland, a sort of half republic, an unaccomplished task; but it is for us inevitable.

An army is naturally an aristocracy, service in every form is distasteful to our people, and military service, in peace, especially so to the whole Anglo-Saxon race; and for this reason every energetic scheme proposed by Washington, or by his successors, has been set aside with a nonchalance begotten of our political and geographical isolation, now no more, and of our national recklessness and aversion to hear unwelcome truths, and to turn aside from our daily profitable pursuits to discharge this most detested duty.

The apology for a militia system substituted for Washington's bill called every able-bodied man between the ages of eighteen and forty-five from his occupation three or four days each year to attend meetings where neither arms, manuals of instruction, nor instructors were supplied, and had they been, no important progress could have been made in those few hours with long intervals between. This was so absurd that the State governments either disregarded it altogether or else degraded it by their numerous exemptions and insignificant fines. For more than thirty years the laws of Congress have remained a dead letter; the militia have been neither trained nor even enrolled, the quota of arms granted to each State has been deposited in arsenals or commuted for a money equivalent, or partially distributed to the volunteer militia.

The volunteer militia exists only in cities and large towns; its number and efficiency fluctuating with the popularity of its officers or the excitement of the hour. It is tested by no adequate inspections, restrained by no severe code; its arms, organization, drill, and discipline are as various as its uniforms; it is neither recognized by the Constitution nor subject to the service of the United States. Into its ranks are drawn a certain number of young men by their military tastes; a certain number are prompted to join by a patriotic sense of duty; the majority are attracted by the uniforms, the parades, and the conviviality. Many of the most steady and capable young men, the bone and sinew of the community, whose sympathy and identification with the institution is essential to its firm establishment, and whose exemption imposes an undue burden upon the rest, are withheld from service by their parents or employers.

Just at present this force has the advantage of being commanded by experienced officers, and of numbering in its rank and file many men who have served during the war; but time will leave it in a few years as superficial and unfit for prolonged or important service as it was when the war of the rebellion broke out.

Then many of its members enlisted for the war, impelled by military ardor or by patriotism; but the majority declined to serve at all, or for a long period; few of the great officers ventured into the field, and those few displayed their eminent unfitness. Indeed, no two human beings could be more unlike than the bewhiskered, stern-eyed, imposing dignitary dressed within an inch of his life, marching like an automaton, wheeling with affected precision, uttering his commands with guttural fierceness, and the young, smooth-faced, modest, simply-dressed volunteer corporal or general.

Our streets are filled with the survivors of four years' campaigns; but we look in vain among them for that martial aspect which characterized the militia-man of yore. In truth, this was magnifique, mais ce n'était pas la guerre.

If we are to rely on militia as our chief defence, the Federal Government should exercise its constitutional authority, and demand the training of a reasonable number—the minimum consistent with safety—not to perform street parades, to frisk in balls or revel at dinners, or to waste their time and money in what is called an interchange of courtesies, but for war, remembering General Gaines's advice, that "any measure of military preparation in peace, not strictly applicable to a state of war, should be held as radically wrong, useless, or mischievous."

If you have patience to read, I will hereafter endeavor to indicate the duties of the Federal and State governments, and the measures to make the militia service valuable and tolerable.

With an Essay by Matthew Arnold, and a Memoir by Sainte-Beuve. Translated by E. Thornton Fisher, Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute. 12mo, $1 25.

"To all who love poetry, Guérin deserves to be something more than a name. . . . . . He has, above all, a sense of what there is adorable and secret in the life of Nature. . . . . His magic of expression will make his name remembered in all literature."—Matthew Arnold.

THE HUGUENOT GALLEY-SLAVE;

Being the Autobiography of a French Protestant condemned to the Galleys for the sake of his religion. Translated from the French of Jean Marteilhe. 12mo, $1 50.

"Open the book where you will, and it is almost impossible to lay it down again. 'It is,' says M. Michelet, a book of the first order, distinguished by the charming naïveté of its recital, by its angelic sweetness, written as if between earth and heaven.' Records like these do honor to religion and to humanity."—London Reader.

"A more valuable contribution to the records of genuine martyrology could hardly be found. The style of the narrative, in its graphic simplicity, reminds us of Defoe; but the well authenticated facts which it relates are more interesting than fiction, and the incidents not less strange. There is no polemical design nor any element of theological bitterness in this volume. To record the virtues of noble-hearted men, not to reopen wounds, nor to cast odium on creeds or churches, has been the motive of its publication."—London Quarterly Review.

The Week.

WHAT with evening sessions and all-night sessions, the end of the session has been busy enough, but a vast amount of business will necessarily remain undone, some of it for ever, some of it till the Fortieth Congress comes. Mr. Andrews, of The Boston Advertiser, gives a concise view of the present condition of the public business. Colorado, apparently, must stay out in the cold, neither House having made answer to the veto message. Mr. Boutwell's bill to keep rebel lawyers out of Federal courts sticks fast in a committee of the Senate. The Militia bill goes over. The Thirty-ninth Congress will hardly give us an Educational Bureau, nor will it pass Mr. Blaine's bill to pay the war debts of the loyal States. The excellent bill providing for competitive examination of applicants for office, which reflects so much credit on Mr. Jenckes, was almost got through the House, a fact which is encouraging; there is now pending a motion to reconsider. Mr. Wade's Constitutional Amendment, which forbids re-election to the Presidency, will have to wait. Mr. Schenck's Equalization of Bounties bill is probably dead. The Tax bill may very likely get through, but the Tariff bill's chance is not at all a good one. The Government Telegraph bill, which we should have been very glad indeed to see tried, and we do not know why it should not be tried, will fail, we fear. Nothing seems to be known as to whether the Fortieth Congress, when it meets next week, will or will not speedily adjourn. The apprehensions under which the country was laboring when Congress provided against an interregnum have pretty much vanished.

THAT Congress can sometimes have its way in spite of the President, was shown on Monday by the Georgetown election. This was a limited experiment of negro, or rather impartial, suffrage, in a community registering 971 black and 1,350 white voters. The obnoxious "element" was certainly not frightfully in excess, but it managed, by an alliance with the small body of white Republicans, to elect its candidate for mayor. It failed, however, to secure a majority in the Common Council; which is some comfort to Conservatives of whatever station. The result has two lessons: that the natural affinity between black and white loyalists, if allowed expression, is sufficient to outvote the disaffected and rebellious; and that, for some time to come, the exercise of suffrage by the freedmen must be supported by a national police. When under the very shadow of the Capitol, and during the session of Congress, it is necessary to restrain the vindictive and brutal passions of the low whites by extraordinary precautions of patrolmen and mounted guards, it may be guessed what would be the fate of ballot-box and colored voters in any rural district, and almost any city of the South, not easily controllable by troops stationed there. Especially would the peril be great in an election for a constitutional convention; and the reconstruction bill wisely provided not only that such election should be held under military auspices, but should be capable of revision by the same authorities.

THE Senate having disregarded the wish of the army, and rejected the proposal of the House that the War Department should have charge of the Indians, and the House having refused assent to the bland scheme of the Senate to appoint a board of inspection to investigate annually Indian affairs, the tribes are to remain in the care of the Department of the Interior. We presume, then, that there is to be no change for the better in the existing state of affairs. Army officers and agents of the Indian Bureau are to go on quarrelling and traversing each other's plans; the disorders on the plains are to continue; and the Indians are to be encouraged in a belief, which is at the bottom of a good deal of the trouble we have with them, that we have more men and flour than they, but that they have at least as many, and probably more, braves than their big father. We are very much inclined to favor the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the Department of War. Indeed, we believe that the governors of the States and Territories between Missouri and California could make very much better work of managing the whole business than the Federal Government has ever made as yet.

THE Senate Reconstruction bill was passed last week. As soon as the opposition in the House found the Senate was likely to hold firm on its amendments, Mr. Stevens "filibustered" against it in vain in favor of his own scheme of military government without limit or qualification. The bill is not all that could be wished, but we greatly fear that it is the best measure which, in the present state of parties and of public feeling at the North, we are likely to get. It provides, as fully as Government can provide it, protection for life and property, and prescribes a course by which any State may at any time be released from its revolutionary status and be placed in regular relations with the rest of the Union. We hope yet to see a constitutional amendment adopted which will give Congress undisputed control over the franchise, and some authority to insist upon the supply of education by the States, but in the meantime the present bill seems to offer the best road out of a muddle which is fast becoming intolerable. The Democrats are evidently inclined to accept the measure for fear they may travel further and fare worse.

THE new Tariff bids fair to perish in the House. Nobody understands it, and most of its supporters are rather ashamed of it, and even if it does pass, do not want to be held responsible for it. It bears about the same relation to a good law that a Celtic cairn bears to a building. The cairn is a heap of stones contributed, one by one by the passers-by, to the memory of a murdered man, and it often attains to considerable magnitude. The new tariff is a string of taxes, each clapped on by one member, and nobody caring whether his tax harmonized with anybody else's tax or not, provided it swelled the total bulk, all contending for the honor of furnishing the biggest contribution. The result is a bill which has had no parallel in any civilized country within the last century. The Tribune has had to go back to the Middle Ages to find anything like it. The latest votes on it in the House indicate a general disposition to let it drop; but Mr. Morrill announces his intention to force it through if possible. We suggest that he leave it to Mr. Stevens, who is the only political economist in Congress who can do full justice to this remarkable measure.

The committee appointed to enquire into the whiskey frauds, as might be expected, have a startling story to tell, but have made an excellent report. The cause of the abuses they find where every intelligent man expected them to find it—in the weight of the tax, which is one of the largest premiums on fraud ever offered, and in the utter demoralization of the revenue force, which seems in the large cities, at least, to be composed, in the main, of unmitigated knaves, whose chief function is the promotion and covering up of cheating amongst manufacturers. There is no reform so much needed as Mr. Jenckes's, but we suspect it will be some time before Congress will be virtuous enough to swallow it.

Apparently, we now have all the facts in the case of the three United States soldiers murdered last year in Anderson District, South Carolina. The public are familiar with the general history of the affair. The report of the Congressional Committee shows that Mr. O. H. Browning's connection with the case consisted in his taking a fee of $1,000 for making an argument on behalf of the prisoners, whose friends were just then besieging Mr. Johnson for either a pardon or a transfer of the criminals to the custody of the civil authorities—and they did not very much care, we imagine, which favor was granted. The commutation of sentence may be supposed as much the work of Secretary Stanton as of any one else; he thought, he says, that as it was doubtful whether a military commission could properly try the men, it would hardly do to put them to death, though there was no doubt of their guilt. So also of the removal from the Dry Tortugas to Fort Delaware. A sickly season was threatened, the Secretary says, and he advised their being brought to Fort Delaware, which is pretty much out of the reach of cholera. The final release of the prisoners is due to Judge Hall, of the United States District Court of Delaware, who declares that he had judicial knowledge so long ago as June, 1865, that the rebellion was at an end, and further, that the authority of the civil tribunals of South Carolina was restored at the time when the murderers were tried. General Sickles denies that there was then in being in South Carolina a civil court competent to try a case of this magnitude; to which Judge Hall would probably reply that, if there was none, there ought to have been one, and that, at any rate, it was none of General Sickles's business, but South Carolina's. The report mentions that the murderers, on being released, went home and joined in a grand celebration of that happy event which their fellow-citizens had organized, and which closed with "a general drunk." They are still at large. The case resolves itself into this—a very striking illustration of the truth that crimes against Union men and soldiers are not in the public opinion of the South crimes to be severely punished. Let it be said that the blame which has been freely bestowed upon Mr. Browning and Mr. Johnson for their action in the matter is in great part removed by this full statement of facts; but as regards Mr. Johnson, let it be said, too, that the committee found in one of the many petitions which besought the President's interposition in behalf of the criminals the declaration that his "avowed policy" led the petitioners to approach him with confidence—a significant fact, though the truth it teaches lacks freshness.

There has been during the present session of the Thirty-ninth Congress a singular dearth of the old-fashioned Congressional eloquence. Most of the heroes of antiquity have been allowed to sleep in peace, and hardly any precedents for American legislation have been dug out of Athenian or Egyptian statutes-at-large. Plutarch and the classical dictionaries have apparently lain dusty and unused on the library shelves, and we have had nothing but a steady flow of business talk, with now and then a little dash of vituperation. In fact, the only striking flower of rhetoric which we remember since the 1st of December was contributed by Mr. Rogers, of New Jersey; but his genius, far from being a pale reflection of that of Greek or Roman worthies, is a native product, shining with an original light. His eulogy on Mr. Johnson had a full New Jersey flavor about it, which probably brought tears of vexation to the eyes of the "classicists" from other parts of the Republic. We are very sorry to find that he will not sit after the 4th of March, as we expected great things from him, and were about to watch his career with interest.

The authorship of the Motley letter is solemnly denied by many of Mr. Seward's friends. It was written, they say, by Mr. Johnson himself, and signed without reading by Mr. Seward, either when ill in bed or on the day of his daughter's funeral. If this be true, there is, of course, nothing left but to sympathize with him, although it is hard to say which is most to be pitied: a man who puts his name to Andrew Johnson's compositions after he has read them, or a man who does it without reading them at all. A circular appears to have been sent to all the other diplomatic agents, not in the same terms, but with the same fine "cross-roads" flavor about it as the letter to Mr. Motley. The indignation of the denials which this calls forth is very amusing. These gentlemen are evidently not to be caught in this way. We respectfully suggest a surer test, in the shape of an enquiry as to what they thought of Mr. Johnson's oratory on his late tour. Anybody who says he liked it, is pretty sure to be as faithful as Mr. Rogers, of New Jersey; and anybody who says he did not like it, is clearly unfit for his place.

It appears to have leaked out that the salary of that unfortunate admirer of Mr. Johnson's policy, Mr. Harvey of the Kingdom of Portugal, has been paid most illegally and improperly by Mr. Seward out of the fund placed at the disposal of his department for contingent expenses. The House has been taking special precautions against a repetition of this abuse in voting the appropriations, and if Mr. Harvey receives any further assistance it will be out of somebody's private pocket. The recent performances of the President with regard to other foreign ministers have left the wretched Harvey without any claim on Congressional mercy; and the "policy," whatever its merits may be, will prove but a poor substitute for Portuguese beef and potatoes, though both of these, and especially the beef, stand, we believe, very low.

The New York Times remonstrates earnestly with the Trades Unions for demanding what it considers extortionate wages after the 1st of March. The action of the trades unions is fast killing some branches of manufacture in England—that is, driving them away to foreign countries; and we anticipate from the eight-hour and other movements here a somewhat similar result. There is no use in talking political economy to our working-men any more than to our members of Congress. Whatever has to be learnt of it they will learn by experience, and by experience only. We are satisfied the country will have to pass through just such a crisis on the labor question as it is now passing through on the tariff question. Demagogues will use it successfully for their own gain until all classes have learned by sorrowful experiments that thinking is, sometimes at least, better than spouting. Political economy will have to be studied and taught in schools and colleges here as it is elsewhere. The present mode of testing every principle is frightfully costly, and breeds great heartburnings to boot. When such men as Wendell Phillips rant to working-men on the eight-hour movement, it is no wonder trades unions take all they can get, and laugh at newspaper warnings.

Careful and minute investigations into the birth, parentage, and education of Mr. McCracken have been going on all over the country during the past week, and various gentlemen have been unsuccessfully accused of being his father; but so far, we believe, everybody on whom suspicion rested has denied all connection with him—so that the American nation will probably not know, until Mr. McCracken returns from his tour, to whom it is indebted for the vigilant inspector who has been looking after the morals and manners of its foreign representatives.

The World solemnly advises the South, "if it is ever to accept of negro suffrage, if it is ever to recognize its State governments under Federal dictation, if it is ever to ratify the pending Constitutional Amendment," to do so now; but on the question whether the South had better ever give in or not, it carefully withholds its opinion—a piece of caution which we cannot too highly commend. We, for our part, entirely concur with The World, and do honestly believe that if the South is ever going to come to terms, the present year would be an excellent year to do it in. We, at the same time, cheerfully concede to The World the merit of having conceived this idea.

It is rather unfortunate, we think, that a pinchbeck air of mock-royalty should have been thrown over the new confederation on our northern border, by giving it the title of "The Kingdom of Canada." We suspect the telegraph operator at Toronto of having made a mistake. At any rate, a "Governor-General," at a salary of $50,000, is to fill the place of sovereign. Upper Canada and Lower Canada are to be called respectively Ontario and Quebec; the two maritime Provinces are to keep their present names, but will be little pleased to know that the confederation is to go by the name of Canada, and they to be, in strictness, "Canadians." Certain variations from what is known as the "Quebec scheme" seem to have been decided upon, but we suppose there can be no doubt that these will be accepted with no more opposition than is common among Provincial politicians, who certainly were never open to the charge of carrying on their controversies in an apathetic manner. We imagine that the people of the Provinces are as yet not at all certain whether or not the new state of things is to be beneficial or otherwise. While there are not many communities in the world more intelligent than those of the North American Provinces, it is true that they are not so educated to politics as the public of the Northern States, and are much more easily controlled by leaders, of whom each Province is blessed with an ample supply. But experience teaches; and we may be tolerably sure that if confederation proves to have been a mistake, it will be rectified. The United States have, of course, no reason to wish the new nation anything but success.

The Fenians seem really to have projected an attempt on the arsenal in the city of Chester, but, as usual, the plan leaked out through informers, and the police and the inhabitants were on the alert, and the result was miserable failure. In the meantime the habeas corpus has been suspended in Ireland for three months more, and Irish independence is apparently as remote as ever.

Mr. Disraeli has brought in a series of resolutions in the House of Commons preparatory to framing a reform bill. The resolutions acknowledge the necessity for extending the franchise, but couple it with a redistribution of seats and the creation of fresh boroughs, in order to prevent the ascendancy of the working classes, whose majority, it is found, would be overwhelming. The resolutions will probably form the subject of a long and wearisome debate, and close not with a bill, but with a recommendation that the Queen be requested to appoint a commission to enquire into the whole subject. The plan is looked on by the Radicals as a mere excuse for the indefinite postponement of the main question, is likely to meet with vigorous opposition, and to end at the very outset in the overthrow of the Derbyites, in spite of Mr. Disraeli's protest against making the fate of ministries dependent on the success or failure of their reform measures.

The principal offenders in the Jamaica tragedy are being charged with murder before the London police magistrates. General Nelson and Lieutenant Brand have been held to bail, pending the examination. One of the ablest arguments the affair has yet called forth was made before the magistrate by Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, on behalf of the prosecution. The news of the week from other parts of Europe has been unimportant.

THE FREEDMEN.

Superintendent Tomlinson, in his report for January, 1867, enumerates in South Carolina 75 day and 4 night schools, conducted by 101 white and 43 colored teachers, and having 8,120 enrolled pupils (the girls being nearly 600 in excess of the boys), whose average attendance is 6,056. Thirty-six of these schools are graded. There are connected with them 46 Sunday-schools, embracing 2,765 pupils. The freedmen support in part 26 of the schools, and their contributions for January amounted to $1,500. The school at Belton is entirely supported by them. In addition to the foregoing and to several schools which have failed to report, the superintendent estimates that there are at least 60 schools in the State, with an attendance of about 5,000 pupils. They are not of the first quality, but are far better than none at all. Mr. Tomlinson has been making an extensive tour of observation in the interior, and encouragingly declares:

> "I am confirmed in the conviction, if confirmation were needed, that nothing so rapidly tends to produce harmony between the white and colored people of the State, and to improve in all respects the condition of the colored people, as the establishment of schools among them."

The towns he visited had been remarkable for the opposition (other than violent) originally manifested towards colored schools:

> "I question very much whether now a half-dozen men of intelligence in any of these places can be found who would not deem it a public calamity to have these schools discontinued. In most of these localities the residents in the immediate neighborhood of the school have ceased to speak with bitterness of it, and generally treat the teachers with politeness. . . . In Cheraw, while I was there, the colored people were allowed the use of the town-hall for an educational meeting; and the meeting was attended by several of the white residents of the town. . . . The mayor of Columbia has visited the schools, and, after expressing the greatest satisfaction with all that he saw, took occasion at a meeting of the council in the evening to advise all its members to visit the schools also."

Mr. Tomlinson praises highly the corps of teachers at Columbia (supported by the N. Y. Branch of the A. F. U. Commission), and also several young colored men of Charleston, whom he sent out into the country districts, at the charge of the New England Branch, and who, in spite of their inexperience in teaching, exhibited great tact and fidelity, and have achieved entire success.

—To this note of progress should be added the recent speech of Gov. Orr to the freedmen of Charleston, in the African Methodist church, the meeting being presided over by a colored president and opened with prayer by a colored chaplain. The governor not only promised them protection against lawlessness and outrage, but commended their schools and predicted that a common-school system for whites and blacks would be established by the next legislature. He further said:

> "I am prepared to stand by the colored man who is able to read the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. I am prepared to give the colored man the privilege of going to the ballot-box and vote."

—Assistant Commissioner Sprague approves with great satisfaction the conduct of both whites and freedmen during the celebration by the latter, on January 1, of their deliverance. The condition of the State is quiet and prosperous, and as far as possible questions relating to freedmen have been kept out of the courts and submitted to arbitration with success. The influx of laborers from South Carolina and Georgia still continued.

—The opposition of the Louisiana planters to the education of colored children has generally abated, thinks the New Orleans Tribune; has even been converted into active efforts to organize schools and obtain teachers:

> "This happy result is due mainly to the firm attitude of the laborers, who, though deprived of education and perhaps because deprived of it, appreciate to its full value the price of acquiring knowledge. They have made the education of their children an absolute condition of their remaining on the plantations. Very few of them would work at all, this year, on a place where no school for the tuition of their children will be in existence. So that this result, at least, has been secured, that the benefit of a common education will be extended to a large number of children of the oppressed race."

—The crops for 1867 seem to promise well in Louisiana, the weather having been highly favorable to the planting of cane. The smaller farms only will be put to cotton. Most of the freedmen have contracted for the year, and at increased wages; men average $15 per month and rations. The experiment of coolie labor is now in progress on one plantation.

LITERARY.

THE largest and most valuable collection of autographs ever offered for sale in America—the collection of the late Mr. J. K. Tefft, of Savannah—will be sold at auction on Monday, March 4, by Leavitt, Strebeight & Co., 498 Broadway. The autographs here brought together are the result of over thirty years' collection, being nearly thirty thousand in number, and only surpassed in number and excellence by the collection of the Rev. Dr. Sprague, of Albany. As in all large collections, there are quantities of autographs that are utterly valueless here, especially of Americans who have been ephemerally eminent, or who have dabbled in literature—Southern poetesses, and the like. But taken as a whole, the collection is exceptionally valuable, the greater part of the best autographs being complete and interesting letters. The finest things are two bound volumes, the "Signers of the Declaration of Independence" and the "Signers of the Constitution of the United States." The first of these volumes contains fifty-one letters or documents and five signatures, together with others who voted for and against the Declaration, but did not sign it. The second volume has letters and documents signed by all the signers of the Constitution and of all the other members of the convention except two. The collection is very rich in autographs of the colonial governors, the generals of the American Revolution, both American, foreign, and British, the statesmen and politicians of this country, and naval commanders and literary men. It has a full set of American bishops, of presidents, vice-presidents, and a nearly complete one of the cabinets. There are also about four thousand foreign autographs, including kings, queens, warriors, statesmen, and men eminent in every department of learning.

—Some weeks ago we announced the intention of the "Agathynian Club," of this city, to reprint a certain number of rare works in fac-simile, in the highest style of art. We have before us the first product of this "beneficence" (to change a Latin counter for a Greek), the work selected being "Advice to the Officers of the British Army," of which the sixth edition was published in London in 1783. The merits of the satire will be generally acknowledged by the few for whose rather exclusive benefit it has been printed so elegantly and expensively; but whether it ought to be mentioned in the same breath with Swift, or deserved its present resurrection on account of its unquestionable application to the regular military service of our own day and country, are questions which will be asked by some who are satisfied that the Bradstreet Press can execute the most difficult commission in antiquarian typography, and long to see its capacity for beautiful workmanship employed on the veritable treasures of literature. The "Agathynian Club" has five more ventures to make in the current year, and we entreat it to justify its title by loftier selections than Capt. Grose's "Advice."

—Mr. John Stuart Mill lately delivered a very fine inaugural address to the students of the University of St. Andrews on his installation as Lord Rector. He reviewed the whole field of the higher university education, including a defence of classical studies if taught properly and without verse-making. He also pleaded for mathematics, logic, ethics—to be taught historically rather than dogmatically—political economy, international law, experimental science, physiology, and even the history of religious dogmas. He excluded, we think wrongly, the modern languages, which are as necessary to general modern culture as they are useful to modern life, and history, which can certainly be easily and well taught orally. The address has since been published in pamphlet form.

—On account of the extreme rarity of Sir Charles Wilkins's translation of the Bhâgavad-Gîta, more than fifty orders having been received for a single copy which was advertised for sale a short time ago, Mr. Geo. P. Philes has concluded to reprint a small edition of it. It will be printed at the Bradstreet Press, and will be in one octavo volume, at the price of three dollars to subscribers. Subscriptions will be received by Mr. Philes, at 64 Nassau Street, New York, until April 20, and the volume will be ready for delivery early in May. But few copies will be printed beyond the number subscribed for, and the price to non-subscribers will be then advanced twenty-five per cent. The title-page of the original reads "The Bhagvat-Geeta; or, Dialogues of Kreeshna and Arjoon, in Eighteen Lectures, with Notes. Translated from the Original, in the Sanskreet, or Ancient Language of the Brahmins. By Charles Wilkins. London: 1785."

—At a late meeting of the Philological Society in London, Mr. A. J. Ellis, the great teacher of phonetics, read a paper "On the Pronunciation of the English Language during the Sixteenth Century, compared with the Pronunciations prevalent in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, and applied to elicit the Pronunciation of Chaucer in the Fourteenth Century." In the first part of his paper, Mr. Ellis laid down three laws of change in language: first, that the changes take place in passing from one generation to another; secondly, that a series of sounds acquired in childhood remain fixed in the individual for life; thirdly, that changes take place in passing from one individual brought up among one series of spoken sounds to another brought up among another. The principal authority upon which he relied for conjecturing the pronunciation of Chaucer was William Salesbury's Welsh account of English pronunciation, dated 1547. To a discussion of Salesbury the second and third parts of the paper were devoted. The fourth part contained a pronouncing vocabulary of about 2,000 words of the sixteenth century, collected from various authorities. The fifth part gave a conspectus of English pronunciation in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, arranged so that the pronunciation of each usual combination of letters may be seen at a glance, with the authorities annexed. The sixth part gave specimens of spoken English from contemporary authors. The last part contained results, and applied them to elicit, with the help of rhymes, the probable pronunciation of Chaucer. Mr. Ellis illustrated his paper by reading aloud passages from Shakespeare, Chaucer, and the Ormulum, with their proper pronunciation. The paper will soon be published, and will be of great interest to scholars.

CAPTURE OF WHALES BY POISON.—The idea of employing poison in the whale fishery is no novelty. On the contrary, it is an idea which has been frequently suggested, and several attempts have been made to put it in practice. One of the most distinguished of toxicologists, Prof. Christison, of Edinburgh, has published a long account of experiments in this direction made, by his advice, by Greenland whalers many years ago, and has left his readers to infer that the failure of the efforts then made was to be ascribed rather to the operator's ignorance of chemical manipulation than to any defect in the plan itself.

As was natural, in view of the enormous size of the animals to be destroyed and of the evident necessity of employing a poison tolerably rapid in its action, Christison recommended prussic acid as the agent most likely to meet the requirements of the case, and to this same agent the attention of subsequent speculators has usually been directed. The matter has, however, been recently taken up from a somewhat different point of view by a Frenchman named Thiercelin, and with marked success. Discarding prussic acid and all other liquid poisons as unsuited for use with the harpoons and other apparatus at the whaler's disposal, Thiercelin urges that poison must be employed in the solid state, in order that it may be safely and readily thrown into the animal. The poison employed must, however, be a substance readily soluble in water, rapidly absorbable by the circulatory system, and powerful in its effects. Such an agent is found in the soluble salts of strychnine mixed with a small proportion of curare, the South American arrow-poison.

From a number of experiments made upon rabbits, dogs, and horses, it appears that this poison will produce death in the course of ten or fifteen minutes when administered at the rate of 4000ths of a grain for each pound of the animal's weight, provided it be blown in the state of fine powder upon the surface of a large wound.

On the assumption that the weight of whales varies from 100,000 to 180,000 pounds, the mixed poison was made into cartridges, each containing about 450 grains of the mixture, and these cartridges were then placed in the powder of the shells thrown by the common American bomb-lance. In theory, one such poisoned cartridge would be sufficient to kill a medium-sized whale, and two of them ought to destroy a whale of the largest dimensions. In order to test his plan, M. Thiercelin went on a whaling voyage to the Pacific Ocean. In the course of this voyage he succeeded in striking ten whales with the poisoned bombs, and had the satisfaction, in every instance, of seeing the animals die almost instantly with the usual symptoms of poisoning by strychnine. Whales appear, indeed, to be even more readily destroyed by this poison than most of the land animals. In several cases out of the ten the whale was dead in four or five minutes after the introduction of the poison, and in no case did the animal live more than eighteen minutes after having been struck.

HEPWORTH DIXON'S NEW AMERICA.*

WHEN Englishmen say "America," they mean the United States. If Goldwin Smith and Englishmen like him say "the New America," they mean the United States purified of slavery. Thinking America, such men would say, and most of us would assent, has for generations been struggling, and with a great measure of success, towards Christian democracy. Making lighter and lighter the chains of creeds, intolerant of state churches, it has yet believed in what it held to be the Christianity of Christ. Without losing its respect for law and the forms of law, it has yet believed more ardently than in law in what, using a vulgar phrase, we may call the rights of man as an individual man, and it will have no classes. But for many years, while by force of free thought and free discussion it was becoming such a people, this people in its political action was to a great extent governed and guided by men of the same blood indeed, but debauched by slavery till they had ceased to believe in democracy except as a decoy word, and had become in faith and practice an oligarchy, while for free Christianity they had almost substituted the repetition, frequently fervent enough, of formulas which had grown obsolete. But the war came and all this was changed, or rather the war changed much of it and made it possible, indeed inevitable, that by-and-by the rest should be changed, and the barbarism and stagnation of the South be replaced by the life of the free North—thus giving us what Professor Smith would call a New America.

Perhaps Mr. Dixon also believes this, but this is not at all that he insists on in this "New America" of his. What he saw here was an America new not as compared with a former America, but new as regards some phases of its social system and its religion when compared with the nations of Europe and the East. Furthermore, he appears to think that he has discovered those influences at work in the America of to-day which are to be most powerful in making the America of the future. What visible results have been produced by the operation of religion and the spirit of liberty in the social and domestic life of the United States?—that is the question which the author sets himself to answer. As for his answer, the reader of his book is forced to one of two conclusions—either Mr. Dixon is a philosophic student of society who believes Goethe's maxim, "that nature may best be studied in her monstrosities," to be true also for him who investigates the forms of social life in free communities, or else Mr. Dixon, being a very clever book-maker, if not a maker of very clever books, has chosen topics which would make a most readable volume, and has had very little regard for philosophy of any kind till his book was made and he came to the writing of his preface. This latter hypothesis does not, perhaps, fully account for a little philosophizing here and there among the chapters, some of it rather trite and some of it, as one of our extracts shows, very absurd; but still it is more charitable to Mr. Dixon than the other one, which supposes him to really believe that the America of to-day or to-morrow or some day is to be described by a description of certain knots of people whose influence, if we know anything of our fellow-countrymen, counts for but very little indeed. The America of the future is not going to be shaped by the revolting woman or women of Staten Island, nor by the Boston seer and seeresses, nor by the two or three hundred Tunkers who have kept a part of the Tunker faith which was brought from Germany, nor by the five or six thousand Shakers of Lebanon and Hancock and other villages who are spiritually descended from Mother Ann, of Manchester, nor by the peculiar Bible families who possess each other in common at Oneida Creek and Wallingford, nor by the hundred and odd thousand Mormons of fifty nationalities, as Bowles says, who have been gathered from the ends of the earth into Utah, and to whom Congress is now saying a word of evil import; nor by the Spiritualists, an indefinite number to be sure, whose roll of adherents however, and this we can say pretty certainly, contains no American names so distinguished as those of some English spiritualists.

These, however, are the people who fill Mr. Dixon's book, and, while we are glad to have an account of them so well prepared as this, it is necessary to protest against their being called the present America any more than they have been the America of the past. The future America will no more be formed by them than by the children of those American mothers who never saw the light, and who also fill a certain portion of this volume in a chapter entitled "Young America." Let us say, though, that there are also some good chapters on the movement now begun in this country, as well as in England, which looks towards ameliorating the condition of women, chapters in which Mr. Dixon, while telling much truth, does not seem to be aware that the full truth would be much more favorable to some of the States of the Union than the statement of it which he gives. We no longer sin up to or down to the standard of the common law; at least there are parts of the country where we do not, although in other parts we do, as, for instance, in Virginia, whence at this moment comes up a painful cry that marriage is to be abolished, which, being interpreted, means that women are to be allowed to hold to their own use property owned by them before their marriage.

Of course, the people who are Mr. Dixon's theme are interesting people, and the book is readable from end to end, more so, we think, than any book of American travel that has been written for a good many years. Where the author lands, we are happy to say, we do not know; the first page shows us him and his friend in Atchison, seeking a passage to the city of Brigham Young. The Atchison people were in a fit of deep disgust at the transfer of the Government mails from their route to the Smoky Hill road, and for a time vented their ill-humor on the travellers, who were also treated with some considerable contempt as being Eastern men, "Yanks"—an epithet which leads us to conjecture that the two Englishmen happened to get into a party of "gentlemen of Southern sentiments." But before they left the town they succeeded in reversing the popular judgment as to their softness and greenness:

> "Sauntering down the street, enjoying our gossip and cigar, we note the word post-office on a shop front, and on going inside we find there is one letter with my name on the cover, written in an unknown hand, on which three cents are due. Paying the money, and breaking the seal, I find the letter is not for me; on which I fold and restore it to the postmaster, saying it is not mine, and should be kept for the owner, to whom it is perhaps of moment. Eyeing me in a queer way, the postmaster takes the letter, and gives me back my change of three cents. 'Do you see,' says the sheriff to his nearest friend; 'damned smart that—read his letter and got his money back! Hang me if I think they are Yanks, after all.'
> "One touch of roguery, it would seem, is enough to make the whole world kin!"

At Leavenworth the stage is found, and the passengers, Mr. Dixon and his friend, are packed in with the mail-bags and set out in a frame of mind the reverse of comfortable on learning that the United States troops which, ever since they left London, they had been promising themselves as an escort, could not be spared for that service on account of the very threatening aspect of the Indians all along the route. Naturally, Mr. Dixon has some very forcible remarks to make on the present postal arrangements on the overland route, under which, as it seems, the mail is not only at the mercy of Indians, but of passengers who may be shut up with it. It would be worth while for a couple of thieves to pay their fare for a chance to operate on it. The ride across the plains is exceedingly well described, we do not know who has ever done it better, and as the author goes along he discourses to us of "road-agents," the men of the far West, the prairie justice, and the red man. None of it is particularly new, but it is all very freshly told. Some speculations which he goes into in regard to the extent to which the white man of this country has been influenced by the Indians are certainly novel. No race of men, he says, ever yet conquered another race, taking from them their lands and cities, without finding on the spot which they thus came to own a local genius which affected their policy, usages, and arts. Israel was commanded to smite, and did smite, Canaanites, Amorites, and Jebusites, yet the customs and ideas of these heathen clung to the soil and drew away the chosen people from the worship of the true God to the worship of Dagon, Moloch, and Ashtaroth. Mantchoo Tartars have become Chinese; the English of the pale after three generations became more Irish than the Irish; Greece conquered her Roman conqueror. So with the Indians:

> "They have left the traces of their former presence in the national mind; in the popular politics, in the popular science, in the popular life. They have done so in places from which they have wholly disappeared, as well perhaps as in districts where they still exist; among the Spiritualists of New England, among the Mormons of Salt Lake valley. Man is what he eats; and a nation grows into the likeness of that which it absorbs. Where the > Indian has been destroyed by assimilation, the pale-face must have undergone a change, to be measured by the amount of resisting power; a quality in which some tribes of these red-skins are pre-eminently rich. When the Indian has survived the shock of conflict with the pale-face, as at Oneida Creek, at Wyandotte, at St. Mary's Mission, and in many other places, the power of acting and reacting on the whites is still in force, affecting the national character in a way which no man could have foreseen, and no one will now deny.

> "Can any one say whether, up to this moment, though the white men have an easy mastery, the action of the white men on the red has been stronger than that of the red men on the white?
> "Let those who think so come into these Western plains, into the lands where red and white men live together in anything but harmony. They will find that each has acquired the other's vices; that while the Indian has learned how to beat his pale brother in debauchery, the white man has only come to equal his red brother in ferocity and craft. If the Yengee has taught the Indian to drink whiskey, the Indian has taught the Yengee to keep squaws. Nearly all the old trappers and teamsters, who have lived among Indians, are polygamists: Jem Baker, of Clear Creek, has two squaws; Mageary, of South Platte, has three; Bent, of Smoky Hill, is said to have married six. As an Indian chief said to Colonel Marcy, 'The first thing a Yengee wants in the plains is plenty wife.' If Little Bear drinks and beats his squaw to death, Jem Smithers has learned to make a jest of taking scalps. I hear anecdotes in these plains to make the blood run cold. Jack Dunkier, of Central City, scalped five Sioux in the presence of his white comrade. The same Colorado boy is said to have ridden into Denver with the leg of an Indian warrior slung to his saddle; a leg which he had cut from the trunk, and on which he reported that he had been living for two whole days. No one believed his story; but a boast is in its way a fact, and there is no doubt that in Denver City a white man openly boasted of having boiled and eaten steaks from a human thigh. A Pawnee would glory in such a deed, vaunting it afterward in the meetings of his tribe. The Yengee quickly learns to imitate the red man's crimes.
> "It is no figure of speech to say that in White America red influence is very widely spread and very strongly felt alike in the sphere of institutions and in the sphere of thought.
> "The confederacy of the Five Nations was the type adopted by the whites when framing the confederacy of the Thirteen Colonies, not only as regards the principle of their Union, but also in respect to its most original details. The Iroquois had invented the theory of state rights which the colonists borrowed from them; an indefinable and dangerous theory, implying a power of separate action, perhaps of withdrawal, from the Union, leading to a thousand quarrels, and to a civil war of which the end has not yet been reached. These Iroquois had adopted the theory of extending their power and territory not by adding to the limits of any existing nation of the confederacy, but by bodily introducing new tribes and nations into union; a novel principle of political growth which the white men also borrowed from them. Under these two principles, the Five Nations had grown into Eight Nations; and the Thirteen Colonies, following in their wake and carrying on their work, have expanded into Forty-six States and Territories.
> "What man can doubt that Indian ideas on witchcraft, on polygamy, on plurality of gods, on the migration of souls, on the presence of spirits, on future rewards, have entered deeply into the popular mind, and are now affecting for good or ill the course of American religious thought?"

Having read these passages, the reader is ready to believe us when we say that, returning in another place to this theory, the author actually conjectures that the habit of whittling, for which "the Yengee" is somewhat notorious, may possibly be attributable to the Indian custom of keeping accounts by cutting notches in a stick! Mr. Dixon and Mr. Dilke spent fifteen days in Great Salt Lake City, and we get a very full and definite account of the Mormons as regards their history, their religion, their politics, and their social system generally. Mr. Dixon adds to that of many other travellers his testimony to the thrift and industry of that remarkable community, and the practical abilities of Young. He sums up the "notes" of the Mormon Church as follows: It is open to all the world except negroes; the convert accepts "Joseph" as a reconciler, but may hold all his old creed; all dissenters are tolerated; God is held to be in personal contact with his saints, guiding them constantly by the revelations of his will to a seer; true worship, it is believed, is true enjoyment, so the Mormon church is gay, its ritual festive; work is noble; to be industrious is to be in a state of grace; God is a person with the form and the flesh of a man; man is himself a part of God's substance and will himself become a god; he existed from all eternity, and will exist to all eternity; he is not born in sin; this earth is a colony of embodied spirits. In the world to come man, if he lives in obedience to the law, becomes eligible by his marriage for a celestial throne, his wives and children being his kingdom. This brings us to the author's facts and opinions in regard to the polygamous marriages of the Mormons. The evidence which he brings forward in other parts of his book fully justifies the statement as to the freedom of choice allowed them:

> "The Saints go much beyond Abram; and I, for one, am inclined to think that they have found their type of domestic life in the Indian's wigwam rather than in the Patriarch's tent. Like the Ute, a Mormon may have as many wives as he can feed; like the Mandan, he may marry three or four sisters, an aunt and her niece, a mother and her child. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that in the Mormon code there is no such crime as incest, and that a man is practically free to woo and wed any woman who may take his eye. We have had a very strange conversation with Young about the Mormon doctrine of incest."

Not more than five hundred persons, however, have now several wives, wedded, "sealed," or substitutionary, as the third class may be called:

> "Substitution! Can there be such a thing in marriage as either one man, or one woman, standing in the place of another? Young has declared it. . . . A woman may choose her own bridegroom of the skies, but, like the man who would take a second wife, the woman who desires to marry a dead husband can do it in no other way than on Young's intercession and by his consent. Say, that a girl of erratic fancy takes into her head the notion that she would like to become one of the heavenly queens of a departed saint; nothing easier, should her freak of imagination jump with the Prophet's humor. Young is her only judge, his yea or nay, her measure of right and wrong. By a religious act, he can seal her to the dead man, whom she has chosen to be her own lord and king in heaven; by the same act he can give her a substitute on earth from among his elders and apostles; should her beauty tempt his eye, he may accept for himself the office of proxy for her departed saint.
> "In the Tabernacle I have been shown two ladies who are sealed to Young by proxy as the wives of Joseph; the Prophet himself tells me there are many more; and of these two I can testify that their relations to him are the same as those of any other mortal wives. They are the mothers of children who bear his name. Two of the young ladies whom we saw on the stage, sister Zina and sister Emily, are daughters of women who profess to be Joseph's widows. About the story of all these ladies there is an atmosphere of doubt, of mystery, which we can hardly pierce."

The accounts of all his strange acquaintances, the free-lovers of Oneida, the Shaker monks and nuns, the Tunker celibates, are equally full of interest and information. We think we have indicated pretty fairly by our extracts the value of Mr. Dixon's theorizing, and as for the interesting nature of the facts which he has collected, we might transfer half his pages to our columns and not exhaust his store of what in our opinion is extremely readable writing.

HORTICULTURAL MORALITY.[*]

If a savage should come into possession of the house, furniture, and entire establishment of a civilized millionaire, it would very slightly, if at all, increase his wealth; because, from lack of suitable means of education, he would be entirely unprepared and unable to make a proper use of it. Evidently, then, the question of the wealth or prosperity of a people is as much a question of their education as of their resources. No one whose own artistic sense has been at all cultivated can enter the houses of our farming population—even of the more well-to-do class—without feeling pity for the state of extreme destitution to which they are condemned by the common lack of means of education in this respect which they have been fated to endure. The family, for the most part, live in the kitchen, whose white floors and tables, bright tins, and well-blacked stove bear constant witness to their thrift and industry. But it is destitute of any kind of decoration; its walls are either rough-cast plaster or colored with lime or yellow wash. Perhaps some cheap and dull-colored wall-paper will furnish a little contrast to the ceiling. There is a best room in the house—the parlor—which has mahogany furniture, stiff and uncomfortable chairs, a glossy hair-cloth sofa, a carpet resplendent with crimson and yellow, saved from too speedy wear by a liberal introduction of hay between the carpet and floor, which fills the room with a sickish odor of musty decay. There are some prints on the walls encased in broad cherry-wood frames. First the family tree, then portraits of dead presidents or living generals, where the lineaments of Jackson, Washington, Lincoln, Grant, or McClellan are made ghastly by the crude and inharmonious colors. In lieu of some of these portraits of men, we may find the Flying Morgan as he appeared on the Fashion Course, Sept. 11, 1860, or of some famous stock-bull, ram, or cow. The windows are shaded by paper curtains, whose green body color is relieved by strange vases of still stranger flowers, painted with colors hardly to be found in the rainbow.

If we venture to lift these obstructions, we look into a yard of coarse grass, mowed once a year, and seldom even green in color after June. Possibly it is crossed by a walk of glistening white pebbles, bordered by rows of sea-shells or of some starved shrubs and herbs. If we lift our eyes, we find that a lovely landscape, the privilege of enjoying which might be cheaply purchased at the price of everything, not a prime necessity of living, which the house contains, has been completely shut off by a cart-shed, an ailanthus, or an unhealthy plum-tree.

It is a great delight in such a house to find that books are purchased or that a periodical comes once a month containing such wood-cuts as the picture of the "Jersey Bull" in the last January number of The American Agriculturist, or the calf "After Rosa Bonheur" in the February number, or the "Field Mice," "Orchids," and "Table Decorations" in the same number of The American Journal of Horticulture.

[*] "Rand's Flowers for the Parlor and Garden." Boston: J. E. Tilton & Co. Pp. 408.

The number and the character of the illustrated books which have been lately brought out with especial reference evidently to the demand of persons living in the country, are indeed a most auspicious indication of real prosperity and a genuine improvement in the condition of our agricultural population. Regarded in this light, it is a question of some importance to whom we are indebted for the value thus received besides the publishers, and to what sources we are to look for the continued supply of the demand which has thus so happily demonstrated itself.

A series of horticultural books, published by Tilton & Co., are very fine examples of the ability to furnish food to the eye as well as the mind, and the most attractive of their series is "Rand's Flowers for the Parlor and Garden."

Mr. Rand is a young man of wealth, near Boston, who, attracted to agricultural and horticultural pursuits, has opened a vein in horticultural literature which he has worked most vigorously and profitably. In the second book of his series, Mr. Rand promises three more on spring flowers, orchids, and cryptogamous plants, and expresses the hope that he shall acquit himself so well that his books will become an essential part of every horticultural library. After examining these books, we cannot help praising Mr. Rand's industry, and yet we are compelled to ask ourselves what was the prompting motive which induced him to undertake the publication of the series he proposes. This question forces itself most obtrusively on the mind in connection with the first of his books, the "Flowers for the Parlor and Garden," a showy and readable book of 408 pages, and about 100 illustrations of varied degrees of excellence.

In his preface he says:

> "It has been said that no botanist was ever an infidel; may we not also say that no true lover of flowers can be a bad man? There is a secret influence arising from those bright gems of nature which imperceptibly makes us holier and better."

There are persons who will denounce the sentiments of the extract quoted as mere twaddle. It would be a pity if the book itself should tend to confirm them in their opinion. It is unquestionably interesting, well written, beautifully illustrated, and purports to be the work and experiences of E. S. Rand himself. There is not a word between the covers which could awaken a doubt that Mr. Rand is really its author. He claims it, copyrighted it, sells it, and yet we must believe the effect of flowers on Mr. Rand has been very "imperceptible" when we find that the bulk of the book is taken, some would say stolen, from the work of a brother (English) horticulturist and author, Shirley Hibbard, who published through Groombridge & Son, in 1857, a book called "Rustic Adornments."

From this book he has taken his frontispiece and the illustrations on pp. 15, 48, 140, 224, 232, 235, 237, 238, 244, 252, 253, 262, 265, 266, 267, 273, 274, 275, 280, 281, 282, 286, 307. An illustration on p. 381 reminds us strongly of Sir Uvedale Price, in "The Picturesque." The remaining illustrations so closely resemble those quoted, in spirit and execution, that we regret we do not possess Mr. Hibbard's "Brambles and Bay Leaves" and "Town and Garden," in order to name the pages which are taken from these books.

We could more easily excuse him for taking these illustrations whole than, as on pages 15 and 307, for emasculating beautiful designs by removing their central portions to make way for inferior ideas of his own.

The hope that Mr. Rand was the victim of his illustrators, who might have palmed off upon him these copies as originals, fails when we find that the text was taken from the same place with the illustrations; as, for instance, the treatment of the aquarium and Wardian and Waltonian cases, occupying the space between pp. 232 and 286, is taken wholly from Mr. Hibbard. Most of the pages are line for line, whilst others are condensations, where the editor did not take the trouble to rewrite the matter, but simply clipped it out and tacked it together with a few words of his own. To beguile his American readers, he has introduced enough names of American plants and animals to give an air of familiarity.

If in the course of his extracting he came upon lines which would betray him, he has altered them. Thus Mr. Hibbard gives as his description of the Waltonian case the following, p. 170:

> "The annexed figures are drawn from one which I have now in use, supplied me by Mr. West, of Seebiton, who is the original maker of the cases, to whom indeed we are indebted for many improvements in Mr. Walton's first ideas, and the suggestions of that eminent horticulturist, Mr. Donald Beaton. As this description must be brief, I will at once refer the reader to the perspective view of the structure, closely stocked with seeds and cuttings, as it adorns my study window at the moment of writing this."

To avoid the references, Mr. Rand interrupts his extract and interpolates as follows, p. 264:

> "To give the reader an idea of the case, we will at once refer to the figure of one of simplest construction, which we propose to describe particularly."

Then he returns to Mr. Hibbard. This act in some persons would be described as barefaced impudence, but when done by one who is "made holier and better" by his association with flowers, we must forbear to describe it.

Again, the treatment of the tuberose, page 199 to 202, is given as Mr. Rand's experience. In reality it is no such thing. Where the illustration at the head of the chapter came from, we cannot say; but the experience related is that of a painstaking horticulturist, who has revolutionized the method of cultivating those beautiful plants. Nothing in the text, however, hints at such a fact, and the worthy amateur of tuberoses, having contributed his gratuitous aid to Mr. Rand, does not even get the return of public thanks. The fact that Mr. Rand has advertised himself as a religious horticultural and agricultural teacher renders this piracy more important.

We regret to find in the new magazine, The American Journal of Horticulture, whose advent we hailed with pleasure a short time since, the same system of literary thieving. It would be possible to find the source of Mr. Rand's contributions, whilst the two leading articles in the first two numbers are taken by Mr. Hammatt Billings seriatim, text and illustrations, from Mr. Hughes's "Garden Architecture and Landscape Gardening," a late English work. See p 276

MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

THERE are several very readable articles in this month's Hours at Home. One is by an American missionary to Syria, who appears to show that there are no less than eleven groves of the renowned cedars of Lebanon instead of but one, as has for some time been popularly believed. It is another missionary, we presume, who gives a slight account of Bangkok in "The Land of the White Elephant." He was a man to be envied, we should say: "Once," he tells us, "I called upon a noble, who brought out a large assortment of uncut stones—some of them of great value—and passed them to me as one would a snuff-box, not content till I had helped myself." There is nothing to indicate that such calls on some one of the Siamese nobility might not have been made every day. The little children on the streets are to be seen with no covering except strings of jewels. The teapots and betel-boxes and cigar-cases which the gentry take with them when they walk out for the air, are of gold and silver. And the climate and scenery are delicious and delightful. To say nothing of its grain and drugs and spices, there grow fruits not known to us by name, not dreamed of by Western barbarians—except such of them as have come back from the Venice of Chin India. There the durien grows, which, when one first sees, he runs for disinfectants and chloride of lime, to eat which seems a sacrifice of self-respect, but which, when once it has been tasted, can never be remembered but with thankfulness, and can hardly be foregone. There, also, is the mangostine, of shaded green and purple rind, which, when the knife passes through it, is bright crimson, the inside of which is a pulp, creamy white, half translucent, of a taste as if the sweetest essence of the tropics had been pressed into it.

This feature in the scenery of Siam must be very striking, and we think it has never before been described:

> "But the jungle, with its darkness and its din, had such a beauty as I never have seen equalled, when its myriad fire-flies sparkled thick on every side. I had seen fire-flies before, and had heard of them; but I had never seen or heard, nor have I since then ever seen or heard, of anything like these. The peculiarity of them was not that they were so many, though they were innumerable—not that they were so large, though they were very large—but that they clustered, as by a preconcerted plan, on certain kinds of trees, avoiding carefully all other kinds, and then, as if by signal from some director of the spectacle, they all sent forth their light at once, at simultaneous and exact intervals, so that the whole tree seemed to flash and palpitate with living light. Imagine it. At one instant was blackness of darkness and the croaking jungle. Then suddenly on every side flashed out these fiery trees, the form of each, from topmost twig to outmost bough, set thick with flaming jewels."

Mr. Mitchell, in "De Rebus Ruris," shows how to make railroad cuttings and railroad stations objects of beauty. He would have the companies set apart a little village-green in each town through which they run their tracks, and he is sure that they would reap their reward in the increased growth of the towns and consequent increased profits to themselves as carriers. He would have station-masters compelled to keep little flower-gardens, which, he thinks, and it seems reasonable, might be made sources of profit instead of being chargeable; and, lastly, he urges it upon all owners of estates which abut upon railroads to give up the custom of regarding the trains and track as a nuisance merely, the sight and sound of which are to be shut out as completely as a dead-wall will do it.

The remaining articles are of the usual degree of interest. Dr. Schaff has a paper on Monica, "The Mother of Saint Augustine," and Dr. Bushnell treats of "Non-Intercourse between Worlds" in the second of his articles on "The Moral Uses of Dark Things." More interesting than either of these, or than any of the others, is a translation from the German which gives the great Tischendorf's account of his audience with Pio Nono, when a little while since he sought leave to examine and copy the "Codex Vaticanus," and was but grudgingly assisted in his labors. A story is told, too, of a rebuff which the Holy Father gave the Imperial historian of Cæsar, who wanted a certain volume sent to Paris, and was told he might have a copy of it made for him. Mr. G. M. Towle has a dullish article on the "Great Exposition of 1867," and is quite struck by the fact that the peaceful progress of civilization is to be celebrated in a structure reared on the most famous parade-ground in Europe. Also, there is something about James G. Percival, and there is another of the "Short Sermons to Sunday-school Teachers," which are well received, we suppose, by the subscribers.

The Catholic World borrows two readable articles, of which one is by Lacordaire, in eulogy of Madame de Swetchine, in which may be found some definite information in regard to that person's life, and some very French and very Catholic comments on her and many other things. The other of the two, a better one and worth the price of the magazine, is taken from The Dublin University, and is upon the English literature of the early Middle Ages and the hymns of all Christendom, from the time of Clement, of Alexandria down to the latest mediæval hymnist.

Harper's Magazine has a pictorial article on James Island spiders, and an article which must be called pictorial, we suppose, entitled "The Dodge Club; or Italy in MDCCCLIX." It is one of a million similar things that the coming Paris Exhibition will bring into print. General Strother furnishes the sixth number of his series of "Personal Recollections of the War," which we still praise as being readable and valuable. Independent of the amusement to be had directly from the articles, there is a streak of "Virginianism" in the author which frequently makes the reader smile. Banks's famous retreat employs his pen in this number.

A friend of Mr. A. T. Stewart writes a very brief and scanty sketch of the great merchant's life. It might not, perhaps, have seen the light in print if Mr. Stewart's leave had been asked, but what it tells of him is much to his honor and cannot but have a good effect on the young business men who read it. To know that Mr. Stewart attributes his business success to the fact that from the first his business has been conducted on the basis of truth, will have more effect, we dare say, on the dealers in dry goods than though one should rise from the dead and advise them to honesty. It ought not either to be without effect on them that, once being asked how he would employ his time in case he should retire from business, his answer was "go to school," and this though he is already so much better educated than the majority of his class as to be a good classical scholar.

"How we get our News" is a brief account of the old expresses and newsboats of Courier and Enquirer days, and a clear explanation of the working of the "Associated Press," with all its complicated and costly machinery. The "Editor's Easy Chair" speaks not in praise but with justice of the late Mr. Willis, and has a word or two to say on the Greene-Bancroft controversy; the historian is praised for the best intentions, but the pamphleteer is decided to have the facts on his side of the question, a conclusion in which the literary world seems to have settled down. On the whole, the number is a poor one.

The Atlantic for March, without being a great number, is a very pleasant one. "The Guardian Angel" makes this much of a step in advance this month, that the hero seems to have been brought into sight. Mr. Clement Lindsay is a young man of the artistic temperament, and apparently of fine artistic abilities, who in his early youth—he is, by the way, only nineteen—has fallen in love with a girl, and now has "grown away from her," and is embarrassed by her affection, etc., etc., etc. He rescues Myrtle Hazard from the river, and his former affection will evidently not embarrass him long. There is some pretty writing again in this third batch of chapters. A passage about a clock, in the first instalment we think it was, has since been copied into half the papers in all the States and Territories. For the piece about a river in the eighth chapter now before us we venture to predict like glory and honor. Five weeks from now it will go back to Boston in the Salt Lake City Union Vedette.

Colonel Higginson (he does not write like a colonel), who must be now remembering with longing the February of the Sea Islands, gives us another paper of recollections of his tours of picket duty on Port Royal. We think this the best of the series, if articles so intermittent can be called a series, and the series almost the best thing Mr. Higginson has done. His humor, his fine descriptive powers, and his delicate susceptibility to outside impressions, peculiarly fit him for describing such life as that of a camp of freed negroes doing almost holiday campaigning in a country which is never beautiful, but which in the spring enchants the senses. We venture to say that the colonel has added one syllable to the refrain of the song his soldiers sang along the Shell-road, and that they said "De bell done ring." Mr. Howells is this time perfectly pleasant. Sometimes he is only almost perfectly pleasant; once in a while there is in one of his humorous strokes the least suggestion in the world of straining.

"George Bedillion, Knight," ends pleasantly. "Katherine Morne," we believe, is ended. "My Friend Bingham" is by Henry James, Jr., who in this, as in others of the short stories which he writes so well, shows marked skill in analysis of character and a liking for dwelling upon fine shades of feeling. Particularly he seems to like to dwell upon the complexities of feeling which arise when women and men are thrown into relations with each other not of love simple and direct but of passional attraction, which for one or another reason cannot work freely. His stories are always finished work, and apparently the result of study, or, at any rate, of meditation. Mr. Parton's article on Chicago will draw men westward. The theme is one excellently suited to his tastes and abilities—a city that is the embodiment of the living present, with no past, without traditions, and with abounding and superabounding energy to go in and possess the future. He must have gone to his work of exalting such a community with extreme pleasure. His faculty for clear description and narration, for racy writing, never before showed to greater advantage. This article is enough to send another pang to the hearts of St. Louis and Cincinnati, and the Chicago Board of Trade ought to vote him the freedom of the city. We leave the work of acrimonious criticism to The Gazette and Commercial and the Missouri Republican, being ourselves content with saying that we understand Chicago much better than ever before, and look on it with an admiration not only more intelligent but greater.

The poetry of this number is of rather less than the average merit. There is a pretty sonnet, there is one of Dr. Holmes's very good (there's more than there's good of them, as the Irish say) copies of verse for class gatherings, and a remarkable piece by Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford, about which we will say nothing. Mr. H. B. Sargent, too, has a piece, but it is short.

FOR FRESHMEN AND SUB-FRESHMEN.*

A TUTOR may be a man of genius. But suppose him to be a very commonplace sort of person, by birth an Englishman, born since the second quarter of the century came in, educated at Cambridge, by profession a clergyman of the Establishment—and it is not a hard thing to guess pretty nearly what manner of man he will be and what will be the kind of advice and instruction his pupils will get from him. Of course he will know Latin and Greek more or less thoroughly, and of course he will quote a little—Horace for choice. Almost of course he will be persuaded that the tumult of the human mind about the time of the French Revolution caused the splendid outburst of poetical and philosophical activity which marked the beginning of this century. The chances rather preponderate that he will consider the excesses of the French Revolution the natural reaction from the anti-revolutionary excesses of the aristocracy of France. In his secret heart he is not fond of Martin Luther. Of the poetry of Pope he will remark that it seems to have no feeling for nature, and that natural imagery which had forsaken English poetry in Pope's day was brought back to it by Cowper and Thomson. Lord Macaulay's style he will recommend to his pupils as a model in prose composition. Johnson's style he will pronounce too swelling and labored, and Swift's he will consider far better as being less Latinized and more Anglo-Saxon. Novels, he will say, were once condemned by moralists, but now may be recommended to the attention of the young; and he will observe that in Scott we may find a mine of information relating to feudal times, that Dickens is humorous, and a boy "might spend many an idle hour worse than in the worshipful society of Sam Weller, Mr. Pecksniff," etc., etc.; and that Thackeray is a satirist who writes purer and better English than Dickens, and whose chosen field is Belgravia. India, he will assume, is a providentially prepared school in which Englishmen of good families may learn and practise the arts of war, government, and rising in the world. "American tall-talk" will have a most unpleasant effect on him, and he may be imagined stricken into speechlessness by the presence on his croquet ground of a gentleman from Nevada. The common people he will kindly desire to see prosperous; it is not, however, without a mild satisfaction that he will quote "ignobile pecus," "mobile vulgus," etc. He has read in Burke, and he can make a critical analysis of Mark Antony's speech over the dead body of Cæsar. For some time he has known some geology, and of late he begins to doubt if the British nation possesses much of the critical spirit. He has read Ruskin. Shakespeare is an article of his faith.

* "En Avant, Messieurs! Being a Tutor's Counsel to his Pupils. By the Rev. G. H. D. Mathias, M.A." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1867. 16mo. Pp. 279.

All this Mr. Mathias is and does; and we are not surprised to hear that it was at the suggestion of one of his pupils, who had been profiting by his tutor's advice and instruction, that Mr. Mathias resolved upon publishing this book. The pupil, we dare say, knew best; but we do not feel like giving the volume much commendation; our boys on this side of the water who are old enough to care about the topics of which it treats hardly need help of this elementary character. We speak, however, with some diffidence; there may be freshmen, or boys about entering college, who would be very glad to read it, and for the information of such, and of their parents and guardians, we append a list of the contents. There are three or four chapters addressed to youths who intend leading a military life, the last of them being an account of Sir C. J. Napier, who studied very hard, and did not want to get a position before he fitted himself for it—a piece of common sense so very hard for boys to learn that we feel almost inclined to retract whatever we have said against this volume, for the reason that it does a little towards teaching so valuable a lesson. "Where had I best travel?" is the title of another chapter; "What 's the use of Shakespeare?" "How awfully tedious work is!" "How is one to learn to draw?" "How is one to write an essay?" are the interrogative and exclamatory headings of some more talks. There is an explication of a poem of Tennyson's which a pupil is supposed not to understand, and the remaining topics treated of are "Style" and "English Composition," and "Simile" and "Metaphor," "Novels," "How to make history interesting," "How to give money away," "A little learning not a dangerous thing," and "Hints on the study of Shakespeare." From the article on "Metaphor" we quote what may be called a sample of our tutor's instructions:

> "We might assume, à priori, that Pope and his school knew little enough of the realities of nature from their weak, paltry, and untrue descriptions of it, from their similes borrowed secondhand from greater poets, and so villanously tampered with that you might think they were not describing the works of nature, but of one of 'nature's journeymen.' But with a healthier school a truer style reappears; and from the days of Cowper, Burns, and Goldsmith to Wordsworth and Tennyson, there have never been wanting men who penetrated within the sanctuary of nature, and preached aloud the glorious lessons therein learnt, on the temple steps, to the multitude outside."

IMPROVEMENTS IN SHORT-HAND.*

PHONOGRAPHY is growing towards perfect development by the slow, somewhat illogical, but on the whole practical and convenient process of aggregation. It was invented by Isaac Pitman, thirty years ago; that is, he was the first stenographer who had the boldness and acumen to reject entirely the Roman alphabet as inadequate to represent the sounds of the English language, and, giving up the attempt stenographically to represent letters and spelling, was content to express sounds and speaking. But his "Stenographic Sound-Hand," as it was called at first, was no sooner offered as a substitute for the old short-hand which had troubled David Copperfield so much, than it was at once snatched by hundreds of reporters in England and in America, who began to work it hard in its then imperfect state. Of course every person who mastered the art felt its imperfections, and saw or thought he saw ways of improving it. Suggestions of such improvements were offered by thousands. Phonographic journals and magazines were established, both here and in England, having little other object than the publication and preservation of such suggestions. Of course the great majority of the changes proposed were found impracticable or useless. The comparatively few which have prevailed have received the endorsement of practising phonographers and have borne the test of use. Mr. Pitman, for his part, has lent his own aid to the work, and has generally shown great good judgment by accepting necessary modifications of his system. Some, however, of the changes, which if not generally adopted are at least not yet wholly abandoned and forgotten, are of very doubtful value. Even Mr. Pitman's authority has been given to one or two modifications which seem more troublesome than useful; as, for instance, the modified system of phonographic writing known as the "Corresponding Style." Confessedly less accurate and practical than the common "Reporting Style," it is recommended to learners as an easy way to use phonography a little. It is, as might have been expected, of very little use to those it is meant for, who, indeed, do not employ phonography to any appreciable extent; and to any one trying to learn the whole art this half-way house is a troublesome stopping place, harder to get away from than it is to pass by.

Mr. Munson's book takes no notice of this make-shift corresponding style, but treats phonography as one system; as a difficult art, which, however, can be learned in a reasonable time by any one who sets himself to it as to a task. His book declares itself to be in the interest of reporters—that is, of professors of this art, and of those who intend to make it their business. And as, if one would learn any art right, he should learn it as it is taught to those who are to live by it, so if anybody wants to understand phonography thoroughly and be at home in it for ever, he had better, we think, study this hand-book carefully, and base his knowledge upon it. It deals with its subject in a thoroughly accurate, formal, professional way, presenting its different sides in their order, teaching the art first, and afterward explaining its practical uses. The arrangement of the book is very simple and logical. One proposition after another is taken up and clearly demonstrated. Nearly everything is thought of at the right moment; the difficulties stated and made easy, the exceptions fully described, and the possible misconceptions prevented. The distinction is carefully marked between the full and regular phonographic writing, and the various modifications which are often necessary or convenient in reporting; as, for instance, the distinction between vocalized phonography and the consonant outline used without vowel signs. The suggested aids to clearness of reading are explained to be suggestions only; hints that may be worth taking: as, for instance, the "shading" or thickening of the S circle to represent Z; the arbitrary methods sometimes employed to distinguish readily between words of nearly the same outline, and the like. The importance of constant practice in reading as well as writing the phonographs is strongly urged. The book, in fact, deserves very high praise for its workmanlike character. We give especial attention to school-books, as the readers of THE NATION know, and eagerly watch for the few tolerably good ones and the very few excellent among the mob of books that are written with ease. We can answer for it that the good qualities which we have named as prominent in Mr. Munson's book are exceedingly rare among school-books.

The book is an interesting essay on phonetics, as well as a text-book of short-hand. The demonstration of the way in which spelling may be wholly abandoned, and the actual sounds of the voice represented by written characters exactly equivalent to them, is clearer, we think, than in any text-book of the English language with which we are acquainted. In this respect, however, the book is far from complete. The "Phonographic Analysis" might be made much fuller; and it would be well if it could be completed, whether in connection with the subject of short-hand or separately. It is probably as elaborate as need be for the part it has in this book.

The book seems to make no claim to originality except in the matter of reducing phonography to uniformity in practice. It is of the utmost importance that all reporters and others who use sound-writing should be able to read each other's notes with facility. In the pursuit of this much-needed uniformity of practice, Mr. Munson has not hesitated to reject some abbreviations and quick ways of writing this or that phrase, on the ground that phonography needs not greater speed, but more perfect legibility and uniformity by all persons who use it.

Following the chapters on the art itself are chapters on many subjects connected with the reporter's duties—preparing copy and reading proof; on reporting in general, its ways and needs and tools; on law reporting, with the general principles and the New York practice described at length, a most excellent chapter; and on newspaper reporting. A long appendix contains very carefully prepared writing exercises, which show a great amount of research and a good knowledge of the phonetics of the English language. Finally, there are phonographic reading exercises, which are the writing exercises written in the phonographic character; these are very neatly engraved, and are a good guide to the student in forming a neat and legible phonographic hand.

"The Complete Phonographer" embodies a great deal of labor and care, the judicious application of which is highly to be commended, and will diminish the labor of students in the future. It is by far the best book on phonography that exists, and really establishes that which heretofore has been only a name with very little behind it—the "American Standard System."

DANGEROUS PRECEDENTS.

THE declaration of martial law over one-third of the inhabited portion of the Union at a time of nominal peace, and when there is certainly no organized military opposition to the Government, must be admitted to be a severe measure, and a precedent which may hereafter be used to justify the grossest usurpation. Some future Congress may seize the opportunity afforded by a slight and purely local outbreak to crush a disagreeable State government, and subject the people to martial law; referring to the acts of the Thirty-ninth Congress as a sufficient justification of its course. Not that such a course is really justified by the present action of Congress, which is taken to abate the evils arising out of an insurrection of almost unparalleled magnitude; but that, as we all know, precedents are strained and bent without scruple when factious interests so require.

We recognize these dangers of the future as fully as do any opponents of the measure just passed. We should have been glad, had it been possible, that the entire process of reconstruction should have been wrought out by civil law, the army being used exclusively as a substitute for the posse comitatus. But, notwithstanding all this, we have approved of the action of Congress upon this bill because of the peculiar circumstances of the case, which seem to leave no option except between measures all dangerous, and all in some respects unsatisfactory.

A slight review of existing facts will convince any reasonable man that it is impossible for Congress either to act, or to refrain from acting, without establishing a precedent of more or less danger. If it does not interfere with the South, the result is that ten State governments will remain in permanent operation which were founded by the military orders of the President, issued through and enforced by "provisional governors"—officers wholly unknown to the law, appointed without the consent of the Senate, and vested with absolute power. By an Executive order, two-thirds of the male citizens of full age in these States were excluded from all voice in the formation of the governments under which they were to live. The elections were conducted by officers appointed by the provisional governors, and the results decided by these governors. How flagrantly unconstitutional was the appointment of these governors themselves no one surely can need to be convinced. They were not officers of the army, detailed to preserve order within its lines. They were civilians, appointed to perform civil duties. No law authorized such appointments; and the President had as much right to appoint a pacha of Egypt, and pay his salary from the national Treasury, as to appoint and pay a civilian as provisional governor of Mississippi. The names of the governors were never even submitted to the Senate. In short, no single step was taken toward giving their appointment a pretence of legality. Yet they, under the direction of the President, exercised all the powers of governors and legislatures combined, and had, if they did not actually exercise, the power to mould the future government of their State at their will.

Grant, as we do, that these powers were used with fair intentions, and with a desire to do substantial justice. Grant, as we do not, that no one was wrongfully excluded from voting at the elections thus held. Grant anything that may be honestly claimed; and yet the precedent is one fatal to republican institutions, if allowed to stand unchallenged. Forty thousand officers were, it is said, appointed by these usurping governors, whose very office was a nullity, and their title not merely voidable, but absolutely void. Of what value are constitutional checks, of what use are legislatures, if the Executive shall be sustained in organizing ten governments over 8,000,000 of people, and in appointing 40,000 officers to govern them, without a shred of law to warrant his action? What if they did act uprightly? Is it to be supposed that officers illegally appointed will always be honest and faithful? If such a supposition is to be entertained, and is to justify acts so utterly unlawful as these, our republican government will run into mere Cæsarism within ten years.

This is the precedent which Congress would establish by inaction. The governments thus brought into existence, having the support of nearly all the classes within their respective States accustomed to political power and to the use of arms, could for ever keep down the unorganized and helpless majority. And as some government must exist in every State, and every attempt to establish different governments would be promptly crushed, after the fashion of New Orleans, the courts would be compelled to recognize the governments thus founded upon acknowledged, flagrant, undisguised usurpation as having, nevertheless, ripened from governments de facto into governments de jure.

If it is said that Congress should take less stringent action than it has done, we reply that, as far as the constitutionality of such action is concerned, Congress has a right to act upon the theory that nothing has been done toward restoring civil government since the Southern armies surrendered, and may do now whatever it could have done in May, 1865; and that as far as expediency is concerned, it is expedient and essential that severe and peremptory measures should be taken to break down usurpations which have been allowed to exist too long, and have of course gained strength by delay. Ordinary civil process would not suffice to cope with the evil. It would be subject to interminable delays and loaded with technical difficulties. This, we admit, would not be a sufficient reason for abandoning the ordinary process of law in dealing with an ordinary civil government. But Mr. Johnson's creations are the children of military rule, and may very properly be destroyed by the species of law to which they owed their existence. Military usurpations are legitimately dealt with by martial law.

Between the two precedents of reconstruction—both by the exercise of military power, used, however, in the one case under the authority and restraint of civil law, and in the other case in utter disregard and defiance of law—our choice is made without hesitation. A despotism which claims its origin from a statute cannot, with any grace, assert its right to exist after the repeal of the statute; but one which springs from the will of a single man and is checked or amplified by his uncontrolled decisions, is capable of indefinite extension and continuance. We shall seek, as far as may be possible, to limit the scope and duration of military rule; but since it was unavoidable that it should exist under some conditions, we prefer it as enacted by Congress rather than as established by the President.

We have heretofore spoken of the evil influence of legalized disorder and oppression, such as we believe to exist in the South. The unavenged massacre at New Orleans, the applauded murders of Union soldiers in Georgia, the boasted "disappearance" of Northern men from Texas, the atrocious acquittal of Dr. Watson in Virginia, are but examples of a state of affairs constituting a precedent more damaging to republican government than any period of temporary military rule can be. The use of armed force to break up such monstrosities is no more inconsistent with republican institutions than is the use of the Italian army to break up Neapolitan brigandage inconsistent with constitutional government. The more thoroughly the work is done, the sooner can the ordinary forms of law be restored and the States be left to govern themselves, as we shall rejoice to see them do.

THE DUTY OF IMPEACHMENT.

WE print on another page a letter controverting our opinions on the impeachment question in a style in which we are always glad to have our opinions on any subject controverted, and urging forcibly a view of the duty of Congress in this matter which is somewhat novel, and which we admit to be deserving of attention. The advocates of impeachment have hitherto rested all their claims to a hearing upon expediency. They showed that Mr. Johnson was an "obstacle," which nobody denied; and they tried to show that he had committed certain offences which not only deserved impeachment, but which would ensure his conviction and removal; but none of them, so far as we know, has taken "H. F. B.'s" ground, that we are bound to impeach him as a moral duty, whether he can be convicted or not. "H. F. B." seems to be under the impression that we have opposed the movement solely or mainly from the fear that it would have an injurious effect on the trade and finances of the country. This is, however, a mistake. We have spoken of the probable effect of an impeachment upon business as one of the reasons for avoiding it, but not either as the only one or the principal one. Our principal reasons for not wishing to see an impeachment attempted were and are, that we do not think a legal conviction upon any of the charges which Mr. Ashley, General Butler, or Wendell Phillips have as yet seen fit to bring forward is at all likely. All the "usurpations" of which Mr. Johnson has been guilty consist, unfortunately, in the abuse of powers to which, in our opinion, he had no title, but which those who now clamor most loudly for impeachment would have been very well content to see him exercise had he exercised them differently. In other words, the charge made against him is not that he usurped, but that he usurped for a wrong purpose. His performances in connection with the New Orleans massacre were undoubtedly atrocious; but we have yet to hear of a particle of legal evidence of his complicity in the designs of Mayor Monroe and his fellow-cutthroats. Removal from office for political opinions is, in our opinion, a grave offence; but it is an offence which all parties have encouraged or condoned. Mr. Johnson's guilt under this head really consists not in his having made political opinions a test of fitness for office, but in his having deserted his party. Had he removed officials for not agreeing with Thaddeus Stevens, the offence against political morality would have been, we admit, less heinous; but it would have been still an offence, and yet it would have called forth no reprehension whatever. The desertion of his party by the President is not, however, a high crime or misdemeanor.

As to his bad language, we doubt if anybody was more shocked and disgusted by it than we were ourselves, but there must be a great reform in this particular amongst politicians before bad language will be regarded as a fit subject for judicial punishment. There would be something very laughable in the trial of Andrew Johnson for foul-mouthed abuse, when such a master of vituperation as Parson Brownlow was received with all the honors on the floor of the House. It has been hinted, though not openly charged, that Mr. Johnson has also sold pardons and offices for money, and done worse things. Here is a distinct and positive offence for which no justification or palliation can be found, either in the politician's code of morals or that of anybody else. Let anybody produce conclusive legal evidence of this or of anything like it, and we should urge a trial eagerly, and the trial would not last half a day; but we have not yet heard that the promoters of the impeachment have any such proof in existence. The charges they bring forward are vague, indefinite, difficult of proof, and rest, in many instances, on doubtful points of constitutional law. The trial of them might last two years and would probably fail in the end. It would not be regarded by either the country or the world as a judicial process, but as a piece of party warfare. In fact, General Butler and Wendell Phillips have done all in their power to prevent its being so regarded, as they have devoted themselves almost exclusively to showing not that Mr. Johnson was a criminal whom it was a duty to punish, but that he was a political "obstacle" which it was desirable to remove.

In considering the propriety, however, of treating him as an "obstacle," we must bear in mind that since the commission of all the offences for which it is sought to put him on his trial—since his usurpations and bad language, his conduct has been submitted to the people of the North, and at least three-eighths of them have approved of it, and consider him an obstacle which ought not to be removed. These three-eighths are very slightly represented in Congress or the State legislatures, and we are, therefore, in discussing what ought to be done with Mr. Johnson, apt to lose sight of their feelings and opinions. They would all think the impeachment a mere piece of party warfare, and would look on him as a martyr if he were condemned on any charge now before the public. Of course the talk of armed resistance to the impeachment is all twaddle. It would be submitted to just as certainly as any other measure of Congress. His supporters at the North would not commit the supreme folly of rebelling on his behalf. What they would do would be to pay us back in our own coin whenever they got a chance. The first time the Democratic party found itself in a majority in the House—and it may find itself in a majority within the next five years, even if the Republican party succeeds in electing the next President—it would endeavor to get rid of the President by following out General Butler's programme, by getting up a string of charges against him, the soundness of which would not be of the smallest consequence if the precedent of suspension during trial were once established. The charges being preferred, out he would go, and this being all that was wanted, the proceedings would be allowed to run on for an indefinite period, and might at last be dropped. For instance, in the Congress of 1861 there would have been a strong majority against Mr. Lincoln had the South staid in the Union, and to this majority he was intensely obnoxious. How easy it would have been for the secessionist leaders under this new rule, instead of rebelling, to have impeached and deposed him, and thus having got the army and navy into their hands, to have let the trial drag on indefinitely. In short, we doubt if anybody has looked carefully at this matter of impeachment, as now presented to us, without seeing that it opens up a long vista of disorder if not of revolution, compared with which any present derangement of trade or commerce, or even the prolongation of Mr. Johnson's power for another year or two, is a mere trifle.

That we must regard the offences charged against him as standing in the same category as murder and arson, and which therefore we are bound to try to punish, no matter what the consequences may be, we consider, with all respect to our correspondent, a very wild doctrine. These offences are not mala in se. They are not acts on the criminality of which the civilized world is agreed, and therefore the question of prosecuting him for them is a simple question of expediency, just as the question of trying Southern privateers was, or as the question of trying Southern traitors is, or as the question of prosecuting the Fenians was. Offences against any political community—quâ political community—that community has a right to overlook if it pleases, or if it thinks it more advantageous to do so; a right which, let us add, we have never before heard disputed. Fifty years hence, to adopt "H. F. B.'s" illustration, we do not think this passage would read so very badly in American history:

> "In the year 1865, Andrew Johnson, a man who had been distinguished before the war as a truculent pro-slavery Democrat, illiterate, vulgar, and passionate, but who, during the struggle, had rendered great services to the Union in Tennessee, was nominated by the Republican party for the Vice-Presidency, though hardly anybody in the convention knew anything whatever of his real character. This was done simply as a compliment to the Union men of Tennessee, and without the remotest expectation that he would ever exercise any greater influence on legislation than falls to the lot of the President of the Senate. He was, however, unexpectedly raised to the Presidency by the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, and many prominent men of the party at once set to work to make the best of it by lauding him to the skies as a better man than Mr. Lincoln, as a man of sterner mould and stronger mind, and fiercer zeal for liberty, who would punish traitors righteously and let the oppressed go free; and they urged him with might and main to use all the powers he could get hold of, doubtful and not doubtful, for this purpose. His not very wise head being turned by this applause, and muddled by stronger things than applause, he proceeded not only to use all those powers which the country had foolishly permitted him to assume, but to use them in defence of the principles which he had nearly all his life defended, and for the protection of the men with whom he had nearly all his life acted. He broke his pledges, prostituted the public service, betrayed the freedmen, abused the pardoning power, and disgraced his office by his vituperation; but, nevertheless, nearly half of the Northern people and the whole of the Southern people stood by him, some from political sympathy and some because they believed it better to bear with him than try to remove him, his term of office having half expired, and there being a sufficient majority in Congress to legislate over his head. Congress considered gravely the propriety of impeaching him, and were strongly urged to do so by about half of the Republican party, including many of its ablest and most upright members; but, in view of the uncertainty of a conviction, the vagueness of the charges, and of the danger of seeming to convert impeachment into an instrument of party warfare, they refrained. At the same time, they determined to change the character of their legislation, and forthwith framed a plan of reorganization of the South, to take effect at a certain fixed date and based on principles of justice and equality, in which certain well-defined duties were imposed on the President, amongst others that of preserving order by military force, and resolved that the failure to perform these duties should be visited by instant punishment."

ENGLAND.

LONDON, Feb. 8, 1867.

THE dearth of politically interesting topics is coming to an end. Parliament was opened last Monday, and the various questions which have for the last few months been more or less dormant will soon wake into fresh life under the stimulus of personal discussion. The usual ceremony took place with its usual accompaniments. A steady down-pour of London rain rather spoilt the outside show of heavy state carriages and running footmen and heralds and beef-eaters and life-guardsmen, and all the rather cumbrous pageantry of a royal procession, but scarcely damped the ardor of the huge crowd which welcomed the appearance of the Queen. Within the House of Lords the sight was as grand as usual. Penny-a-liners found ample scope for their powers of description in the splendid costumes of peers and peeresses and ambassadors and Indian princes collected in the noble chamber of the Upper House. The usual comic incidents took place of a disorderly rush to the bar of members of the House of Commons, struggling, pushing, and squeezing like a pack of school-boys. The speech was delivered in the same form as last year; that is, the Queen did not read it herself, nor did she put on her state robes, and the trumpeters did not perform the flourish which used to greet her during the lifetime of the Prince Consort. The Lord Chancellor, who is a man of impressive appearance, read the speech standing by the side of the Queen, and the curiosity of the public was doubtless as well satisfied as if it had come from the lips of her Majesty herself. It has seldom been listened to with more interest. The main result, so far as it indicates the probable policy of ministers, seems to be as follows: The Government promise to do something about Reform; what that something is remains studiously vague until Monday next, when Mr. Disraeli will show his cards. The absence of any direct mention of a bill seems to make it likely that some temporizing course may be adopted—the most probable suggestion being, perhaps, that it will be proposed to proceed by resolutions, and thus to defer the final settlement for a session. Meanwhile it is premature to speculate, and we are only treated to the rather vague information that it is meant to extend the franchise and yet not to alter the balance of power—as if the balance of power was not the very thing that requires alteration. The plan of government is, however, to bribe off opponents by offering a large instalment of practical reforms; and there can be no doubt that such reforms are urgently needed, and, if satisfactory measures are proposed, would go far to justify a delay in electoral reform. Thus, we are promised some sort of legislation with regard to army reform, trades unions, the extension of the educational provisions of factory acts, the condition of the mercantile marine, the management of hospitals in workhouses, the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and various branches of commercial law. We are also told that the outstanding difficulties with the United States are to be satisfactorily settled. If any really efficient measures are passed upon all or any number of these various matters, the session will certainly not have been wasted. Very little discussion took place. The only opposition speeches came from the leaders in the two Houses, Lord Russell and Mr. Gladstone, and showed a curious contrast. Lord Russell has terribly fallen off from the Lord John of old days. He was querulous and impolitic. He went into the old story of which every one but himself is heartily tired, of the history of the various measures of reform that have broken down since 1832, and laid the whole blame upon the tergiversations of the Conservative party, though everybody knows that the insincerity of his own Whig cabinets had at least as much to do with it. He showed himself anxious to find fault, and found it in a quibbling and captious spirit. In fact, his speech was at once thin and sour, and suitable to a disappointed politician. Mr. Gladstone, on the other hand, spoke with characteristic generosity of his opponents, and promised to help them if they would deal straightforwardly with the questions concerned—a promise which I sincerely hope that circumstances may enable him to keep. The contrast between the two speakers suggests one great difficulty of the Liberal party. In the country at large, Mr. Gladstone is at present indisputably the most popular of our public men. He has a hold upon the public favor far stronger, for example, than that of Mr. Bright, who appeals to a smaller and perhaps more narrow-minded class. No one outside the House can doubt for a moment that Mr. Gladstone ought to be the leader whom all true Liberals should support. His great talents, thorough cultivation, and high character should lift him a head and shoulders above all his followers. Yet in the House of Commons all this is reversed. He is personally unpopular; by the Conservatives he is hated rancorously; by his own side he is followed with, at best, a hesitating allegiance; and I believe that if a leader were to be selected by ballot, some insignificant nobleman, such as Lord Granville, would be chosen, and Mr. Gladstone put in a secondary position to a man infinitely his inferior. The reasons for this are various. In the first place, there is the most presentable reason, that he is not quite trustworthy politically. He has a High Church view, which makes him unsound upon all such questions as the complete throwing open of the universities to Dissenters. Then he is a man of impulsive and almost feminine temperament, which makes him at times say more than he means, and deprives him of the coolness necessary for leadership in political as in military struggles. This is interpreted by his enemies into insincerity, though I believe that there is no more honest politician in the country; he has, however, the impulsiveness and versatility which it is easy to confound with a want of honesty. Again, he is said to be bad-tempered and arrogant—a charge which, so far as it is true, seems to me to be as much the consequence as the cause of dislike. In his position as leader last session he was subject to incessant attacks and browbeating, which it would have required the temper of an angel to support. Lord Cranbourne, who has as bitter a tongue as most people, compared him one day, in a speech, to a pettifogging attorney. The Tories applauded. Next day Lord Cranbourne apologized—to the attorneys of England. This insolent, but not very witty, insult to one who is indisputably amongst our first statesmen—if not our very first—was received with fresh applause, a fact which pretty well indicates the temper of the Tory party. This bitter hostility is, in part, due to another cause. Mr. Gladstone is hated not merely because he is said to be arrogant, but because the great Whig families think him an arrogant plebeian. They cannot bear to be led by a man who has no connection with the traditional leaders of their party, and they would rather have some insignificant King Log to rule over them than one whom they regard with a jealousy proportioned to his talents. Consequently, it is highly probable that there will be considerable difficulties in the way of forming the next Liberal administration, if not in the successful conduct of opposition even before they have to quarrel over the hostile spoils.

To turn from political questions, where, if we may prognosticate a coming storm, it is yet premature to guess at its precise violence and direction. Another interesting topic is reviving. Warrants were obtained yesterday against Colonel Nelson and Mr. Brand, and it is understood that Governor Eyre will attend when required. Their trial for the Jamaica outrages will commence immediately, and will doubtless stir the public mind more deeply than ever. The vehement party feelings which were excited by the American rebellion seem to have been all transferred to this narrow question, and it is scarcely possible to mention Governor Eyre's name at a London dinner-table without producing a storm. Opinions are very much divided as to the probable result of the measure, and The Times is consequently endeavoring, with its usual policy, to take both sides. The cases against Colonel Nelson and Mr. Brand (whose discussion with Mr. Buxton on this subject led to his dismissal from the royal navy) are said to be very strong; but there are many legal difficulties in the way of a conviction.

I think that your readers will thank me for calling their attention to a very interesting address which has just been delivered by Mr. Mill to the students of St. Andrews University. Like the other Scotch universities, the students have the privilege of electing a lord rector, whose office is now strictly confined to the delivery of an inaugural address; it might be well if some other official functions were equally curtailed. You may remember that Mr. Carlyle was elected not long ago to a similar office at Edinburgh, and addressed the students with that mixture of grave and humorous wisdom of which he is peculiarly capable when not distracted by the interference of some of his pet prejudices. It was chiefly attractive for the personal interest with which we could not but accept the words of a literary veteran expounding to young men the lessons of a laborious life. It is equally characteristic of Mr. Mill that his address was singularly free from any personal coloring. It was calm, dispassionate, and full-minded, and treated of the higher branches of education with a philosophic breadth very unusual in an English treatment of the subject. The curiously cramped and special system of our university course generally narrows, in a very marked way, our English discourses upon education. It seems to be forgotten that there are any possible subjects of training except classics and mathematics, or that they can be regarded from any but the traditional point of view. It is Mr. Mill's peculiar merit to rise above such a narrow treatment, and while doing full justice to the English system and to his most bitter opponents, to rise to a philosophical conception of the whole subject. He spoke kindly of our universities whilst condemning their deficiencies, and spoke with special respect of his opponents both in metaphysical and religious questions. This return to a calmer region of discussion is gratifying to those who think (as I do not) that he has been somewhat spoilt by entering the embittering arena of practical politics.

Personally, the contrast between Mr. Mill and Mr. Carlyle is almost as characteristic as their literary differences. Mr. Carlyle's writings almost require for a full appreciation that we should remember his picturesque appearance and his singular broad Scotch drawl. Mr. Mill's appearance, on the other hand, detracts, if anything, from the value of his spoken word. He looks so slight and frail, his voice is so feeble and requires so much attention, and his manner is so nervously rapid, that one feels at first alarmed lest he should suddenly break down. The impression is heightened—at least in the House of Commons—by an odd habit of completely stopping for intervals of a moment or two, and putting his hand before his face to collect his thoughts. After listening for a time to the completely finished and connected sentences which come in a steady stream from his lips between these interruptions, we gradually recover confidence, but it is an exhibition never quite comfortable or satisfactory.

PARIS, Feb. 1, 1867.

THE snow and ice of the last fortnight have greatly rejoiced the hearts of the Russian and American colonists of this city, and those of the rest of the human beings here resident who pay the homage of their liking to the frost-powers of the North. The lakes in the public promenades have been covered with skaters, the most fashionable being the "reserved" pool behind the pretty villa of our wonderful Prefect, at the northwest extremity of the Bois de Boulogne, honored by the patronage and skates of the court, and only to be entered on payment of a napoleon. On that favored sheet of ice his Majesty has passed some hours nearly every day, skating with a vigor and agility that might be envied by many a younger man, and thus giving the most effectual contradiction to the multitude of rumors that are constantly declaring him to be the prey of no end of maladies, and within an inch or two of the end of his mortal tether. The Empress, who is gradually surmounting her fear of the treacherous surface that played her so false at Chamouni, has also been a good deal on the ice, sometimes accompanied by a couple of the gentlemen of the court, sometimes accepting the arm of one or other of the well-known American ladies whose skating skill is believed to have served them as a passport to the Imperial good graces. On the ice the ladies wear short, appropriate garments, richly trimmed with fur, and often the result of a vast deal of meditation and a corresponding pecuniary outlay; and even those for whom the beauties and amusements of winter are absolutely devoid of charm are fain to admit that the scene presented by the lake in question, about three or four in the afternoon of a frosty day, covered with the gay dresses of the fashionable skaters, and enlivened by their rapid movements, may well be enjoyed by the favored mortals capable of appreciating it. The great night fête which the Skaters' Club has been longing to give ever since it came into existence came off on Thursday last. The reserved portion of the lake was surrounded by festoons of great white globes, looking like illuminated Brobdingnagian pearls; the club-house and a number of temporary pavilions were brilliantly illuminated, and a lavish display of electric lights and colored lamps and flowers made the whole scene as light as day and as gay as a fairy ballet. The ice was covered with gayly-dressed skaters and a number of the pretty sleds that have so much excited the curiosity and admiration of the Parisians during the past fortnight. Abundant refreshments were provided in the pavilions, and the fête, at which were present all the sommités of the court and the gay world (with the exception of the Imperial family, none of whom were there), was kept up with great éclat from nine o'clock to near midnight. The club, however, was but just in time, for a thaw came on next day, the rise in our capricious thermometer being so sudden as to have come very near causing a catastrophe similar to that which has just plunged London into mourning. The keepers of the Bois, perceiving how rapidly the ice was changing, gave repeated warnings to the people on the favored pond, but without effect, the skaters persisting in continuing their evolutions. Suddenly the ice gave way, and all upon it found themselves in the water. The keepers appear to have acted with great promptitude and judgment. They immediately cut down a number of young trees, tore up the long wires of a part of the palings, and with these materials and the aid of a number of those who had been looking on, constructed a raft, with the aid of which the drowning skaters were speedily rescued. It is believed that no life was lost by the accident.

A number of elegant sleds, principally Russian, of fantastic fashion and drawn by small, high-stepping Russian ponies, very spirited and fleet, made their appearance here during the frost which has just ended, and during the same period Queen Victoria, at Windsor, had several drives about the park in a sled for the first time in her royal life. Such masses of snow have recently fallen both in England and throughout Europe that severe floods seem inevitable. As for this city, it is transformed into a lake of mud that all the sweepers, mechanical and human, seem unable to clean.

Paris is, nevertheless, unusually gay. A great number of foreigners have already arrived, and are outshining the rest of the world in the brilliant extravagances so much in vogue here. One of these new arrivals, Prince Nariskine, possessor of one of the great fortunes which have caused the Russian nobility to be received through Europe as the modern representatives of Aladdins and Fortunatuses, happening to dine a few evenings since with a friend who has built for himself a small but most elegant and charming hotel, fitted up with all the appliances of fashionable luxury, was struck by the form of the surtout, in silver, which occupied the centre of the table. Having expressed his admiration of it as a work of art, he was surprised to find that his host seemed to hold it in slight esteem. "If you care so little about it, why not sell it to me?" said Prince Nariskine.

"The centre-piece matches all the rest of the silver," returned Count D., "and I can't sell it to you unless you buy the rest of the service."

"Very good, I'll buy the whole of it," responded the prince.

"But if you want the silver, you must take the china also," said the count.

"Very good. I'll buy the china also," replied the prince.

"I can't sell you the china unless you buy the table and chairs," said the count.

"I'll buy all the furniture of the room!" cried the prince.

But the furniture could not be sold without the house, nor the house without the stable, nor the stable without the horses, harnesses, and carriages, and all these, one after the other, the prince declared himself ready to buy, but on one condition.

"Name it," said the count.

"It is that if I make this purchase the transfer shall be effected this very evening, so that I may have the pleasure of sleeping to-night in my new purchase, and in your bed."

"I accept your condition," replied the count, who, having sent for his steward, gave orders for the immediate removal of his wardrobe and personal effects, and the preparation of his bedroom for the reception of the new master. The steward was then ordered to produce the plans and bills of the architect who had constructed the hotel, the inventories of furniture, etc., and the receipts of the dealers of whom the various classes of purchases had been made; and after the prince had gone through these, and had agreed with the count to purchase the whole for 400,000 f., a regular bill of sale was drawn up and duly signed, and the prince, drawing a roll of bank-notes from his pocket, counted out the amount fixed upon, and handed it to his friend across the dinner-table, which neither of them had quitted for an instant during the progress of this eccentric proceeding. The two gentlemen then took a cup of coffee together, the prince doing the honors of the house now become his own by pressing his guest to "take a second cup," and the count, after an hour's chat with the prince, took his leave, and went off to the rooms he had caused to be taken for him at a neighboring inn.

The fashionable whirl of the present season may be considered as fairly begun. The first of the four state balls of each winter has just taken place at the Tuileries with the usual splendor, cram, crush, and tattering of ladies' finery by rival crinolines, and by the swords, epaulettes, and spurs of the numerous representatives of the military element. And here a regard for truth compels the reluctant admission that, if crinolines are worn (as they are) a good deal smaller, the inordinate length of train now sported at evening parties (with the aid of the "water-cart" addition fully described in a former letter) fully compensates for any little gain in the diminution of circumference. At the ball in question, the Empress wore a "lovely" dress of white silk, trimmed all over with leaves, and covered with a vaporous upper skirt of transparent tulle, a broad, green velvet sash, and such a quantity of diamonds—coronet, ear-rings, necklace, bracelets, fringes, stars, etc.—to say nothing of the "dew-drops" on the innumerable leaves of the dress, that she seemed to be in a general state of glitter. Princess Metternich, always eccentric, though her eccentricity is always that of the grande dame, wore a very original robe of cherry-colored silk, trimmed with large white flowers; no jewels, but a queer necklace, composed of what looked like silver filings, strung on a sort of chain, and with a large silver star in the middle; she wore, also, as usual, depending from her back hair, the two immensely long narrow ribbons which, in their native England, are popularly known as "Follow-me-lads," and which, being accidentally stepped upon by a gentleman at one of last winter's embassy balls, just as she had passed him on her way to another room, came within an inch of breaking her neck. Madame Korsakow, one of the most conspicuous of the gay ladies of the court circle, wore a dress of pearl-gray silk, the train of which may, without exaggeration, be set down as almost three yards in length! This formidable appendage was covered with a mass of silver blonde, looped up with yellow roses, the body of the dress was a sautoir of green velvet, coming down very low, and finished off behind with a large bow; a belt composed entirely of magnificent emeralds, of the size of hens' eggs; and in her hair her famous bird of Paradise (the body of which is made up of rubies, emeralds, topazes, etc., its tail of long rays of gold being set with diamonds), perched on the top of her head, and the long, spreading tail hanging down over her cloud of "back hair," a very splendid ornament, but neither pretty nor becoming.

The intrepid American amazon, Miss Menken, has had another and more serious fall on the scene of her triumphs. It was said that she had broken two fingers and dislocated an ankle; but as she is advertised to appear this evening, the reports in question were evidently exaggerated. M. Ponsard is seriously ill; M. Angier also; the rehearsals of the new plays of both these popular dramatists being delayed in consequence. The irascibility of the press has received a fresh illustration in the arrival of a sort of collective cartel, addressed by the writers of an Italian journal to the writers of one of the journals of this city, a recent article in whose columns was considered by their Italian challengers as intended for their paper. The monstrous absurdity of two entire staffs of newspaper writers travelling to some point half-way between Paris and Florence for the purpose of mutual extermination, is rather too much even for the pepper-eaters of this duelling region; and several writers of weight, with Emile de Girardin at their head, have begun an attack upon the barbarism of the so-called "code of honor" that may perhaps do something towards its abolition. Lieutenant Lecca, whose fatal duel with young Séguin under a street lamp, at three in the morning, after a night spent in the orgies too common among the rising generation of this refined and sensible city, created so intense a sensation here a couple of months ago, has just been tried by a military court. The trial has been conducted in secret, and no details of the affair have been allowed to transpire; but as the young officer is merely removed from active service and placed on the retired list, it is probable that the existence of "attenuating circumstances" has been attested to the satisfaction of the court.

The famous club of twelve "delicate eaters," which meets every week at the Maison Dorée, under the auspices of Baron Brisse, paying forty francs per head for its dinner, has led, by way of protest against the progressive extravagance of modern habits, to the formation among some of the leading artists and literary men of a "Leg-of-Mutton Club," the twelve "illustrations" who compose it meeting once a week in peasant garb, wooden shoes, and woollen night-cap. At the inauguration dinner, which came off a few days ago, the fare consisted of cabbage soup, stewed beans, roast leg of mutton, salad, cheese, and apples. Each element of the repast was a perfection in its way; and the dinner, which was as merry as frugal, was regarded by all the club as a brilliant success. The Emperor, in his usual quiet and effectual way of supplying a social want and setting a practical example, has just opened, at his own expense and under the patronage of the Prince Imperial, six new eating-houses for poor workmen, in addition to the many already established by him from his own purse, in which the poor can purchase for one sou a pint of meat soup, or half a pound of cooked meat, or a pint of a certain savory mixture of stewed rice, beans, and peas, much in favor with the public for whom it is prepared.

Correspondence.

CLASSICAL AND SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Our colleges have long enjoyed a monopoly of sacredness. Affirmations that had seemed axioms have been questioned; the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence have been put on the defensive; the foundations of faith have been subjected to enquiry; but the American college, its course of study, its corporation, its degrees, and its discipline, have all been taken for granted.

The American public, usually so shrewd in its investments, when asked to endow colleges has given sometimes liberally, sometimes grudgingly, but has never asked a question as to what use was to be made of the money. The popular faith in the college has been as implicit as was that which the landlord in "Martin Chuzzlewit" reposed in "our member in the House of Commons who is returned upon the gentlemanly interest." "What interest is that?" asked Martin. "What, do n't you know?" returned the landlord. "It was quite clear the landlord did n't. They always told him at election time that it was the gentlemanly side, and he immediately put on his top-boots and voted for it."

But this long repose has at last been broken, this sacredness has been violated. For example, the college corporation has become an open question. Hitherto its exalted reputation has been enjoyed on terms somewhat of the easiest. Upon each commencement day the young gentleman who does the valedictory at the proper point turns to them and says: "Gentlemen of the corporation, during another year you have, with unslumbering vigilance and paternal care, watched over this venerable seat of learning. We tender you our gratitude for the opportunities of education which your wise liberality has afforded us, and for your affectionate solicitude in our behalf," and all the rest of it. The members of the corporation experience a glow of complacency, and each waistcoat heaves with moral elevation. To be sure, they are a little perplexed as to how they could have been so vigilant without knowing it; but the highest goodness is ever unconscious of itself. Possibly the more shrewd among them are as much troubled as were Cicero's augurs to look each other in the face without laughing.

Then they go in procession to their place of meeting, listen to so much as the president chooses to tell them of his doings, vote their thanks to the chief donors during the year past, fill any vacancies in their own ranks by electing such persons as will give trouble if they are not elected, or will, perhaps, give something else if they are, confer degrees on a few trustees of kindred institutions, or on pastors of wealthy churches (for, says the Scripture, "Sinners even give to those from whom they hope to receive"), raise the salaries of such professors as have demanded it most persistently, issue an urgent appeal to the public for an increase of funds, appoint an agent to collect them, partake of the refreshments of the season, and their work is done, until they come together again to be once more reminded of their "tireless labors," etc., etc.

We apprehend that the public is very nearly ready to ask, What are the services which the college boards render to education? What qualifications have the members for maturing and superintending a system of high instruction by which to form the young men of America? How many of them, during their whole tenure of office, give one hour in a year to serious, independent, original enquiry into the educational wants of the American people, and the best means of meeting them, or have any other idea of their duty than that it consists in pursuing, without variation or even investigation, precisely the round of a hundred years ago? Upon what principle do they distribute the funds of the college? by what means do they learn the condition of the institution under their care? what measures do they take, by the graduation of emoluments or otherwise, to adapt the compensation of instructors to the universal law of life, and to ensure alike to the faithful, successful teacher, and to the incompetent or negligent, the respective reward of their labors? All these questions and many more are becoming open.

And the college course—the invariable term of four years—with its absolutely changeless round of studies, compulsory alike on all, of every age, every form of genius, and every destiny in life, compelling each to pursue every study, whether he will or no, up to a certain point, and allowing none to pursue any study beyond the golden mediocrity, however unmistakable the bent of his genius, pray tell us (men will ask) when and where was all this divinity revealed—was it delivered to Moses, inscribed on a third table of stone, or was it whispered in the ear of Adam? Is the college course the absolute goodness, the perfected result of the long experience and matured wisdom of years, generations, and hoary centuries; or is it, rather, a system "founded for the education of the mediæval clergy, and modified by the pressure of an all-powerful aristocracy," with the accidental accretions that have grown to it through a long series of years? Does this perfect curriculum furnish men with trained intellects, and fit them to go forth, wise and great and free, to the battles of life? or does it dismiss them admirably fitted for just one thing—to train unsuspicious youth for exactly the same course that they themselves have conformed to?

Scholars have told us of a giant in the olden time who, with an excess of hospitality, would insist on making every traveller he fell in with "take a bed" with him. He had one bed for all wayfarers. If the lodger was shorter than the bed, the host had him drawn out to the required length; if he were so long that his feet projected beyond the footboard, the superfluous length was lopped off. A very pretty story, only the giant did not live so very long ago, and his name was not Procrustes but College. Here is the bed with all its dimensions fixed. And here are one or two hundred youths whom the giant has caught. Lay them, one by one, on the bed. Here is a man who has no genius for mathematics; the demonstrations and processes of the higher analysis convey to him no idea whatever. Never mind! carry him through the calculus with the rest. Here is another man designing to be an engineer, with a passion for mathematics, wishing, indeed, to master this department of study. No matter. Why should he be allowed to know more of it than his fellows? Reduce his mathematical powers to precisely the dimensions of his neighbor. Another is devoted to the natural sciences. He will spend all his leisure prying into strata and formations, and will toil half the night in the laboratory. This case demands immediate attention. He shall not go a step beyond the prescribed limits. If he does, it shall be at the expense of his other studies and at the risk of being disgraced by losing rank in his class. Again, here is the son of a manufacturer who wishes to enter his father's business. He has no fondness or aptitude for Greek and Latin. What then? he ought to have. Put him on the classical rack and draw him out.

Oh! when will another Theseus arise—men are asking—to deliver us from the despotism of this giant?

The sequence of the studies pursued, and the time allotted to each, are they based upon a careful examination of the powers of the mind and of the order in which they are unfolded? Does each study receive a degree of attention delicately adjusted to its relative importance, and to the wants of an American citizen in the latter half of the nineteenth century? In requiring the young man to spend three years in college, besides two or three years of preparatory study upon Greek, and in giving a few hurried weeks (usually in the most crowded part of the course) to geology, and a single term to the marvellous science which turns the spectroscope on the sun's disk and resolves into its elements that insufferable incandescence, have you carefully compared the power of these various studies to enlarge the mind and to awaken habits of observation, of generalization, and of original investigation? In giving nobody knows how much time to Latin, and nobody knows how little time to political economy, have you weighed the comparative importance of these studies? Is it not at least worthy of an enquiry whether we should not to-day be nearer to a solution of the financial embarrassments which make the loaf on so many boards smaller, coarser, and costlier, if our colleges had taught the young men of America something more of the sources of national wealth and the laws of currency, even at the expense of ignorance of the names of Æneas's ships, or of the bastards of Jupiter?

"THE NATION" AND IMPEACHMENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Although I wholly disagree with the position assumed by The Nation on the impeachment question, I do not therefore propose to "stop my paper;" for I neither expect nor wish to find in any journal a mirror which shall exactly reflect my own mental physiognomy. But it seems to me that The Nation, in common with most of the loyal papers of the country, has fallen into a lamentable error in the discussion of this matter: that of making a moral and judicial question a mere matter of financial and political expediency.

If I rightly understand The Nation's ground in the matter, it is this: That Andrew Johnson has, by his official misconduct, made himself liable to impeachment; that he is guilty of some of the crimes or misdemeanors contemplated by Article II., Section IV., of the Constitution; but that impeachment is unadvisable, because the agitation and financial disorder which would attend that event would do more harm to the country than Mr. Johnson's continuance in office.

Now, with the first part of this argument I have nothing to do. Mr. Johnson may or may not be liable to impeachment. That is a question for the House of Representatives to decide.

But what I do most firmly believe is this: That if Mr. Johnson has, in the judgment of the House of Representatives, rendered himself liable to impeachment, it is their first and imperative duty to impeach him, and that nothing can bring such evil upon the country as the continuance in office of any man because the people, whose servant he is, fear to remove him when he has rendered himself liable to removal. Judicial questions are not to be decided by motives of expediency. Removal by impeachment is the punishment prescribed for one class of offences, as the prison is the punishment for another, and justice is no more to be defrauded in the case of a president than in the case of a murderer.

Circumstances can be imagined in which public sympathy might be excited in favor of a suspected burglar or forger. The excitement might become so intense that business in the community would be deranged, property unsafe, and a reign of mob law threatened. Yet on this account the course of justice could not be stayed without bringing the law into contempt, and branding the grand jury who should shirk their duty on grounds of expediency as cowards.

It seems to me that this case finds an exact parallel in that more important one under discussion. Fifty years hence, this would hardly be a creditable passage in the history of the present distracted times: "In the year 1867, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, was guilty of certain usurpations and misdemeanors in office which, in the opinion of many wise men, rendered him liable to impeachment and removal. But the House of Representatives dared not present him for impeachment, fearing the effect which the legal punishment of such usurpations and misdemeanors might have on the trade of the country and the political prospects of the dominant party."

No; if Andrew Johnson deserves impeachment, let him be impeached, though the long-looked-for grass should sprout the next day in Northern streets. There need, however, be no fears of such a dire result. The nation which has borne the strain of such a war as ours can certainly risk the removal of one delinquent from office.

You believe that the evils resulting from Mr. Johnson's continuance in office would be less than those attending his impeachment and removal. Even were this true, his impeachment would still be a duty, always supposing him liable to it; but I do not believe it true. You have forcibly shown in your leading article of February 7 that the speedy reconstruction of the South is the great need of the hour. It cannot be denied that Mr. Johnson, with an ally in the Supreme Court, with a vast patronage at his back, with the executive power of the country in his hands, and with his known character for firmness, not to say obstinacy, has been and is the great obstacle in the way of reconstruction. To prove that he has been an obstacle would be to prove that wind blows and water runs. It may be said, however, that the President's hands are now tied, that Congress is master and can do as it likes. Let us see. On the 6th instant the Reconstruction Committee reported to the House a bill which proposes in effect the "Territorial plan" of reconstruction discussed in The Nation of January 3. In your leading article of that date you say that the Territorial scheme "could never be carried out until after Mr. Johnson had been removed from office." The committee seem to have recognized the same fact, for they have vested the government of the Southern districts in the army alone.

Has Mr. Johnson, then, no power in the matter of reconstruction? Again, on page 101 of the present volume, you say that the bill punishing certain offences in relation to the currency "will prove inoperative to a great extent, at least, owing to Mr. Johnson's tenderness for this species of crime." You have also admitted, I think, although I have not the paragraph at hand, that the Civil Rights bill is inoperative through Mr. Johnson's neglect to enforce it. Yet on page 21 of the present volume you say that Mr. Johnson "is not a formidable enemy." It seems to me that he is a formidable enemy to justice, to the laws, and to the representatives of the people if he neglects to enforce even one law, and compels Congress to practically ignore his existence and commit the execution of its acts to the military power.

My whole argument, stated in the fewest words, is this: The question of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson is one of law and fact, to be settled by the proper court, and no more "a question of expediency" than the trial of a forger. The President, as it seems to me, is a "formidable enemy" to a speedy settlement of our national difficulties, and his trial, if liable to one, will bring less evil on the country than his continuance in office must effect.

ARCHITECT AND CLIENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In an article on "Payment for Professional Services," in The Nation of last week, you make some statements which I think are calculated to bring the profession of architecture into discredit.

You make a positive statement that "no architect can possibly, by any amount of care, include everything in his estimates. In a large building hundreds of items are sure to be overlooked, each one, perhaps, of small importance in itself, but in the aggregate causing a formidable addition to the cost."

It is upon this premise that you build your argument that the system of commissions is unfair to the client. You state the above as a fact, and your statement may or may not be founded on experience. But experience and knowledge bear me up in holding a contrary opinion.

I admit that there are architects whose specifications do not specify everything needed, and whose estimates, founded on such specifications, are not reliable. But it is not fair, because there are bad architects who do not understand their business, for you to assume that no architect can prepare a set of plans and specifications without overlooking "hundreds of items." I will venture to say that there are very few, even among what would be called "bad architects," who cannot in their drawings and specifications cover everything needed in a building.

But it is a fact, and that you have stated very well in your article, that fickle-minded clients often make many changes to which the additional cost of a building is attributable. The more ignorant such a client is, the more he is disposed to think that, because he wants the alterations or additions, it may be inferred that his architect has made blunders or omissions. It is such experience, partly derived from the inability of the owner to describe what he wants or understand a plan when made, that induces many persons to make unjust accusations against even the most skilful and experienced architects.

All that you say "in the way of apology" for the unwillingness of the public to pay architects what they ask in the way in which they ask it, is founded upon the above assumption that no one can tell beforehand what he is to pay his architect, because no architect is capable of defining everything that may be required to make the house complete, and consequently of getting at the cost of it. I understand that a capacity to do this is the first thing requisite in the education of a practical architect. If your statement is correct, our profession might as well be abolished, for according to what you say an architect is only a person who gets other people into financial trouble. The sober sense of the community and the extensive patronage bestowed on some of us by shrewd business men are the best refutation of such an idea.

Speaking for myself, I am unaware of the "undeniable unwillingness of the public" to pay us our regular commissions of which you speak, and have never yet in business experience met any one who, admitting that our services are worth what we ask, has objected to paying commissions upon the actual cost of the work done.

You are also mistaken in supposing that an architect ever pledges his professional honor that the mechanic's work shall be suitably done for such and such a sum. He often has to deal with a strange builder, who has been engaged by the owner, and who may be such a blunderer that no human power can make him do his work well.

I beg leave, also, to say a word for the clients as well as for ourselves. You make the broad statement that "no client ever knows, or, except in very few cases, can know, what he wants, and can tell whether any plan submitted to him will really meet his wants, supposing he does know them." Then any one must be a fool ever to employ an architect or build a house. I think, however, that the case is not so bad as you state it to be, although I am painfully aware of the deficiencies of many persons in this respect.

I do not think with you that the mass of men are driven to quacks because they think that those who are in reality honorable architects have an interest in leading them into great expense. Clients do not go thus from one architect to another. Those who patronize the quacks do so because they like them.

I will not trespass upon your time any further than to express my approval of the general spirit of your article. It bespeaks an awakening interest in the advance of a much neglected and little understood profession when influential journals are ready to discuss its principles and practice.

STUDENTS AND THE DUTY ON BOOKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Your admirable article, headed "A Plea for Culture," deserves the thanks of all American students. Agreeing entirely with its statements, I would illustrate their force by applying them to one particular case, which may stand for many others.

Much of our knowledge comes from the riders of hobbies and pursuers of specialties. One man, or several, must understand a subject thoroughly before the mass can understand it tolerably. The bit of ground which each of these laborers has in hand may be out of the way and small, but it is a portion of the great field; what he produces therefrom may be inconsiderable in itself, but it is a contribution to the general supply. A great deal of our scientific and literary information would be wanting but for zealous and exceptional students, who are content to take each his particular department and work therein. Now half the books these men need require to be imported. Some are old and scarce, not to be met with here, except now and then, and by accident; others are new and perhaps expensive, and sure not to be reprinted. The special workman, whatever be his work, will in almost every case have to look for many of his tools to Europe; surely it is unjust and unwise to tax him for that. He is seldom rich, not seldom distinctly poor; his labor is often one of love, which brings no material recompense. In the old countries he would find helps and opportunities which are unknown here: college fellowships within reach of his diligence; splendid libraries, containing almost whatever he seeks; learned societies, in which he may find fellow-laborers, and discuss his favorite pursuits. For all this—to have it to any considerable extent—we are too new, too busy, too gross. But at least our legislators might let the student alone; not hinder, if they cannot help him; not increase his burdens and difficulties, and thereby not only meddle with his own progress, but diminish or defeat whatever he might accomplish, be the same much or little, towards the assistance of others and the general increase of knowledge.

I may give an instance from my own experience. My specialty is an obscure branch of literature, concerning which few know or care much, but in which are involved certain not unimportant practical considerations. I have done thereanent some work not, I trust, utterly worthless, and hope to do more. My tools, of course, are books, and most of them English. They are not few (my collection is, I believe, the largest of this sort in America), and hundreds are yet to be added. I have to study economy, and I have effected arrangements by which I can get books from England at small expense, except for the duty. That is the one obstacle; and now the obstacle seems likely to grow into prohibition. If the next tariff is as bad as it promises to be, I suppose my importations must cease. Will it be any satisfaction, I wonder, to Congress, and any benefit to the nation, to stop my harmless pursuits and frustrate my little plans for the future? I, and what I can do, are of small consequence; but, suppose there are in the country hundreds of men likewise engaged upon labors more useful than mine, who will be affected much in the same way by blind and brainless legislation. Agitation may not be a remedy, but is there any other?

BISHOP PERCY'S FOLIO MS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A letter from a gentleman of your city informs me that considerable interest exists in the United States about our print of Bishop Percy's Folio MS., the foundation of his celebrated "Reliques," but that no one knows to what publishers he should pay his subscription.

Now, as this scheme of printing this famous MS., so long religiously hidden by the bishop's descendants, was undertaken by me solely at the instigation of an American professor, Prof. Child, of Harvard, who has been long honorably known to us English students of Early English here by his famous paper on "Chaucer's final e" and his "Ballads," I shall be only too glad to have help from his countrymen in carrying out his project, and proving to all in England and our colonies that it is not "the old country" alone that cares for "the old men," but that the new land claims her share in the fame and work of those who helped to create the noble tongue that all who speak English use. And not only for these Percy folio ballads and romances do I speak, but on behalf of the earlier works which our Early English Text Society, with an energy and liberality heretofore unknown among book-clubs, is monthly producing, and which shed a much-needed light on the speech and thoughts and ways of our common ancestors. The United States ought to help us in this. It may seem strange to you that I should write thus; but having watched your late war with an interest keener than our own Crimean one; having been depressed at your defeats, gladdened at your victories, and exulted with fierce joy as Sherman marched his magnificent march through the South, and Grant tightened his death-grip on the bold, bad men who fought so bravely for the accursed cause—I cannot but seize a chance of saying to you, now that your fight for the right is transferred from camp to Congress (for heaven's sake don't think it's over), won't you care for what I care for? won't you do something for our old men whose work lies hidden in manuscripts? won't you enrich the minds of yourselves and your children by sharing and letting them share the thoughts of the men who helped to make you and us what we each are?

Excuse my straggling thus. I meant only to send you some publishers' addresses, but I couldn't keep quiet. So let me give you now Messrs Trübner & Co.'s message: That subscriptions for the Percy folio print and the Early English Text Society will be received by these correspondents Leypoldt & Holt, New York; Scribner & Welford, New York; Dutton & Co., Boston; J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. The subscriptions for the different sets of the Percy print are: for quarto copies on thick-toned ribbed French paper, 50 copies only printed, ten guineas; for royal octavo copies on Whatman's thickest white ribbed paper, 50 printed, five guineas;* for demi-octavo copies on Whatman's second white ribbed paper, 250 copies printed, two guineas. For 8vo copies to members of the Early English Text Society, on ordinary paper, one guinea. The book will be in four volumes, and neither Prof. Child, nor I, nor my friend Mr. Hales, of Christ's College, Cambridge (who is writing admirable introductions to the ballads, etc.), will receive a penny of profit from it; that, if any, will go to the Early English Text Society. The subscription to this society is only one guinea a year, and for this the society gave eleven valuable texts last year, and this year will give twenty if enough members subscribe to it. These texts are of the highest character and interest, edited by men of known ability, and in a club like the Roxburghe would cost a member at least fifty guineas and take ten years to bring out.

I ask, through you, sir, for the help of the men of culture in the United States in these matters. Yours faithfully,

FRED. J. FURNIVALL.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

By PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D.

FROM CONSTANTINE THE GREAT TO GREGORY THE GREAT, A.D. 311-600.

Being Vols. 2 and 3 of Ancient Christianity.

2 vols. 8vo, price $7 50.

In the union of profound and exact learning with the gift of popular representation, Dr. Schaff is almost without a rival among modern ecclesiastical historians. In his hands the history of the Church is not a barren record of forgotten names and obsolete dogmas, but an attractive picture of the intellectual and moral life of successive ages. The volumes abound in passages of truly picturesque effect, the ruins of antiquity are clothed with fresh beauty and vigor, and the centuries of the past are shown in vital connection with modern thought and cultivation. A large space in the work is devoted to biographical sketches of the prominent men of the different epochs, whose relations with the Church give them a place in its history. These are invariably drawn with admirable skill and felicity, and greatly enhance the pleasure of the reader.—N. Y. Tribune, Feb. 2, 1867.

The Week.

The long-expected veto of the Reconstruction bill came on Saturday. It is simply a reiteration of the now familiar argument, that Congress has no right to impose on the South any conditions of readmission whatever, save that members of Congress shall be loyal men. With extraordinary fatuity, Mr. Johnson still refrains from explaining where he himself got the power to impose on the States the abolition of slavery and the repudiation of all debts contracted in the interest of the rebellion; and yet he talks of these two conditions as if their constitutionality were doubted by nobody. He cites also once more the resolution of Congress passed in 1861, declaratory of the objects of the war, and in which no mention is made of anything except the restoration of the Union pure and simple, forgetting that this would apply to the abolition of slavery just as much as to the Constitutional Amendment. He draws a horrible picture of the character of the present bill—so horrible that it is difficult to see how he can, after such an expression of opinion, set about executing it. If it is all he says it is, he will be one of the worst and meanest of men if he allows himself to be the instrument of putting it in force. Nevertheless, if he does not execute it, and execute it fully and effectively, we trust there will be neither delay nor hesitation in bringing him to justice. Unpunished nullification of acts of Congress by the Executive would be just as dangerous a precedent as sham impeachments for party purposes. We have discussed the future more fully elsewhere.

One of the memorable incidents of the close of the session was the assault of Messrs. Chandler and Sumner on Mr. McCulloch, for having employed in some Southern States assistant assessors who were unable to take the required oath. Mr. McCulloch, we believe, alleges that as the law requires the assessors to reside in the county, it was impossible, in many instances, to find persons capable of meeting all the requirements of the office—a statement which may or may not be correct—though nobody who knows anything of the population of some Southern counties will find in it anything very incredible. As to the duty of the Secretary under such circumstances, opinions will differ. Our own is that he ought to have obeyed the law, even if the United States lost money by it. The loss of the money is a small matter; but the assumption of officials on all occasions, small and great, of power to dispense with the execution of statutes which they find inconvenient, is a very great matter. The Senate and House both set a very dangerous example in this matter in Senator Patterson's case last year. But Mr. McCulloch's neglect of duty does not furnish the smallest excuse for the kind of attack made on him by Senators Chandler and Sumner. When the former of these called him a "liar," a "thief," and a "pauper," he not only disgraced himself, which is of no great consequence, but he disgraced the Senate and the country as much as it is in his power to do. The theory of a good many politicians seems to be that being "sound" on reconstruction furnishes a man with a plenary indulgence for any ruffianism he inclines to, for one may be ruffianly with his tongue just as with bludgeon or mud-ball.

The Tariff bill, like error, "died among its worshippers," on Saturday, apparently without exciting very deep regret on the part of anybody. But the "woollen interest" was lucky enough to get the Bingham bill of last year passed for its benefit at the last moment. The Tribune, before the final catastrophe, had been forced into calling Congress to give up trying to legislate for "special interests"—a remarkable confession of the folly of its sermonizing during the previous half-year. There will be no end to this confusion, jobbery, and disappointment until Congress agrees to allow experts to draw up a tariff bill, based on a principle of some kind, and refuses to listen to lobbyists and to individual members with hobbies.

Congress adjourned with great decorum, Messrs. Foster and Colfax delivering very graceful valedictory addresses. Mr. Colfax was immediately elected Speaker of the Fortieth Congress, which met on Monday, and the machine is once more in motion, with some new wheels, of which the most prominent are General Butler and Mr. John Morrissey. "The fine personnel of the latter," says the New York Times reporter, "astonished many who had formed their opinion of him based on the popular conception of his character." We have no doubt whatever, that by dint of puffing Mr. Morrissey's "personnel," "Our Washington Correspondent" will win for him by next fall the well-known brevet rank of "a gentleman of fine talents and dignified manners."

Mr. James Brooks occupied some time at the opening of the new Congress by a characteristic protest against its assembling on such notice and in the absence of so many members, several of the Northern States not having yet held their elections. His rhetoric was very fine, but then his arguments could be so readily made to carry him into absurdity, that they did not call for any reply, and got none. It is the business of States entitled to representation in Congress to see that their representatives are ready when Congress meets. Congress must, in fixing when it shall meet, be guided by the state of the country, and by nothing else. Any other rule would put it in the power of a small number of States to prevent or postpone its meeting at most important crises. Besides which, the Constitution provides against all flagrant abuse of the power, by ordaining that it shall take a majority of all members to constitute a quorum.

We publish elsewhere an article on the condition of the Board of Education in this city, which we commend to the attention of all who are interested either in municipal reform or in education. If the question were a purely local one, we should not have devoted so much space to it. But the fact is that every large city in the Union is following more or less rapidly the track of New York in all that relates to local government, and our experience may be the means of saving others many errors and many costly experiments.

THE operation of the Uniform Bankruptcy law will be productive of unmixed good at the North, and at the South the good it will do will be nearly unmixed. To keep an honest bankrupt who was a rebel under disabilities injurious to him and not beneficial to any one else would be impolitic and unchristian; and it will also be necessary to forego thoughts of vengeance on those insolent robbers who, as soon as the war broke out, laughed their Northern creditors to scorn, even taking pains, some of them, to write letters informing the helpless Northerner that he might collect how he could. In the North the effect of the bill will be to set many respectable men on their legs again and give them one more chance. Nor does the law seem to us too hard on the creditor, as was the law of 1842. At any rate, if bankrupts must be, we may well enough be glad of uniformity in the system of bankruptcy. That is a clear advantage.

THE Assembly of this State refused, by a vote of thirty-three to ninety, to allow colored men to vote for delegates to the State Convention, on the sole ground that such delegates were "officers" within the meaning of the clause in the Constitution declaring who shall vote for "officers" elected by the people. Yet, on the same day, by a vote of sixty-seven to fifty-two, the Assembly voted to exclude unconvicted rebels and deserters from voting at the election, although the Constitution expressly provides that all white citizens, unconvicted of crime, may vote. The inconsistency of the two decisions is almost ludicrous. It ought to be clear to any ordinary understanding that the "officers" mentioned in the Constitution are such as act under it. A Congressman is an "officer," and, indeed, so is a bank president; but no one imagines that the Constitution of this State regulates their qualifications or the mode of their election. Neither does it regulate in the least the election or qualifications of delegates to a convention avowedly called to act over and not under it. If they are officers under the Constitution, they must take the regular oath of office, and swear to support the very instrument which they are elected to destroy.

MR. SMYTHE, before he took the collectorship of the port of New York, occupied a very high position as a man of honor, and his appointment was generally received with great satisfaction, as proof that the "good time" was at hand. But, according to the Congressional Committee, no sooner had he got into office than he took to the old game of jobbery—converted the "general order store" into a "plum" of corruption, farmed it out to knaves, who were to pay $40,000 or $50,000 a year for it, part to Mr. Smythe himself, part to "Mrs. Perry"—whoever she may be—and part to a son of our respected President, Andrew Johnson. The whole revelation is disgusting. If we cannot trust men like Mr. Smythe, whom may we trust? The answer is, nobody, as long as the present system is continued. Until the public service becomes a career to which men devote their lives, the temptation to grab all one can during short terms of office will be so strong that the purest men will fall victims to it. A man who won't rob, now naturally finds his position untenable.

CITIZENS and property-holders residing in Fourth Avenue, above the Central Park, have printed an "Appeal for Protection to Human Life in Fourth Avenue," which they address to the Legislature, and which we sincerely hope may receive a favorable answer. The fact that at this late day such an appeal is necessary or possible forbids us to do more than hope. The state of affairs disclosed is most disgraceful. The petitioners say that through the middle of the great thoroughfare above mentioned, dividing it into two parts, which at several points are so narrow that vehicles meeting cannot pass each other, the Harlem Railroad Company keeps open a frightful ravine. The cut is of irregular width, varying from forty to fifty feet; its depth below the level of the street is in some places ten feet, in others fifty; the sides of it are either left unprotected, making it a pitfall for foot-passengers, or are inadequately protected by low walls. It is almost a mile long. One policeman makes affidavit that within the last eight years he has assisted in carrying away the bodies of six persons injured by falling into the tunnel; another policeman has been familiar with the place for nine years, and in that time has helped to carry off the bodies of from eight to twelve persons killed or injured there, and knows of from twelve to twenty other persons so injured, a majority of whom were killed. The Harlem Railroad Company, the petitioners say, disregards the fact that the grand jury of the county of New York have indicted the cut as a nuisance; it resists all applications to remedy the evil; it uses its overshadowing money influence to prevent justice being done to the public; and openly tramples on the public interests in order to promote its own. An executive committee has been appointed, and we wish them success in whatever measure they may take to save themselves as property-owners from the injury this corporation inflicts on them, and to save the city from a great disgrace.

MR. AGASSIZ delivered the last lecture of his course last week, and devoted two hours to a reply to the strictures made on his course in this journal and elsewhere, and to the refutation of the Darwinian theory, uttering his opinions with great freedom. The submission of such a controversy by a scientific man of Mr. Agassiz's standing to a promiscuous assemblage of two thousand people, of whom perhaps one hundred had a distinct notion of what it was all about, or what Darwin's theory is, was a very curious spectacle. Still more curious were the attempts of the audience to give some kind of verdict in the matter, by applauding whenever they caught a word or phrase which seemed to bear hard on the monkeys. It was quite evident that his hearers were very ready to have the professor handle the Darwinians even more roughly than he did. His manner was perfect, however, and he treated his opponents like a gentleman, and would have treated them like a philosopher had he stated their position clearly, which he did not. But one cannot do everything in two hours.

THE subject of the controversy between Agassiz and Owen on the one side, and Vogt, Huxley, and Darwin on the other, is one on which it has been commonly supposed not more than fifty men—if so many—in the world are competent to give an opinion worth listening to. Of finding anybody, in our time at least, who can say with absolute certainty whether there is any foundation for the Darwin theory or not, we believe all scientific men, as well as the rest of the public, despair. But it is evident we were all mistaken. There is somebody in New York who knows that there is nothing in the Darwin hypothesis whatever, and we are glad to say he has been secured as a contributor to the Sunday edition of the New York Times. On Sunday last he closed this tedious controversy by thanking Professor Agassiz for "completely exposing the fallacy, nay, the very absurdity, of the theory thus advanced" (by Huxley and Darwin).

EVERY good man should rejoice—it is not necessary that a man should be very good to rejoice—that Governer Swann, of Maryland, has failed to get his wages. His fingers were just closing on the senatorship, the reward of the services he rendered the rebel party last autumn, and he had to draw back his hand. His punishment is sufficient—sufficient for vengeance. Evidently it has not brought him to repentance and amendment; he has the extreme hardihood to say that the office was conferred upon him "without solicitation or agency on his part"—an assertion requiring an amount of assurance in the man who makes it that has rarely been equalled in American political history. Boys in the street know that Mr. Swann longed for the senatorship as some men have longed for heaven; that he and his friends and the party to which he now belongs became convinced that the U. S. Senate would unseat him; that therefore he and they were forced to make up their minds that he had better hold on to the governorship and keep it out of the hands of the Radical Lieutenant-Governor; and that therefore he resigned the senatorship. The talk about its being known that during the war Mr. Swann received payments of interest on Confederate bonds may possibly be true; probably, though, he held bonds of the State of Virginia. Virginia after secession resolved that "alien enemies"—meaning American citizens—should not receive the interest on the Virginia bonds they held, and it is possible that through the influence of his friends in the seceded State Mr. Swann may have practically been made an exception to this rule. Of this, however, we know nothing; the loss of the senatorship is sure. Man cannot predict the future, or the history of Maryland in the autumn of 1866 might have been very different.

THE resolutions about reform introduced into the House of Commons by the Derby Ministry, and which were received by the country with a burst of rage and derision, have been withdrawn, and a bill is now promised. What the bill will contain nobody knows, and the resolutions were so wildly vague that they afford no data for conjecture. The last reform demonstration was, in point of numbers and enthusiasm, a failure; but the question presses with such tremendous force that all parties are calling for its settlement. The Fenian attempt on Chester seems to have been well planned, and only failed owing to the usual incident of Irish conspiracies—the appearance of an informer on the scene, who put the police in possession of all the details. The "rising" in Kerry appears to have consisted in the parading of the high-roads and robbing of one or two police stations by a few hundred men, who soon took to the woods and mountains, and are now being hunted down in detail. The casualties of the struggle consist of one policeman wounded. "The men in the gap" seem to do no better than the heroes of Lime Ridge. The commander-in-chief, General O'Connor, who was thought to have been captured, is still at large. In the meantime, this constant disturbance is driving capital out of the island and breaking down industry. The O'Donoghue, we are glad to see, is devoting himself heart and soul to the English Reform movement.

ITALY is passing through a political crisis arising out of the Church question. Baron Ricasoli proposed to secularize the immense estates of the Church, but, while absolutely confiscating a portion of it, to leave in the hands of the clergy, provided it was invested in the public funds, a sum estimated by some at $300,000,000, and by others at $400,000,000, free from state control. This would, of course, virtually render the Church independent of the State, but it would place the subordinate clergy at the mercy of Pope and bishops, who are of course no friends of the new régime. Now "a free church in a free state," free a thing as it is here, seems to the mass of the Italian liberals to be full of danger in Italy, where the main body of the people are grossly ignorant, and are as dependent on the parish priests for political as for religious guidance. Whoever paid the priests would, the liberals believe, really govern the people. Therefore, considerable hostility had sprung up in the Parliament towards the ministry, when a confessedly illegal step on Baron Ricasoli's part, though there was perhaps some excuse to be found for it in the circumstances of the case, in prohibiting public meetings in Venetia, where the opposition to the Church measure ran very high, brought matters to a crisis. A vote of want of confidence in the ministry was passed by 136 to 104. The ministers resigned, dissolved Parliament, and "went to the country." The elections are now pending, and the new Parliament will meet March 22. The liberals seek the complete appropriation of the Church property and the payment of the clergy by yearly salaries, as state functionaries, as in France.

A DEBATE on Crete has occurred in the English Parliament, in which the tide seemed to run strongly against the Turks; but Mr. Layard took up the cudgels for them and defended them vigorously, much in the style in which James Brooks used to defend the poor white man against the abolitionists, before the war. The general opinion seemed to be that the Turks have had about as much sympathy and assistance from England as they deserved, and that the Christians were now entitled to a little of both. Lord Stanley's despatches, which recommended moderation to the Porte, were generally approved, and Lord Stanley himself foreshadowed a policy of non-interference.

THE FREEDMEN.

THE Legislature of Tennessee has provided by law for a common-school system for the State without distinction of color. It is not perhaps an obvious, but it is an entirely truthful remark, that the blacks would never have been embraced in this provision except for the previous experiment and example of freedmen's schools, sustained by the benevolence of the North, in every part of Tennessee. In them the capacity of the negro and his ambition to get knowledge have been for ever established; and they have also proved themselves here, as noted by Superintendent Tomlinson in South Carolina, the handmaids of civilization, and restored public order. The patient and obscure toiling of three years has wrought this great revolution in Tennessee. The Philadelphia society alone, aided for the last eighteen months by that at Pittsburg, has effected and sustained seventeen distinct educational organizations, five of which are normal classes for the preparation of colored teachers, besides an orphan asylum at Nashville; and has distributed more than $10,000 worth of supplies, clothing, and fuel. At Murfreesboro', says a very high authority, "there is scarcely a department of culture, whether social, literary, or religious, which has not received an impetus from our teachers;" and the same might be said of the other stations, as indeed at Stevenson: "The teacher is an adviser of the colored people in everything." "Gradually, we are reaching the parents through the children."

—We understand that the N. Y. Branch of the American Freedman's Union Commission, having together with the Pennsylvania Branch borne the chief burden of the schools in the District of Columbia, will presently withdraw its teachers and its care from all but a single school. This action is the result in part of the charge imposed upon the District by Congress of furnishing to blacks and whites equally the benefits of education; in part, of the suffrage which the blacks have obtained, admitting them to the control of their own destiny; and especially of the mental and moral improvement in the colored people which has been brought about in its own province by the New York association.

—Mr. Johnson, believing what he would like to have true, accuses Congress of forcing the suffrage upon the freedmen. He has more than once been refuted by his adopted State, and on this new issue he is again. "Large and enthusiastic conventions of the colored people," says a private letter from Tennessee, dated March 2, "are being held in various portions of the State, and resolutions adopted indicating that they will vote in the coming election the way they shot"—which means point-blank against their late oppressors.

—U. S. Commissioner Foster issued, on the 27th ult., warrants for the arrest of five magistrates of the Corporation Court of Norfolk, for refusing colored testimony two days before, in violation of the Civil Rights act. On the 1st inst. he decided that they had acted illegally, and bound them over in $1,500 each to appear before the District Court on the 13th.

—The Supreme Court of Alabama has decided that the emancipation proclamation did not take effect in that State till May, 1865.

—Sixty Catholic priests have arrived in New Orleans, to open schools for the freedmen.

—Secretary McCulloch has made a colored messenger of the Treasury a clerk, after he had passed the usual examination. He was educated at Oberlin. A not unfriendly writer says, "It must not be supposed that his elevation has made him at all giddy (!). On the contrary, he is, as he has always been, humble," etc., etc.

—In his speech on the Military Reconstruction bill, Feb. 19, Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, said:

> "The Civil Rights bill passed in the spring of 1866. I have a partial list of outrages and murders perpetrated in the rebel States since the passage of that act, officially reported. All admit that the cases officially reported make but a small portion of the outrages or murders committed. From April to December, in Virginia, 18 murders and 105 burglaries in one county alone; in North Carolina, 15 murders of freedmen were committed, and 86 outrages—some of the number were assaults with intent to kill; in South Carolina, 29 murders and 64 outrages; in Georgia, 79 murders; in Mississippi, 34 murders; in Kentucky, 19 murders; in Texas, 74 murders, and 10 mortally wounded. Since the passage of the Civil Rights law, 375 murders of freedmen have been committed in the rebel States, and 556 outrages. These outrages and murders were officially reported, and the victims of the Memphis riot and the New Orleans massacre are not included."

LITERARY.

The Essex Institute, the well-known Natural History Society of Salem, Massachusetts, which was recently the recipient of some of Mr. Peabody's bounty, has commenced the publication of a popular illustrated monthly magazine of natural history. It is called The American Naturalist, and gives forty-eight octavo pages of articles, beside twelve more devoted to brief reviews, proceedings of societies, correspondence, and the like. The first number for March has been issued, and contains the beginning of an exceedingly interesting paper by Mr. E. S. Morse, on "The Land Snails of New England," with a plate. The other leading articles are "The Volcano of Kilanea in 1864–5," by W. T. Brigham, with a wood-cut; "The Fossil Reptiles of New Jersey;" "The American Silk-worms;" and "Winter Notes of an Ornithologist," by J. A. Allan. The editor is Alpheus J. Packard, Jr., in connection with Edward S. Morse, Alpheus Hyatt, and Frederick W. Putnam. It is intended to make it a popular magazine, easily understood by persons who have devoted little or no attention to the niceties of scientific phraseology, capable of arousing the attention of the young to the life going on around them, and able to take advantage of, and rightly direct, the enthusiasm for natural history that has of late years been growing in this country. The price of the magazine is three dollars per year.

—The new Aldine series of the English poets has finally been issued by Messrs. Bell & Daldy. It is comprised in fifty-two volumes foolscap octavo. Two hundred and fifty sets were printed on large paper before stereotyping, of which one hundred only were sold to this country, all of them to Mr. R. H. Johnston, of 64 Nassau Street. The series has been re-edited by competent editors, though few changes have been made in the text of any but the Chaucer. The Spenser is a reprint of Mr. J. Payne Collier's text, and is in a smaller type than the other volumes. The Chaucer is by far the best work. The text follows exactly the Harleian manuscript, and there are added a valuable introduction on the language and versification of the poet by the editor, Mr. Richard Morris, a life of Chaucer by Sir Harris Nicolas, and a glossary. It is a matter of great regret that the plan of the publishers did not allow Mr. Morris to append any collations of the text and various readings. Three hitherto unpublished short poems are included in this edition: "Ætas Prima," the blessings of the early time when war was not, when men ate mast and haws, drank water, and slept

> "On grasse or levys in parfite joy and quiete;"

"Leaulte vaut Richesse," from a Scotch copy, two stanzas; and "Prosperity," eight lines, concluding with

> "There is no more perilouse pestilence
> Than hie astate gevin unto schrewis."

The first of these does not seem to be in the condition Chaucer left it.

—For the last few years there has been a great demand in this country for large-paper copies of books; and the reprinting of old books and tracts has been carried to a great extent, more to satisfy the demand of collectors for handsomely-printed large-paper books than for any better reason. So eagerly are such books sought for that almost any old tract or squib, even if almost worthless, always repays a handsome profit on the cost of reprinting. Do these wealthy and liberal collectors ever reflect how much real good they might do for the cause of learning by assisting in publishing the old manuscripts of which the English libraries are full? No one that has yet been published has failed to throw some useful light on the early history of our common language. We have previously spoken in this paper of the publication of the original manuscript of Percy's "Reliques," the first part of which will soon be ready for delivery. We learn from Mr. F. J. Furnivall, from whom we published a letter last week, that arrangements have recently been made by which subscriptions will be received by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, Scribner, Welford & Co., of New York; Messrs. Dutton & Co., of Boston; and Messrs. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia. The subscriptions are of four classes. Subscriptions of ten guineas will entitle the subscribers to large-paper copies, on quarto sheets of thick toned French ribbed paper—fifty copies only printed. Five guineas entitles its donor to a large royal octavo copy on Whatman's thickest white ribbed paper—fifty copies only printed. For the octavo copies, uniform with the publications of the Early English Text Society, the subscription will be one guinea to all members of that society, and two guineas to those not members. The work will be printed by Spottiswoode & Co., and will be in four volumes, of about 1,400 pages in all. This country should raise at least £50 to secure from loss the gentleman who procured the manuscript, Prof. Child; and for a work of such value it ought to raise much more.

—At the same places will be received subscriptions for the publications of the Early English Text Society—one guinea a year. No society deserves better support than this, and none has done so much for English literature in the same space of time. The membership of the society has increased in three years from 145 to 420, and the number of texts yearly printed from four to eleven. The publications for 1864 and 1865 are entirely out of print, except a few sets in the hands of Messrs. Lippincott & Co., but will probably be reprinted. During this year, 1867, if funds enough are supplied, thirty-two texts can be printed. Of these, three have already left the press and are issued to members; seven more are in press; and thirteen more are ready to go to press at a month's notice. Among them are "The Romance of Partenay or Lusignen;" "Dan Jon Gaytrigg's Sermon; The Abbaye of S. Spirit; Sayne Jon, and other pieces in the Northern Dialect;" a collection of tracts on meals and manners, the fullest yet published; "Palladius on Husbondrie: the Earliest English Poem on Husbandry;" Mirk's "Duties of a Parish Priest," in verse; "Cursor Mundi;" and the earliest version of Piers Plowman, from the earliest MS. These books can never again be bought so cheaply, and every one of them throws valuable light on English history and the English language. They are edited gratuitously by the very best English scholars.

—Mr. Samuel Porter, long connected with the Deaf and Dumb Asylum at Hartford, Conn., and now of the National Deaf-Mute College, Washington, has published, through Messrs. B. Westermann & Co., an essay on "The Vowel Elements of Speech." The paper first appeared in The American Journal of Science and Arts; and in it Mr. Porter sets forth a new system of the vowel sounds, accordant with the mode of their formation by the organs, and not arranged, as most others are, by the degrees of openness and closeness of the vowels. After a complete discussion of the manner and place of production of the vowel sounds, the author investigates to some extent the received theories of the difference between vowels and consonants. The paper is important and interesting not only to all students of phonology, but to teachers of elocution and of singing, and all who train in any way the human voice.

—The untiring efforts of Mr. A. R. Spofford to secure for the library of Congress, which is under his charge, the extensive historical collection of Col. Peter Force, have been completely successful. We presume since the national library was founded there has been no addition to it at all approaching this in value, and it ought to be the cause of general gratulation that the views of the owner and the librarian as to its proper destination have been adopted by Congress, and the liberal offer accepted without higgling.

—When M. Charles Nisard prepared for the press the second edition of his "Histoire des Livres Populaires," he intended to add a third volume on the subject of songs. He, however, yielded to the objections of his publisher, and reserved the subject for a distinct work, which he has now given us, entitled "Les Chansons Populaires chez les Anciens et chez les Français." Though the author traces the history of popular songs among the Greeks, Romans, and Hebrews, he principally occupies himself with those of France. He gives many characteristic specimens, from the couplets which Taillefer recited at the battle of Hastings, to the "Mazarinades," and "Recueil de Maurepas." The whole of the second volume is taken up with an account of contemporary songs, among which may be found the famous "Eh, Lambert!" "Le Sire de Framboisy," and some of the still more famous ballads of Mademoiselle Thérèse. A new edition of "Barsaz-Breiz, Chants Populaires de la Bretagne" has just been published by the Vicomte de la Villemarqué, to which the editor has added several new features, besides about a dozen pieces hitherto unpublished. He gives in every instance a modern French translation of the songs, with a commentary. The tunes of the most remarkable ballads are printed at the end of the volume. A German Song-Book of the sixteenth century has lately been published, with introduction and glossary, by Karl Gödecke and Julius Tittmann. It is the first volume of a series of sixteenth-century poets published by Brockhaus, of Leipzig.

—A very remarkable letter has been received by the French Minister of Public Instruction from M. Lejean, who has been sent by the Government of France on a journey of scientific exploration to India and the Persian Gulf. His letter is dated from Abushehr, a seaport on the east coast of the Persian Gulf. Among many other singular and interesting discoveries, he reports that he has discovered several pre-Sanskrit languages (langues paléo-ariennes), "still spoken between Kashmir and Affghanistan by mountain tribes," which bear a closer resemblance to the old languages of Europe than the Sanskrit itself. A statement so remarkable needs strong confirmation. He says further that he has followed "step by step" the voyage of Nearchus, the admiral of Alexander, who explored this coast in B.C. 325, and has discovered traces of him. He has also found two ruined cities of the Persepolitan period near Abushehr—Mesambria, now Ruhil, and the Hieramitis of Nearchus, the present Gheramita.

SCIENTIFIC.

Improved Means of Obtaining Iodine.—As new processes of manufacture are gradually discovered and applied in the various departments of the so-called useful arts, and old materials come to receive new uses, it often happens that long-established methods become suddenly impracticable or unprofitable under the stress of new competitions. Thorough revisions of old processes, and sometimes fundamental alterations in great industries, are thus necessitated by a force of circumstances which no prerogative or routine, though of the stiffest, can resist.

As illustrating this proposition, certain recent improvements in the manufacture of iodine are worthy of notice. Indeed, the whole history of the kelp industry, as practised upon the coasts of Scotland and Ireland, is worth recalling, because of the curious changes through which this branch of industry has passed.

The fused ashes obtained by incinerating various sea-weeds, and the alkaline salts obtained by bleaching these ashes, were formerly much used in England for making soap and glass. Before the discovery of the modern method of obtaining soda-ash from sea-salt, and so long as heavy import duties were imposed upon barilla and other foreign alkalies, the preparation of ashes from sea-weeds, or kelp, as this ash was termed, was carried on in many localities with profit, simply for the sake of the alkali which the ashes contain. It has been estimated that the annual product of kelp in Great Britain was at one time as high as 25,000 tons. But, as new sources of alkali were discovered and as the duty upon the foreign article was reduced, the manufacture of kelp was gradually given up. It would, in fact, probably have disappeared from among the arts but for the discovery that from sea-weeds the important chemical and medicinal agent iodine can be more cheaply obtained than from any other source. Having thus come in to aid the declining kelp industry, the manufacture of iodine inherited, as it were, the old processes of the kelp-burner. Up to the present time the manufacture of iodine seems to have been conducted upon the alkali-makers' plan, in spite of the fact that iodine has long been by far the most valuable ingredient of the kelp, and the one for which the sea-weeds have really been worked.

Mr. Stanford, in his patent process, now employed upon some of the Scottish islands, does away altogether with the preparation of kelp. Starting with the natural product, sea-weed, he endeavors to save all the useful ingredients which this raw material contains. Instead of roasting or burning the dried sea-weed at high temperatures in the open air, and so destroying the organic matter and losing a very considerable proportion of the iodine, which is dissipated under such conditions, he simply distills the dried weed at a low red heat in iron retorts. By operating in this manner there is obtained, as a residue in the retorts, a very porous charcoal containing the whole of the iodine originally present in the sea-weed, together with the various alkali salts with which it is there associated. By simple lixiviation with water all these salts may be readily removed from the charcoal, to be subsequently separated from one another by crystallization; the final commercial products are remarkably free from color and are of unusual purity. It is noteworthy that even the small percentage of bromine compounds which sea-weeds contain is saved by the new process, and that for the first time in the history of the chemical arts bromine is obtained from this source upon a commercial scale.

The products of distillation, which pass off from the retorts in which the sea-weed is heated, are condensed in suitable receivers, and reworked for ammoniacal salts, oils, naphtha, tar, and so forth. The charcoal left after the removal of the salts is sold as a deodorizer. For filtering water and disinfecting sewage it is said to be a good substitute for bone charcoal, and to cost but a quarter of the price of the latter article.

FELTON'S GREECE, ANCIENT AND MODERN.*

Four courses of lectures on ancient and modern Greece, delivered before the Lowell Institute by the late President Felton, have been edited and published in two handsome octavos. To his friends—and no man had more or warmer friends—they will be an acceptable memento; as regards the public, it is not perhaps too much to claim, with the preface, "that the work fills in our literature a place not before occupied, and that it will render essential service to that cause of liberal culture to which the author's whole life was consecrated." Mr. Felton was an enthusiast by nature, and had the good fortune to be able to devote his life to the one study for which he had the heartiest love. He was a man, too, who never grew old in spirit, and there is nothing factitious or exaggerated in the enthusiasm that these lectures manifest. All he says, he felt; and it cannot be but that so genuine an ardor—one, too, which is kindled by an object worthy of it—will be imparted to his readers. We look, therefore, for solid good from the book. Classical studies are not likely to retain the disproportioned rank in our schemes of liberal education which the superstitious reverence of our fathers assigned them. Nothing is more certain than that a mighty revolution is now going on with regard to them; but there is danger that in this reaction they will be deprived of the consideration which rightfully belongs to them. We welcome, therefore, a work at once of real scholarship and real humanity, which we are sure cannot fail to attract and enlighten the minds with which it comes in contact, and to give to many a new sense of the true value of the classics.

These lectures, differing in their special subjects, illustrate very well, in the several courses, the capabilities of the popular lecture as a means of instruction, and the limitations which it should be under as regards choice of topics. The first course, on "The Greek Language and Poetry," we think the least valuable and satisfactory of all, and for the reason that its subject is that least adapted to this form of treatment. Literature cannot be taught by talking about it, because its peculiar value consists in the special form in which we find it; we must know it at first hand in order to know it at all. Lectures on the literature of a nation or a period cannot, therefore, be of much service to any but those already somewhat familiar with that literature, and to them by teaching them to understand and appreciate better what they already know. Lectures on Shakespeare, Milton, the dramatists, the essayists—all these are useful to an ordinarily well-educated audience. But popular lectures on Greek literature are of a different order, because this subject lies outside the range of tastes and interests of those who listen to them. They are delivered to an audience of cultivated people, to be sure, all of whom have heard of Homer, no doubt, and many of whom have read traditions of him, but to most of whom the names of Pindar, Simonides, Æschylus, and Sophocles are mere names, if known at all. You cannot give an audience which is at the highest point of culture in other respects, but ignorant in this, any knowledge of these great poets that is worth having by merely talking about them, any more than you can describe the Dresden Madonna or the Venus of Milo to one who had never seen it. We have no doubt Mr. Felton's audiences enjoyed the lectures highly, and went home feeling that they had learned something; but, after all, what had they learned but names? An evening spent in the careful reading of Mrs. Browning's "Prometheus," and another of Schlegel's lectures on the Greek drama, will give a person wholly ignorant of Greek an accurate, if incomplete, notion of this wonderful and characteristic branch of literature; but general lectures will never do it.

* "Greece, Ancient and Modern. Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute. By C. C. Felton, LL.D., late President of Harvard University. In two volumes." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867.

The second course, on "The Life of Greece," is, on the other hand, the best of the four, and for the same reason, that its subject is best fitted to be treated in this manner. More than this, Mr. Felton was pre-eminently the man to do it. Only a man who is as keenly alive as he was to all that was going on about him could enter so heartily as he has done into the life of a bygone age, and put together, out of the fragmentary notices that have come down to us, so charming a picture of it as that which he has here presented us.

The course upon "The Constitutions and Orators of Greece" is excellent, especially the last lectures, where the orators, from Lydias down, are described and compared. The development of the Athenian constitution is not so distinctly traced as we could desire. The author did not excel in political analysis; and while the lectures on Solon, Clisthenes, and especially Pericles, state clearly enough the special changes which they introduced, and, above all, present us with glowing portraitures of the statesmen themselves, we fail to find a well-digested account of the growth of the constitution as a whole; in especial, the share taken in its development by Themistocles and Aristides has hardly justice done it. Neither can we believe that the early institutions of the Greeks are treated as they would have been had Maine's "Ancient Law" appeared before the preparation of these lectures. It is hardly too much to say that this great work has revolutionized the study of the primitive institutions of Greece and Rome, and that any book written before it must seem superficial and defective upon points that its masterly discussions have made commonplaces to us.

It is in the last course of lectures (the third in order of preparation, but the last in this arrangement), upon "Modern Greece," that we find most that is new and characteristic and the fruit of special preparation; for the others, his life-work was the preparation. Mr. Felton returned from his visit to Greece brimming over with enthusiasm, and these lectures were a genuine labor of love. It vexes us, however, to find so much space devoted to repetitions of matter contained in the other courses, and to the wearisome and unedifying chronicles of the Middle Age, which latter we might much better be left to look up for ourselves in Gibbon—space which we grudge, feeling that it might have been filled with those graphic pictures of Grecian life and travel of the present day which Mr. Felton knew so well how to draw, with more detailed accounts of the leading men of Greece now living, and especially of the elements of political society throughout the kingdom. Mr. Felton has not done for us here all that he had it in his power to do, and that we should have been grateful to him for doing. Still, this course contains much valuable information, well arranged and well stated, which is peculiarly acceptable to us just now that the Grecian question is again becoming prominent.

On all disputed questions Mr. Felton is pre-eminently a Philhellene; and he defends his positions so chivalrously and eloquently as to make us wish—as we are nothing loth—that he may be right. Still, the impartial judgment needs more data than he has given us. The lively picture, for instance (Vol. II., p. 315), of "a Greek professor in a Greek university lecturing to two hundred Greeks, in the Greek language, to prove that the Greeks were Greeks, and not Slavonians"—this picture after all carries hardly more weight with it as an argument than the easily conceivable one of a Gallic professor in Lutetia, say, lecturing in Latin to his audience of Romani, and claiming descent from Romulus. We can conceive of a language changing hands on the spot as well as by colonization. We should be glad to believe in the Hellenic descent of the modern Greeks, but the argument is not complete. "The Slavonians," says Mr. Felton, p. 313, "are light-haired, blond-complexioned, and blue-eyed; the Greeks have dark hair, brown complexions, and sparkling black eyes." But in Vol. I., p. 281, Adamantius, a writer of the fifth century, is quoted as describing the Greeks as having "white skin, soft yellow hair, liquid eyes of dark blue or azure;" and on p. 292, Dicæarchus, who wrote in the fourth century before Christ, is quoted as describing the women of Thebes as having yellow hair. We submit—unwilling as we are to yield the point—that the modern Greeks have more resemblance to the Slavonians whom we have seen in Bohemia and Carniola than to their putative ancestors as described by Adamantius.

Of more vital and immediate interest is the question whether the Greeks have the qualities demanded for political success in these days, such as would entitle them to inherit the throne of Constantinople when it shall fall vacant. The events which followed immediately upon their glorious revolution, the reactionary government of Capo d'Istria and his assassination, the revolt of Navromichales, the insurrection in Hydra, the double government after the death of Capo d'Istria, and the fight in the streets of Argos—all these events, as related by Mr. Felton, read like a page out of the history of the Mexican Republic, and seem to indicate an incapacity for orderly self-government. On the other hand, the local municipal governments which exist throughout Greece, having come down from a former age, are the best—we may almost say the only—basis for a free government, and, it would seem, ought to have been allowed to do for Greece what the similar institutions have done within our day for Italy. If the two pillars of democracy are universal education and local self-government, the Greeks have both of these, and, repulsive as is the picture of intrigue and corruption, mean ambition and selfishness, in King Otho's court, we do not know that it is worse than in the court of certain of the Georges of England—shall we say than under certain of the Presidents of the United States of even more recent date? Not many nations would choose to be judged of by their politicians.

If the second course of lectures (delivered in 1853) had been written ten years later, we doubt whether Mr. Felton would have spoken of "Aristotle's Politics" in precisely the terms which he uses (pp. 479–84). In 1853 we of the North were timid and compromising; we half believed that the great battle we were called upon to fight might at least be put off to another generation; we had no faith in our own democracy. The South, on the other hand, had been taught by "Aristotle's Politics" a hearty contempt for our democracy and a hearty belief in its own institution of slavery; this great treatise had no unimportant influence in bringing about the rebellion. It is not, perhaps, too much to claim for "Aristotle's Politics" that it is the most profound treatise in existence on political science; but we cannot concede—and Mr. Felton would not concede were he living now—that the experience of the petty commonwealths of Greece, even when expounded by such a master, "exhausted the subject." Indeed, in the third course, delivered six years later, he gives in detail Aristotle's views on slavery, and attempts to show that this institution was only recognized, not justified, by him—a tacit confession that Aristotle made a mistake on this question.

The lectures bear evident marks of the rapidity—we do not say haste, much less carelessness—with which they were written. There is no effort at compression and logical exactness of style—this would have spoiled them for the purposes of the lecture. We cannot doubt that if the author had himself prepared them for the press, they would have been materially improved in these qualities; or, rather, he would perhaps have recast them, conscious that the style of a spoken lecture is not suited to a printed book, and given them the form of a treatise, more systematic in arrangement and exhaustive in treatment.

THE TENT ON THE BEACH.*

Speaking of himself in a part of his latest volume, Mr. Whittier describes himself as . . . . "a dreamer born

Who, with a mission to fulfil,
Had left the Muses' haunts to turn
The crank of an opinion-mill."

But he says that he never forgot his first love:

"For while he wrought with strenuous will
The work his hands had found to do,
He heard the fitful music still
Of winds that out of dreamland blew.
The din about him could not drown
What the strange voices whispered down;
Along his task-field weird processions swept,
The visionary pomp of stately phantoms stepped.

"The common air was thick with dreams,—
He told them to the toiling crowd;
Such music as the woods and streams
Sang in his ear he sang aloud;
In still, shut bays, on windy capes,
He heard the call of beckoning shapes,
And, as the grey old shadows prompted him,
To homely moulds of rhyme he shaped their legends grim."

As for the homeliness of some of his rhymes, it is almost proverbial, and this last book is not free from the familiar Yankeeisms the presence of which in the work of such a man is unaccountable on any other supposition than that he has deliberately decided to continue using them. Mr. Whittier has been frequently spoken to about such blemishes as making "accidents" rhyme with "evidence," "war" with "law," and other faults not quite so striking, but quite as avoidable and culpable and exasperating. In other particulars, his description of himself as a poet is equally accurate. Not that it is necessary to agree with him wholly in the implied depreciation of what he styles his crank-work; to us it seems not doubtful that the greater part of his other writing in verse will always be considered inferior to his political poetry. Except when he is painting New England life, and not always even then, his muse is never so kind to him as when, hot with righteous indignation, he is working in that same opinion-mill, doing good which he need not blush and need not be surprised to find fame.

* "The Tent on the Beach, and Other Poems. By John Greenleaf Whittier." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867. Pp. 172.

More than once, of late, he has seemed to express a regretful feeling that his life had not been devoted to poetry pure and simple. It is a regret that we can hardly share; that we could hardly share even if his fellow-countrymen of to-day and of the future were not and were not to be his debtors for the great aid his pen has given to every good cause. For, to our mind, his genius seems to be not of the kind which might have been expected to achieve great successes in other and higher walks of poetry than those in which it has been employed. Its distinguishing marks are strength of moral feeling, depth of religious feeling, which, however, never gets beyond the control of his reason, much tenderness of sentiment, a very good but not the very best eye for nature. And the man endowed with these gifts is a man of perfect sincerity and uprightness, simple and above suspicion of artifice of any kind. But he is too little sensuous, humor is wanting to him, and he is not a poet rich in imagination. So one reads him, and gets an impression of a certain aridness of nature; when one remembers his kindliness and noble philanthropy, it seems like a sin to say so, yet that impression he does produce. For instance, think of him and Keats together, or him and Coleridge, and one can imagine either of the others rapt at “sight of Proteus rising from the sea,” and him struggling for a moment with a tendency to look on all Greek gods with reprehension as heathens. Sympathy with what lies much beyond the range of New Englandish thought we do not find ourselves expecting of him. We submit that great success in the pursuit of poetry of the less exalted kinds, fanciful, imaginative, sympathetic, musical, is hardly attainable by a poet of whom one may make the assertion we have permitted ourselves to make regarding Whittier. It is an assertion which we think will receive assent. As for the more splendid triumphs of imagination, they are for few to think of attempting. We are glad, then, and we think the poet not unfortunate, but fortunate, that in the anti-slavery cause he found a theme to rouse into fervor his moral feelings; and that now in his age, when memory can aid his powers with the charm she is able to fling over the past, he has had time to write for us his beautiful “Snow-Bound,” a poem the secret of whose beauty lies partly in the faithfulness with which the details of the farm-house life are drawn, and partly in the soft and tender lights which memory throws over the picture. For thus while doing most for man, he has done best for himself.

As most of our readers are, we dare say, already well aware—for the volume has been in the bookstores a fortnight—“The Tent on the Beach” tells how Mr. Whittier, during the heats of the summer vacation, camped out on the sea-shore, somewhere in Eastern Massachusetts, with two of his friends. These, we suppose it is no harm to say, were Mr. Bayard Taylor, “the traveller,”

“So travelled there was scarce a land and Mr. James T. Fields, the “lettered magnate lording o'er an ever-widening realm of books”—who in Mr. Whittier's description appears thus:
Or people left him to exhaust,”

“He knew each living pundit well,
Could weigh the gifts of him or her,
And well the market value tell
Of poet and philosopher.
But if he lost, the scenes behind,
Somewhat of reverence vague and blind,
Finding the actors human at the best,
No readier lips than his the good he saw confessed.

“His boyhood fancies not outgrown,
He loved himself the singer's art;
Tenderly, gently, by his own
He knew and judged an author's heart.
No Rhadamanthine brow of doom
Bowed the dazed pedant from his room;
And bards, whose name is legion, if denied,
Bore off alike intact their verses and their pride.

“Pleasant it was to roam about
The lettered world as he had done,
And see the lords of song without
Their singing robes and garlands on.
With Wordsworth paddle Rydal mere,
Taste rugged Elliott's home-brewed beer,
And with the ears of Rogers, at fourscore,
Hear Garrick's buskined tread and Walpole's wit once more.”

After the friends and the poet himself are introduced, the sights and sounds of the camping place—the knot of picnickers, the gunner in the marsh, the pair of lovers, the flight of sea-fowl, the gathering of the fog—are just touched upon, not described with the fond elaboration with which the interior of the farm-house was painted for us in the winter idyl for which this summer idyl is in some sort a companion. The poem hastens on to one evening when the two friends, by-and-by joined, it would seem, by a “fair singer” from a neighboring tent, sat listening to some pieces which the poet read them, they in turn making their comments, the remarks of the Traveller being generally artistic, those of the Man of Books jocose, while the lady exhibits a religious turn of thought which furnishes occasion for bringing in the moral and religious truths and theories which are a necessary part of Mr. Whittier's poems.

The first stanzas which follow will give a notion of what was said in the tent, and the last stanza of what was seen from it. As for what was sung there, it was “The Dead Ship of Harpswell,” “The Palatine,” “The Brother of Mercy,” “The Maids of Attitash,” “Kallundborg Church,” and other pieces with which The Atlantic Monthly has made the public familiar:

“‘Pray,’ said the Man of Books, ‘give o'er
A theme too vast for time and place.
Go on, Sir Poet, ride once more
Your hobby at his old free pace.
But let him keep, with step discreet,
The solid earth beneath his feet.
In the great mystery which around us lies,
The wisest is a fool, the fool heaven-helped is wise.’

“The Traveller said: ‘If songs have creeds,
Their choice of them let singers make;
But Art no other sanction needs
Than beauty for its own fair sake.
It grinds not in the mill of use,
Nor asks for leave, nor begs excuse;
It makes the flexile laws it deigns to own,
And gives its atmosphere its color and its tone.

“‘Confess, old friend, your austere school
Has left your fancy little chance;
You square to reason's rigid rule
The flowing outlines of romance.
With conscience keen from exercise,
And chronic fear of compromise,
You check the free play of your rhymes, to clap
A moral underneath, and spring it like a trap.’

“The sweet voice answered: ‘Better so,
Than, crowding sail, to drive to wreck;
Better to use the bit than throw
The reins all loose on passion's neck.
The poet's liberal range should be
The breadth of Christian liberty.
Was Milton's step less free because he trod
The hills of heaven, and walked, like Enoch, with his God?

“‘The home-fare which our poet gives
Is simply common, not unclean;
The music of the life he lives,
He sings of what his eyes have seen.
Of narrow scope his verse may seem,
But rippled lake and singing stream
Find fitting audience, in themselves complete,
As the great sea that rolls its thunder at our feet.’

. . . . .

“Across the sea one large, low star,
With crimson light that came and went,
Revolving on its tower afar,
Looked through the doorway of the tent.
While outward, over sand-slopes wet,
The lamp flashed down its yellow jet
On the long wash of waves, with red and green
Tangles of weltering weed through the white foam-wreaths seen.”

We need not quote from these well-known poems, the best of which are those “legends grim,” which it does indeed seem as if the wet east winds of the sea-coast had, as he says, whispered in the ears of the poet. “The Palatine,” “The Dead Ship of Harpswell,” “The Wreck of Rivermouth,” breathe the spirit of lonesomeness and wildness and wreck which is the life of the traditions of the sea-shore. In another vein, but an equally characteristic poem, is the very excellent one entitled “Abraham Davenport,” and we can hardly imagine a selection to be called “The Beauties of Whittier” which should not contain these three pieces. We could wish though that the first three lines of the last-mentioned had been omitted.

The “National Lyrics” and the “Occasional Poems” help to fill up the little volume, and contain such favorites as “What the Birds Said” and “The Mantle of St. John de Matha.” In the case of these also quotation is needless, and we close this notice of a book on the possession of which we congratulate the public by transcribing the fine preface:

“I would not sin, in this half-playful strain,—
Too light perhaps for serious years, though born
Of the enforced leisure of slow pain,—
Against the pure ideal which has drawn
My feet to follow its far-shining gleam.
A simple plot is mine: legends and runes
Of credulous days, old fancies that have lain
Silent from boyhood taking voice again,
Warmed into life once more, even as the tunes
That, frozen in the fabled hunting-horn,
Thawed into sound:—a winter fireside dream
Of dawns and sunsets by the summer sea,
Whose sands are traversed by a silent throng
Of voyagers from that vaster mystery
Of which it is an emblem; and the dear
Memory of one who might have tuned my song
To sweeter music by her delicate ear.”

MAURICE DE GUÉRIN.[*]

We have had occasion more than once, in these columns, to speak of Eugénie de Guérin, and in so doing to touch upon her less famous but even more remarkable brother. The opportunity is to-day afforded us to dwell at greater length upon Maurice de Guérin. A gentleman well fitted for the task has executed a translation of the most valuable portion of Guérin's literary remains—his "Journal"—and promises us a version of his letters and his fragmentary pieces. When these shall have been published, American readers who are acquainted with the writings of Eugénie de Guérin, and whose curiosity has been stimulated by the important although silent part played therein by her brother, will find themselves in possession of all such evidence as exists of the young man's extraordinary powers. Let us say immediately a good word for the present translation. It bears marks of fidelity, sympathy, and intelligence, the three essential requisites of a translator; and it strikes us, moreover, as the work of one possessing a good English style. We have observed two or three slight aberrations from the lines of the French text, where it is somewhat ambiguous; but these are pardonable, since the spirit of the whole is not falsified. We should add that the editor has prefixed to the "Journal" a translation of Sainte-Beuve's "Causerie" on Guérin, an example of his best manner; and Mr. Matthew Arnold's essay, an example of his poorest. It was chiefly for the good taste of his selections—always one of Mr. Arnold's great merits—that his essay was valuable; and as Mr. Fisher has suppressed the extracts and given us only the commentary, the character of the essay suffers not a little.

[*] “The Journal of Maurice de Guérin. Translated by Edward Thornton Fisher.” New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1867.

The facts of Guérin's life are soon told. He was born at the château of Cayla, in Languedoc, in the year 1810, of a family noble, religious, and poor. His first studies were prosecuted at the petit seminaire of Toulouse; his subsequent ones, from the age of thirteen, at the Collége Stanislas, in Paris. On the completion of these latter, he spent a short interval in Paris, undecided as to a profession and in search of temporary work; but, finally, in mid-winter of 1832, in accordance with the wishes of his family, he entered a small quasi-religious brotherhood, founded and governed by La Mennais, at La Chenaie, in Brittany. This step was taken with a view of preparing himself for an ecclesiastical career. Guérin possessed the least conceivable fitness (short of positive aversion) for such a career. There is every appearance, however, that he derived great benefit from his sojourn and his daily contact with La Mennais. These were brought to a sudden conclusion by La Mennais' dissension with the Church and the consequent dispersion of his little group of disciples. Guérin's attitude throughout this critical period is that of cordial sympathy with his instructor. Nine months of religious seclusion and study, however, have convinced him that the Church is not his vocation, and he is again thrown upon the world for support. Before returning to Paris, he spends a number of weeks in the house of a friend on the coast of Brittany, and it is here that some of the finest passages of his journal are written. In January, 1834, he takes up his residence in Paris, where he remains until his early death in 1839. Destitute of all resources save such as he himself creates, his life during this interval is one of hard and often distasteful labor. He gives lessons of Latin and Greek and contributes articles to magazines and newspapers. His lessons, however, are ill paid and his literary connections not extensive, and the first real ease which he knows he obtains through a marriage which he allows to be arranged for him in his twenty-eighth year. Judging from the evidence of his letters and of those of his sister, these words do not misrepresent the nature of Guérin's marriage. His wife was young, charming, and mistress of an income, but Guérin did not live to enjoy his good fortune. He died of consumption in the course of a few months.

Such are the external facts of his history—facts few and simple. To what does he owe, it may be asked, the reputation which, twenty-seven years after his death, causes his writings to be translated into a foreign tongue? What are the names of his works? What idea has he given to the world? There is something very odd in the answer to these questions. Guérin's "works" are a private journal of a hundred duodecimo pages; a half-dozen copies of verses, some twenty-odd letters, and two short prose compositions on mythological subjects. He produced, moreover, a number of book-notices and of miscellaneous articles for periodicals, but these have never been disentombed, and it is by the scanty relics of his private history that his reputation is upheld. So solid a reputation has seldom rested on a basis so accidental. As for Guérin's "ideas," the task of enumeration is easy; or, rather, it is impossible. We are unable to associate a single idea with his name. His gift to the world was the gift of himself, of his own history; or, in other words, of the documents in which this history is reflected—documents as exquisite in quality as they are few in number.

Guérin's history may be briefly described as that of a melancholy man who overcomes his melancholy. The reader of his journal and letters is made a spectator of this delicate process of self-education. He watches the gradual decline of the writer's sadness, the successive diminution of each of its multifold elements, its backward retreat before the advance of the positive cares of life, and its final extinction at the moment when the young man engages in the most rational of marriages and embraces for the second time the most paternal and comfortable of creeds. It may be that Guérin's struggles were not really over at this moment, but it is certain that the reader's perception of them is satisfied.

When we speak of Guérin's sadness, of his melancholy, of his tristesse, we feel straightway bound to qualify our language and to explain the force of these terms. Save in a single particular, Guérin was not built on a large scale; he possessed an extraordinary sense of style; he was a master of the use of words. His melancholy has nothing profound and organic. It is not complicated with intellectual curiosity and intellectual doubts. His objects of interest are few in number, and easily approached. His dejection, therefore, is not the prodigious sadness of Pascal, nor, to take another example from among his own countrymen, the ceaseless weariness of Rousseau. It is an egotistical, a sentimental sadness. It is not the apprehension that the world is wrong, that life is worthless, that everything is nothing; it is the impression that he is wrong, that his own life is worthless, that his own powers are null. From the beginning to the end of his journal there is no trace of that penetrating (and penetrated) observation of the manners and motives of men which imparts a large portion of their value to the pages of Pascal and Rousseau. Guérin's outward gaze is for physical nature alone. When it deserts this field it reverts to his own mind. Here it lingers with a patience, a vigilance, which have never been surpassed. We quote an illustration:

> "Day before yesterday, in the evening, I had passed my arm round the trunk of a lilac and was singing softly J. J.'s song, 'Que le jour me dure.' This touching, melancholy air, my posture, the calm of evening, and, more than all, this habit that belongs to my soul of taking up at evening all its sadness, of surrounding itself with pale clouds towards the end of the day, threw me back upon the deep vast consciousness of my inner poverty. I saw myself miserable, very miserable, and utterly incapable of a future. At the same time, I seemed to hear murmuring, far and high above my head, that world of thought and poetry toward which I so often spring without the power ever to attain to it."

On this occasion he experiences a reaction; that is, he extracts a species of consolation, a whisper of encouragement, from the very depths of his dejection. At other times his depression is complete:

> "My soul shrinks and recoils upon itself like a leaf touched by the cold; it has abandoned all the positions from which it looked out. After some days of struggle against social realities, I have been obliged to fall back and retire within. Here I am circumscribed and blockaded until my thought, swollen by a new inundation, rises above the dike and flows freely over all the banks. I know of few events of my internal life so formidable for me as this sudden contraction of my being after extreme expansion. In this condensation, the most active faculties, the most unquiet, the most bitter elements find themselves seized and condemned to inaction, but without paralysis, without decrease of vitality; all their vehemence is confined and compressed with them. Pressed and crowded, they struggle against each other and altogether against their barrier. At these times all the feeling of life I have is reduced to a deep dull irritation, alternating with paroxysms; it is the fermentation of so many various elements, becoming inflamed and exasperated by their forced contact, and making repeated efforts to burst forth. All the faculties which place me in communication with outside space, with distance—those bright and faithful messengers of the soul, which go and come continually from the soul to nature and from nature to the soul—finding themselves pent within, I remain isolated, cut off from full participation in universal life. I become, like an infirm old man deficient in all his senses, alone and excommunicated from the world of nature."

These lines strike us as a forcible example of clear insight into moral phenomena, and of clear and masculine writing. We might multiply examples on both of these points, but want of space forbids us. The value and interest attached to Guérin's introspective habits reside in the fact that his self-scrutiny was so honest and unsparing, and that he really brought back positive data from his incursions into his soul. But perhaps the source of their main interest is in the intimate connection which existed between his constant self-appreciation and his sympathies with the world of external nature. It is upon this last phase of his character that Mr. Matthew Arnold chiefly dwells; and it is to the exquisite delicacy of his feeling for the life of the earth that we owe some of the finest pages of his journal. Many of them have been quoted and requoted, so that we hardly know which to choose. It is not, in our opinion, when he deliberately describes in its fulness a landscape or a bit of scenery that his style attains to its greatest beauty; this happens more particularly when a vague and general sense of the bounding, inexhaustible forces of nature, as contrasted with his own slow-beating pulses, imparts an almost special rhythm to his language, or when an irresistible memory of spring or of midsummer breaks into the tissue of his prose and suffuses it with light and heat and sound:

> "Leave there," he cries at the end of a noble passage in which he registers an impression of growing strength, through the contact of the spreading idea of liberty,—"leave there those men and their sayings, and steep yourself in the memory of those days of freedom when you roamed at will through the country, with your heart swollen with joy, and singing full-voiced hymns to liberty; or when you spent a day all idleness from one end to the other, from the joyous breezes of morning to the warm odors of evening; lying under a pear-tree, careless of everything, and bidding defiance in your insolent ease to the tyrants of every kind, bound like vultures upon the flanks of the human race.”

Here is another fine passage:

> “Let us abjure the worship of idols; let us turn our backs on all the deities of art, decked with paint and false finery, on all these images with mouths that speak not. Let us adore nature, frank, ingenuous, and in no respect exclusive. Great God! how can men make poetry in face of the broad poem of the universe? Your poetry! The Lord has made it for you; it is the created world.”

But it is in the short prose poem entitled “The Centaur” that we find the richest fruits of Guérin's constant communion with the silent processes of nature, and of his unquenchable curiosity as to her secrets. The centaur relates the story of his long life, recalls the memories of his early years, and enumerates his sensations, at once so simple and so complex. Guérin's style in this composition reaches a breadth and elevation which are truly remarkable when we consider the age at which it was written. There is no loose flinging of epithets, no confounding of crude colors. The whole piece is marked by a classical unity and simplicity. What poetry is more impetuous at once and more serene than this?

> “My glances travelled freely and reached the most distant points. Like the shores of rivers, for ever wet, the mountain ranges in the west remained stamped with spaces of light, but half wiped out by the shadows. There, in the pale clearness, survived the pure, bare peaks. There I saw at one time the descent of the god Pan, always alone, and at another the choir of the secret divinities, or the passage of some mountain nymph, intoxicated by the night. Sometimes the eagles of Mount Olympus crossed the upper sky and vanished among the far-off constellations or in the depths of the inspired woods. The presence of the gods, overtaken by sudden trouble, would break the quiet of the old oaks.”

There is a hyper-criticism which consists in burrowing for small beauties quite as offensive as that which consists in picking out insignificant faults; but we trust we shall not be held guilty of this vice when we say that the simple words “always alone,” in the above passage, taken in their connection, strike us as more thoroughly imbued with the spirit of poetry than the brightest of those floral chains of adjectives with which the poets of a later day have grown used to festoon the naked surface of their verse. Guérin was, in truth, an incomparable writer, and it is for this reason that his name deserves to stand. It is great praise to say of a man, deceased at the age of twenty-eight, that his style possesses something of that authority which will enable one to imitate it with impunity; but this praise may be given to Guérin. With so much about him that was weak, he must have felt that here he was strong. He has written pages which will live as long as his language.

A Digest of New York Statutes and Reports from 1863 to 1867. By Benjamin Vaughan Abbott and Austin Abbott. (New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. Pp. 704.)—Lawyers and law books have one point in common: the number of each is large, but the number of really good ones is very small. It is, therefore, a real pleasure to a critic to meet with a law book which he can unreservedly commend. Such is peculiarly the case with this digest. It is a work absolutely unrivalled in its own field; the equal of which has not only never been published in this State, but also in no other State or country. Of course it is understood that we are speaking of it only in comparison with other digests of law reports and not with any reference to treatises.

The compilation of a digest is a more humble task than the preparation of an original treatise; but the labor is little less, and the importance of accuracy even greater. There is also abundant scope for the exercise of the highest powers of discrimination, condensation, clear expression, and classification. These faculties have been used upon this digest and the series to which it is a supplement (there being seven volumes) to a degree rarely seen in any law book, and never in any mere digest of common law reports.

These volumes differ from all previous works of their kind in the following respects, among others: that they digest all the cases reported in any permanent form, including those published in magazines and irregular reports; that they give the date of every decision and the name of the court in which it was rendered; that the authorities cited by the courts are mentioned; that the tables of cases criticised are prepared on a broader plan, and the general table of cases is made clearer by a brief indication of the subject in respect to which each is cited; and that an index is provided not merely recapitulating the different titles, but gathering together all the scattered decisions which have any correlation. These are indisputable advantages, the existence of which is not a matter of opinion, but of unquestionable fact. On other points the compilers of similar digests may think differently, but to our mind there is no doubt that this digest excels all others in classification, lucidity, fulness, accuracy, and freedom from repetition, as much as it does in respect to the matters already mentioned.

As between this digest and any other published in this State, there is really no comparison to be made. No other has within some thousands of the number of the decisions here digested. No other has a classification adapted to the present state of the law, or refers to the statutes, or has an index worthy of the name, or can bear any scrutiny of its accuracy.

Of course this work has its imperfections, and errors of omission and commission might be pointed out to an extent which would dismay one who does not appreciate the immense difficulties of the task. But it would only mislead our readers if we should do so, since perfection is unattainable, and no other work of the kind is comparable with this in its relative freedom from errors. Every volume of the series has, moreover, shown marks of decided improvement, and when the compilers recast the whole, as we trust they will do within a few years, they will undoubtedly furnish the profession with a digest only to be surpassed with great difficulty.

Household Reading. Selections from The Congregationalist. 1849–1866. (Galen James & Co., Boston.)—In this very attractive, fair-printed volume are contained some two hundred selections from one of the ablest and most prosperous denominational journals in the country. They cover a period of eighteen years; but 1849 furnishes but two, and the following decade about forty, while the last seven years have yielded one hundred and fifty, These proportions not only indicate judgment in selecting what is fresh. but correspond to an actual development on the part of the paper; for good as The Congregationalist may have been in times past, it is undoubtedly better to-day. The extraordinary extension given to the circulation and influence of The Independent since 1850 has infused life into all the other journals of its class, even where it might be supposed that competition could not have been felt, on account of sectarian differences; but, above all, the one topic of the years inaugurated by John Brown at Harper's Ferry wrought a radical change in the matter and manner of the religious press, as it did of the pulpits throughout the States. The part which the Orthodox Congregationalists, both clergy and laity, took in sustaining the war against secession and slavery is too familiar to need recalling here. The “South-side” Adamses were few, the Beechers and Mannings and Stones and Thompsons were many and potent. What the body felt, the body must read in its chosen papers, must hear in its weekly sermons; and politics, which when slavery was too delicate a question to bear mentioning were divorced from the pulpit and the religious newspaper, resumed their rightful place in the province of moral instruction. One remarkable change must not be omitted—the truce of theological controversy in the latter days of the religious press; the cessation not of sectarian self-assertion and self-defence, but of endless squabbles between the various organs, paired off by some principle of natural selection, and filled week after week with allegation and rejoinder in the style so well exemplified by the three or four great “dailies” of this metropolis.

Proofs of this last position we do not draw from the volume before us, which was confessedly prepared for “evangelical” readers without distinction of name. It is a very faithful mirror of almost any single issue of The Congregationalist, and is four-fifths religious in substance and aim. We meet, as was to have been expected, articles on “Servetus and Calvin,” “Why I cannot be a Universalist,” “Deacon Riding's Dancing-School,” “Death in the Ball-Room,” “Cards,” “Geology and Genesis,” “Fear, the Basis of all Law,” etc., etc. Mixed with these are the anecdotes common to sermons and to tracts, several articles of history, biography, and travel—the contributions of the Rev. Wm. L. Gage being the most interesting—one or two war descriptions by Mr. A. D. Richardson, stories for the young, and poetry, with a few editorial articles on public events of lasting interest. Many well-known names appear in the index, and we are reminded that “Gail Hamilton” made her reputation in the columns of The Congregationalist. “Sophie May” introduced here her famous “Little Prudy.” Three or four of the poems seem to be worth preserving; that entitled “No Sect in Heaven” outweighing all the deficiencies of the rest.

On the whole, we judge this book well adapted to the design of its compilers, but we should in their place have omitted the painful story of “Kitty's Rebellion,” true though it be. From the mother who would starve her child until it said “please,” to the Rev. Joel Lindsley, there is, it seems to us, but a step.

Records of Five Years. By Grace Greenwood, author of “History of my Pets,” etc. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867.)—We fear that this volume will not do much to increase the author's fame. The most distinct impression that it leaves upon the mind after the perusal which its neat exterior invites is, that Grace Greenwood is married and has a little girl of whom she is more proud than she can say. The public may perhaps be very glad to hear of this, but whether they will think the information worth the price of the book is a more doubtful matter. Notwithstanding every page of the book reveals a warm and gentle heart, a great deal of maternal love and admiration, a ready sympathy with the suffering and oppressed, the reason fails to appear why, after having written several books worth reading, this should follow them. We dimly remember having shed some tears over “The History of my Pets” by the same author, but there is nothing here to excite the donum lachrymarum. We might criticize the author's style, for it is certainly diffuse and not a little strained, and there are many little bits of French that everybody knows, where English would be less affected and express the sense as well. But the main trouble of the book is that it seems quite objectless. The Essays “In Peace” do not tend to anything, have neither beginning nor end, and those “In War,” though doubtless of some interest at the time that they were written, have very little now. Were it not that Grace Greenwood has a very healthy soul and a great faculty of being on the right side of all the great questions, one might lose patience with her and so relieve themselves a little. But as it is, the only alternative is the dreadful one of feeling that a true and noble woman has written a most pointless and unmeaning book, yet so well meant that we are truly sorry that we can say nothing further in its praise than that it contains a few thoughts worth remembering—not many, still a few.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE FORTIETH CONGRESS.

Thanks to the firmness of the Northern people and the folly of Andrew Johnson, the new Congress which has just assembled is substantially the same as its predecessor. There are some new members in both Houses who will add to their strength—such as Messrs. Conkling, Drake, Morrill, and Morton in the Senate, and Gens. Butler and Logan in the House. The Democrats are also fortunate in having got rid of Mr. Jack Rogers, and having secured the services of Messrs. Brooks, of New York, and Holman, of Indiana, whose long experience and wide acquaintance give them an influence much beyond what the strength of their party alone would warrant.

The decisive action of the Thirty-ninth Congress upon the great question of reconstruction has relieved the new Congress from the consideration of that subject for the present; while the new law regulating the tenure of office has put an end to the system of proscription, the danger of which was one of the inducements to the early assembling of Congress. There does not seem, indeed, to be any positive necessity for its remaining in session, unless Mr. Johnson refuses to carry out the laws just passed over his veto, or unless, irrespective of that question, his impeachment has been determined upon.

These two questions are probably closely related, and must be carefully considered in forming any estimate of what Congress is likely to do. If Mr. Johnson is satisfied that he is in any event to be removed, he is likely to imitate the example of the unjust steward in making friends where alone he can find them. In short, if he cannot escape impeachment, he may reasonably conclude that his best policy is boldly to refuse obedience to the laws just passed over his veto, believing them, as he does, to be unconstitutional. Why should he destroy all the hopes of his Southern friends by enforcing an obnoxious law, if he cannot gain any credit with Congress by so doing? It seems, however, to be settled that he will obey and enforce these laws after some fashion, though undoubtedly with no great zeal; and we therefore infer that he considers himself safe against impeachment for his past actions.

Nevertheless, we think we perceive signs that he is mistaken in this assumption. The election of Benjamin F. Wade to the Presidency of the Senate is no slight indication that a vacancy is anticipated in a higher office. Mr. Wade is probably the last man who would be chosen by the Senate to preside permanently over its deliberations. It has always heretofore selected gentlemen of suave manners, whose ambition was not suspected of higher aims. Senators Foote and Foster, who have occupied the position of President pro tem. for the last five years, were men of amiable character, whom no one ever named for the Presidency of the United States. Mr. Wade is not noted for his knowledge of parliamentary law. His manners are not particularly gracious, nor his education such as to adapt him to the office of presiding over an assembly of calm and self-possessed gentlemen. Undoubtedly it is the last office which he would himself desire. To remain silent during a hot debate will be intolerable to him; and, indeed, we can scarcely believe that he will be able to keep off the floor on such occasions. But if the present Executive is removed, the choice of Mr. Wade is a very appropriate one; for he has the energy and courage necessary to face the possible difficulties of the transition, and ability to discharge successfully all the duties of the office to which he would thus be called. We do not mean to say, however, that immediate action upon the subject of impeachment is probable; for it is not. The Judiciary Committee will resume the enquiry commenced by the last Congress, and must occupy many weeks in the investigation. The report of the committee of the late House shows plainly that it deemed the evidence to be of importance; and the revelations concerning Collector Smythe's operations have a very disagreeable bearing upon the President's character.

That the Fortieth Congress will pursue the same line of policy as its predecessor is beyond doubt. It will be charged with the duty of seeing that this policy is fully carried out, and this duty it will perform to the uttermost. It is relieved from the doubts and difficulties which so grievously embarrassed Congress just one year ago. Its supremacy is practically unquestioned; its hold upon the people's confidence is assured. Its bitterest enemies confess that its decrees are final, and advise submission to all its demands. A vast change has occurred since its predecessor was openly denounced as hanging on the verge of the Government, as illegally organized, despotic, and treasonable. No Congress ever sat before that was so trusted by its friends, so terrible to its foes, so irresistible in its will. The Fortieth Congress is entrusted with gigantic power; let it remember that it must bear an equal weight of responsibility.

It is obvious that such unprecedented supremacy in Congress is attended with serious danger to itself. It is only natural that a certain degree of intoxication should be caused by such a wonderful victory as that of last fall. We do not counsel conservatism in the common but perverted meaning of the phrase; but we do urge most earnestly the necessity of patience and forbearance towards the minority, of full latitude in debate, of more circumspect and deliberate legislation. The new Congress has plenty of time in which to frame and pass its measures, after listening to all that can be said upon them. It is, of course, very trying to have to deal with a minority which rarely attempts to improve a measure, or to bear a debate in which nobody really expects to convince any of the auditors. But such faults in the minority are best cured by patience with those who are to blame, and a kindly encouragement of those who pursue a wiser course. In any case, the party which aspires and may reasonably expect to control the government for years to come is bound, for its own sake and for the example of future ruling parties, to act with dignity and generosity toward its opponents, and to legislate with the deliberation of wise and prudent men.

"THE TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND AND FIRST CURIOSITY" IN CONGRESS.

The nomination of Mr. P. T. Barnum as one of the Connecticut representatives in Congress suggests considerations of some importance as to the effect which the crisis through which the nation is now passing is producing, and is likely to produce, on the taste and judgment of constituencies in the selection of public men. The war may be said to have completely destroyed what remained amongst us when the struggle commenced of the old European faith in the value of political leadership. From first, almost, to last, people hungered and murmured for a leader to supply them with plans and policy and ideas, and to conduct the contest as it should be conducted. For four years, at least, the "coming man" was daily expected; but he never came. Everything which the struggle needed—the thinking, the persistence, the foresight, the fortitude, the ingenuity—had to be supplied by the nation at large; and when the last shot was fired people were amazed to find that conception as well as execution had, in this stupendous undertaking, been the work of the unknown multitude, and that, in short, the age of the Washingtons and Pitts and Napoleons seemed to have passed away. The result is that "great statesmen" are perhaps just now in lower repute all over the world than they ever were before, and in this country the public may be said to have not only given up wishing for them, but almost to hold them in contempt. Whether the experience of our war justifies this state of feeling, it is impossible to say; one case is hardly sufficient basis for a generalization. This much is certain, that in all civilized countries, Bismark and Cavour to the contrary notwithstanding, the tendency is to rely more and more on popular good sense and on popular morality, on popular aspiration and on the national vitality, and not on individual genius, for the solution of great political problems.

But it is impossible not to see that along with this low estimate of the value of individual leaders there is creeping in also a low estimate of the value of individual character. The struggle through which we are passing is so severe, the danger to the national existence against which we are fighting is so great, and the necessity for union so strong, that we are getting into the habit of caring little for a public man's life and antecedents, provided that on the day of battle he keeps his place in the ranks and acts cheerfully with the mass; in other words, provided he shares our opinions, we are not disposed to enquire very closely into the reality of his conversion, supposing him to have been suddenly converted to our way of thinking. There have been numerous illustrations of this within the last three or four years. We could mention half a dozen very striking ones if we cared to be what the reporters call "invidious." The most prominent is Andrew Johnson himself. His loyalty to the Union during the war led people—and, we admit, not unnaturally—entirely to overlook his antecedents—his ignorance, his coarseness, his profanity, his foul-mouthed devotion to slavery during his whole public life; and not only to overlook these things, but to conclude that his loyalty indicated a radical extirpation of his faults. We now know that it indicated nothing of the kind, and that, all appearances to the contrary notwithstanding, Andrew Johnson of 1866 was just the Andrew Johnson of 1856, only somewhat older and more self-sufficient. We shall not run any further along the list, as we should be forced to speak evil of some other dignitaries whose shortcomings are not yet so apparent, and whose usefulness, whether it be little or much, we are unwilling to impair. The fate which has overtaken Henry Ward Beecher is, in a different way, an example also of the sternness with which the public is disposed to uphold at this crisis uniformity of political doctrine. Just as Mr. Johnson's previous bad education counted for nothing, as long as he held or appeared to hold sound opinions, so Mr. Beecher's good character counted for nothing when he fell suddenly into unsound ones. The one has labored through a long life for slavery, the other has labored through a long life for freedom; but their agreement on the question of reconstruction has caused them to be thrown overboard together, Beecher if anything being visited with the heartier reprobation.

This may seem expedient just at this crisis, but we are not afraid to say that we think in the long run it will be found that this mode of estimating public men is based on fatal error, and that if persevered in so as to become a fixed habit of the national mind, it will work more mischief than all the heterodox opinions in religion, morals, or politics that can be preached, we care not who preaches them. As we said some months ago, when discussing the prevalence of political personalities, the character of its public men, not their opinions, is the most valuable of a nation's possessions. Opinions pass, parties dissolve, platforms are abandoned, the wisdom of to-day becomes the foolishness of ten years hence, but character remains the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. No nation which cherished and maintained it has ever utterly perished. Territory may be lost, armies may dwindle, navies disappear, and wealth decay; but no people who have steadily insisted that, whatever their public men might lack, they should at least be truthful, courageous, high-minded; that, however they might differ from the majority in opinion, they should fear dishonor as a wound, and should approach the national service with clean hands, clean consciences, and dignity and self-respect, has ever been utterly brought to nought. It is of moral not political decline that nations die, and one of the symptoms of moral decline in all ages has been the indifference with which the people, having the power to prevent it, has witnessed the intrusion of knaves and humbugs and cheats into public offices. We have witnessed this spectacle in this country already, but it has never been witnessed by the great body of the people with indifference. The Democratic party was the first to treat character as if it were of no consequence in politics. The gross cynicism of the party on this point in its later and more desperate years was one of the most revolting phenomena of the contest from which we are just emerging. During the Buchanan administration this practice was elevated into a principle, until, by such appointments as Isaiah Rynders to the marshalship of the Southern District of New York, the party openly proclaimed that party fidelity would atone for any amount of ruffianism. But the Republicans, to their honor, fought against this as fervently as against slavery. The lax morality of the Democratic party and its contempt for character were almost as prominent a count in the indictment against it, and had nearly as much to do with its overthrow at the North, as its devotion to slavery. The whole country was shocked and disgraced two months ago by the election of a pugilist and gambler from this city to the House of Representatives. It was done by the votes of the ignorant foreigners; and can anybody wonder at it or severely blame the electors who knows that eight years previously they had seen the President of the United States appoint another rowdy, and a leader of rowdies, a pothouse bully, to one of the most responsible offices in the gift of the Government?

It may seem hard on Mr. Barnum to make his nomination the text for remarks of this sort. But we do not seek to place him in the same category with Rynders or Morrissey. We freely acknowledge that he has rendered some service to the anti-slavery cause in Connecticut; that he did good work on the right side during the war; that he is a friend of sobriety and good order; and that he has public spirit and is a good neighbor. But we shall never admit that a long career like his can be atoned for by merits of this kind. He is the personification—and, so far from concealing or denying it, he boasts of it—of a certain low kind of humbug; humbug so petty, and producing so little apparent mischief, that people are rather disposed to be utilitarian in their way of judging it, and smile at it. It is a kind of humbug, too, into which the Yankee "smartness," in its last and worst stages, appears to run naturally; but which, funny as it often appears, eats out the heart of religion and morality even more effectually than the display of great crimes or great vices, and which, if it were to spread, might easily end in presenting us with a community regular in its praying and singing, and decent in external crust, but in which all below was rottenness and uncleanness, in which the men were without truth and the women without virtue. He has passed his life in ransacking the world for curiosities to exhibit—or, in other words, as a "showman." We do not concur in the low estimate in which a showman's calling is popularly held. If it be honorable or instructive to go and see strange or queer things, it is honorable to collect and exhibit them; and if Barnum had confined himself to this, though we might not select him as a legislator, or like to see him sent to Congress by a New England State, we should not accuse him, as we now do, of having been for twenty or thirty years a depraving and demoralizing influence. His success in money-getting, so far from atoning for his offences, as those who have nominated him seem to think it does, only aggravates them; because it makes his example the more corrupting to the thousands of young men who leave home every year in New England with money-getting set before them as their mission in life. We all laugh over the woolly horse, the mermaids, the Circassian girl, and the dozen other devices to which he every year resorts to extract quarters from the country people who visit New York; and there has been so much laughing about it, and he himself joins in the laughing so readily, that we forget that it is simply swindling on a small scale, and that the spirit which prompts it and sustains it is the very same spirit which fills the jails with forgers and embezzlers and "sneak-thieves." What makes it all the more revolting, too, is his own efforts to deceive himself and his victims into the belief that he makes his trade moral by keeping up an appearance of respectability in his museum, and excluding all "indecent allusions or gestures," as he piously announces in his play-bills, from the stage of what, with all a humbug's deference for the prejudices of the religious world, he calls his "lecture room." We say nothing here of the intense and concentrated vulgarity—we do not use the word as the antithesis of "gentility"—of the atmosphere which surrounds him, though it ought to be, and we hope one day will be, when we have entered on a higher state of culture, an objection to a man who offers himself as a candidate for the national legislature. Nor would we dwell even on the knavishness of his career for the mere purpose of injuring his business, or trying to cure the depraved and debasing taste for monstrosities to which he so laboriously panders, knowing, as we do, how delighted he is with anything which increases his notoriety. One of the results of the growth of the periodical press and of the wide diffusion of reading is to create a class of which he is a good specimen, and who are well content to have their moral deformity exhibited to all comers as long as it makes the dollars flow into the till. But when a State which stands amongst the foremost in education, and ought to stand amongst the foremost in refinement, and which abounds in high culture, in high character, combined with both patriotism and eloquence, deliberately comes forward, and tells the world that the party of progress, of reform, can find in its borders no fitter representative of its ideas than the proprietor of the woolly horse and the bearded woman, it is time for people in whose eyes character is still a political force to speak their minds out, even at the risk of doing some political damage. Anybody who wants a good illustration of Mr. Barnum's career and calling can hardly do better than to visit his "lecture room," and witness the great "moral drama" of the "Christian Martyrs," which is now presented there to "delighted thousands." It is an affecting portrayal of Christian sufferings and constancy in the worst days of the pagan empire; the dresses are gorgeous, the pious rant is unexceptionable, and the scenery imposing; the martyrs are delivered in the arena to Van Amburgh's lions, brought up from the lower floor of the museum for their bloody work—and all for thirty cents a head. In the final tableau, Constantine's cross appears in the sky, and the Roman empire is converted amidst bursts of applause, whereupon the curtain falls and is seen to be covered thickly with puffs of "Horse Liniment," "Yahoo Bitters," "Ready Reliefs" and "Pain Extractors," and other quack medicines.

THE "RING" IN THE BOARD OF EDUCATION OF NEW YORK CITY.

THE N. Y. Times has been publishing a series of articles in the interest of the Board of Education and against the appointment of a commission. Confining itself to "glittering generalities" and the sentimental side of the subject, its remarks would bear with equal force against the Police, Fire, and Health Commissions, and even against the abolition of the Board of Supervisors, of all of which it is a warm advocate. In its issue of the 19th ult. it fairly caps the climax and shows how little it has looked at its own side of the question. The system, says this journal, is "not only good," "should be preserved," but "should be added to," it needs extension. Napoleon (the uncle) used to say, "Il n'y a rien d'impossible." Has The Times read the report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, published in its columns some three weeks since with great laudation? Mr. Superintendent—we beg pardon, Doctor Superintendent Randall states in his report to the Board of Education that the whole number of scholars taught in the public schools of this city during the last year was 222,527, an increase over the previous year of about 7,000. As he gave 219,747 as the number for that year, we cannot for the life of us make the increase more than 2,778 (the doctor commits a similar blunder in subtracting 857 from 986, making the remainder 1,210); but it is hardly fair, perhaps, to expect a Superintendent of Public Instruction, at a salary of $4,500 a year, to be familiar with the common rules of arithmetic.

The census of 1865 makes the number of children of both sexes and all colors between the ages of 5 and 15 to be 148,499; and between the ages of 5 and 20, 205,804, or 16,723 less than were taught in the public schools—a thing unparalleled in any part of the civilized world. How does The Times propose to extend the system? Is everybody to go to school? Where are the "thousands upon thousands that require training" and should be brought under the birch of the Board of Education? Does not The Times see that its philanthropy has been grossly imposed upon? Had it read Doctor Randall's report by the light of the census, its article of the 19th would never have been written.

That the doctor is perfectly serious in the magnificent figures in which he deals, take the following from his report, though the statement about the pleasurable emotions of tax-payers is the reverse of true. It is, in fact, rather a severe joke on the sufferings of an oppressed community. Poor men, or those comparatively poor, it is well known pay the largest proportional share of the taxes; and that poor men will be delighted at seeing two millions and a half—sure soon, under the present system, to be three or four millions—extracted from their pockets, is more than doubtful.

> "Instead of an annual expenditure of less than $5,000, contributed from private or corporate funds, nearly $2,500,000 are annually contributed by the tax-payers of the city, and cheerfully and ungrudgingly placed at the disposal of the Board of Education. Instead of about a hundred pupils, gleaned from the overflowing of the parochial charity schools, we have 200,000 bright, cheerful faces, representing the homes and the firesides of the rich and the poor, without discrimination or distinction of class, color, or religion."

Considering that the Catholics profess to educate some 25,000 children, and that some 27,000 attend private schools, we respectfully ask what is the vaunted system of the Hub of the Universe, or the Prussian system, or the system of the Central Flowery Kingdom, where learning is the key to all preferment, compared to the New York system as administered by the Board of Education and puffed by the Superintendent of Public Instruction Randall for so small a slice of the two and a half million dollars? The serious side of the doctor's figures is, that for every one of the 222,527 children eight dollars are extracted from the tax-payers' pockets; and the Board of Education is now asking the Legislature to increase the amount to eleven dollars per scholar, which will add some $600,000 to the next year's taxes!

The Board of Education allots to the local boards a per capita wherewith to pay teachers' salaries other than principals and vice-principals, which is eight dollars for primary school scholars; for grammar school, males fifteen dollars and females twelve dollars each—the great source of fraud. But now an entirely new set of figures make their appearance, 74,257 being the sum total—26,359 in grammar schools and 47,898 in primary schools and departments.

The amount received by the Board of Education from the city during the past year was $2,454,327 54; of this it expended $2,420,883 86. Taking from this the expenses of the colored schools (six grammar and seven primary schools, with 731 scholars, costing $31,846 53, or $43 57 per scholar), the expense of the Free Academy—we should say the "College of the City of New York"—the Normal, Evening, and Corporate schools, we have some $2,160,639 27, on which are supported 92 grammar schools with 26,359 pupils, and 88 primary schools with 47,898 pupils, at an average cost of $29 09. The great leak in the system, through which the money runs with marvellous velocity, is in the

GRAMMAR SCHOOLS.

The large number of grammar schools—many of them worthless—is the result of the present system of school government, growing out of ward rivalries and a desire for patronage. Of the 48 male schools distributed over the city, the attendance, 13,896 (nominal), is divided as follows:

3 less than 100; 10 over 100 and less than 200; 12 over 200 and less than 250; 7 over 250 and less than 300; 4 over 300 and less than 350; 5 over 350 and less than 400; 4 over 400 and less than 500; 1 over 500; 1 over 600; 1 over 1,000.

Eight of the larger schools, having nearly one-third of all the pupils, cost $150,679 13, or $35 05 per scholar, while forty, with an average attendance of 250, cost $427,807 08, or $45 03 per scholar. Of female grammar schools the number is 44, with a nominal attendance of 12,463, divided as follows:

8 over 100 and less than 150; 5 over 150 and less than 200; 12 over 200 and less than 250; 4 over 250 and less than 300; 3 over 300 and less than 350; 3 over 350 and less than 400; 4 over 400 and less than 450; 2 over 450 and less than 500; 3 over 500.

Nine of these have over one-third of the whole attendance and cost $102,891 42, or $23 80 per scholar; and thirty-three, with an average attendance of 245, cost $267,098 05, or $45 68 per scholar. Under the present system the cost per scholar, as will be seen by the following tables, differs not only in every ward but in every school in the same ward, whereas, if properly managed, there should be a uniform cost throughout the city:

The Board of Education, instead of converting most of the grammar schools into primaries, has lowered the grade of the primaries to relieve them and fill up the grammar schools. Thus the two lower and largest classes are properly primary classes, the grammar school course beginning in the fourth grade, there being but six in the course. If these two lower classes and those below even the present low standard were taken out, the actual male grammar school attendance would be about 9,000, which could be easily accommodated in nine or at most ten school buildings. One school has at present over 1,000, and with the whole building at command could have 1,500. The same is true of the girls' grammar school. Eighteen or at most twenty buildings would provide for both male and female schools, leaving some forty or more departments for the use of the now overcrowded primaries, beside saving $249,700 to the city in the salaries of principals and vice-principals. This would render it unnecessary to buy lots and erect new and expensive school-houses; and certain patriotic individuals who serve the city for nothing could make nothing out of it.

The smaller grammar schools are generally worse than useless. The principal and teachers dare not exercise a proper control over the pupils, fearing they may leave the school (which they do not hesitate to threaten on occasion), and thus lessen the average attendance, on which the salaries are paid. In many of them the pupils are sent after absentees to beg them "just to come up and report," so they can be counted. A large portion of their yearly attendance is made up in this way. All sorts of bribes are used to induce children to come, besides letting them out early, etc. The children are retarded in their studies to retain them in the school, and in many the same children have filled the higher classes for years. The evil of these small schools is so evident that even the Board of Education some two years since appointed a committee to examine and consolidate them, but except in one or two of the worst cases the attempt failed, the local officers and teachers possessing too much influence to be molested.

A glance at Dr. Randall's figures will show that by far the larger portion of the children never enter the grammar schools, and most of those who do generally leave when through the two lower grades. All the education for which the children of the laborer and mechanic can afford the time must be obtained in the primary schools. It ought to be such that it could be built upon in after life by the pupils themselves, should opportunity offer. These are really the important schools of the city, and should have the care and attention which are wasted on the higher departments. Unfortunately, they differ in cost and quality in every ward and in every school. The school officers, like all other municipal officers elected by the people, have been constantly descending in the scale. Some of the trustees can hardly write their name in the visitor's book, some murder the People's English and have not even a conception of grammar, while some have even been seen drunk in the schools. One principal stated he was more sure of his position by patronizing the groggeries of his officers (all of whom but one were in the liquor business) than by attending to his school. The teachers appointed by these men have about the same social standing, and not unfrequently the teachers prefer men for officers who cannot criticise their acquirements. For a few years after the passage of the present school law some of the most respectable citizens filled the offices; but the city officials soon found there was a placer to be worked at their very doors equal to any to be found on the Pacific coast. Since then we have seen them, from alderman down, familiar as they are with all the jobbery and corruption found in other branches of the city government, devoting themselves to the cause of public education.

The members of both boards, most of whom have no social standing, are nominated by irresponsible conventions, composed, in most instances, of the lowest political characters in the ward or district, on strict party grounds, are voted for with the regular party ticket, most of the voters not even knowing their names. That the vote cast for the school ticket should be rarely more than, and often under, one-half the regular vote of the city, shows how slight is the interest the public take in the matter; and, with few exceptions, the worst candidate is elected. The boards are thus essentially political in character, and in all important matters their action is of the same stamp. Few of the men composing either of them could be appointed by any responsible power. Even our jocular friend, of the New York bar, who made such a piteous appeal for the present order of things at the Steinway Hall meeting (which took the whole time of one of the clerks of the Board of Education for three weeks to get up), failed to be elected by the people, and owes his present connection with the system to an appointment by the mayor.

A few years since the clerk of the Board was a gentleman well qualified, competent, and efficient. His salary was $2,000, with apartments in the hall of the Board. He was turned out, and the present incumbent, a member of the previous year, a Democrat and city official, was elected to the place. Besides the advantages of the situation, which are great and expansive, the salary has gradually reached the modest sum of six thousand five hundred dollars ($6,500), $5,000 as clerk of the Board and $1,500 as clerk of the Trustees of the "College of New York" (the two concerns being identical)—a salary $500 more than a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, $3,000 more than that of a judge of the Supreme Court of the State, $1,500 more than that of the Governor of the State of New York, and even greater by one-fifth than that of the Clerk to the Common Council! Two other former members of the Board now fill lucrative positions in its gift.

That worthy Christian gentleman and scholar, Commissioner JAMES L. MILLER, an employee in the Street Commissioner's Department at $3,000 a year, not only devotes all his own time to the cause of education, but has a son enlisted in the same work as clerk under the Board at $2,000 a year; another son—a builder—aids the Board by doing odd jobs in his trade; a son-in-law does the same in stationery, and a daughter teaches in the public schools—a patriotic and philanthropic family. Commissioner JAMES W. FARR gives his own time gratis, and that of his son for the yearly stipend of $1,350; and Commissioner WILSON SMALL gives that of his son, Small WILSON, at the paltry cost to the public of $1,100 per annum.

An examination for some years back of the composition of the committees of the Board will show that, on all those affording an opportunity of turning an "honest penny," the same names—and those not the best—occur year after year, the better class of men appearing on those where there are no opportunities to be used. Some two or three years ago a gentleman experienced in educational matters, a professor in the leading college of the city, was accidentally elected commissioner from one of the up-town wards. On his appearance at the Board he was quietly shelved with the appointment of Foreign Corresponding Secretary, a genuine sinecure. Being asked in relation to the existence of a "Ring" in the Board, "Why, you knock your head against it when you enter the room," was the reply. Two years since a law was passed by the Legislature, at the instigation of the Board of Education, taking from the trustees the power of spending more than twenty dollars a month. One of the oldest and most efficient school officers in the city (who has long advocated a commission) said to the clerk of the Board in his office: "It is very fine to talk of the boards of school officers; the reform should begin here; this place is a sink of corruption; the bottom is out of it." The social, moral, and intellectual status of the two Boards is about that of the Boards of Aldermen and Councilmen. There are good men in all of them, but they are powerless. But over the Board of Education there is no control, no veto power whatever. They are responsible to no one, are complete masters of the situation, and can spend what they please.

The most respectable portion of both boards favor a commission, and those of them who oppose it are endeavoring to be appointed commissioners, should the bill now before the committee become a law. Even the clerk of the Board above referred to has been circulating a petition, to be signed by the teachers, asking his appointment as one of the commissioners. What an improvement such a commission would be!

Will the gentlemen in the Legislature from the rural districts, in consideration for what the city contributes to support schools throughout the State, look into this matter through their own eyes, not through the glasses the Board of Education would fasten on their noses, and see whether they would support schools in their own districts at half the expense which many of those here entail on the city, and how long they or their constituents would tolerate such a concern? Gratuitous service has proved to be the worst service the city receives, and is always a fraud on the tax-payers. Witness the Board of Supervisors. The clumsy contrivance which governs the schools is no exception to the rule. Let us have a few men to the manor born (not, if possible, appointed at Albany) fairly paid to devote their entire time to the work, and giving bonds proportionate to the trust confided for its faithful performance; a fixed amount for clerical aid; high schools, limited in number by law, so that no influence will avail to retain any beyond those strictly necessary; a higher grade for the primaries, and some check against unnecessary appropriations of the public funds.

PARIS, Feb. 8, 1867.

THE late bad weather, however much it may interfere with the Parisian passion for showing off finery in the open air, has no perceptible effect on the gayeties which form the most serious occupation of a Parisian winter. Dinners, soirées, balls, the opera, theatres, and lectures under the name of "conferences" (as inappropriate a designation as that adopted by Anglo-Saxons) are in the full flow of the usual stream of dissipation that constitutes a Parisian season. The American colony, very numerous this winter, and expecting to be reinforced in the course of the coming spring by 80,000 fellow-citizens from the other side of the Atlantic, is not only enjoying itself immensely in the way of dinners and soirées, but is doing a thriving business in the matrimonial line, to the vast vexation of French mammas having daughters to dispose of. To the long list of noble game already bagged by American sportswomen must now be added the bringing down by fair Miss Curtis of young Count de Talleyrand, one of the most brilliant partis of the matrimonial field of to-day. The count's lineage is aristocratic enough to satisfy the yearnings of the most republican belle: he is the eldest son of the Duke de Dino, nephew of the Duke de Valençay and of the Marchioness de Castellane, first cousin of the Prince of Sagan, and grandson of the famous Duchess of Talleyrand, Princess of Sagan, daughter of the Duke of Courland who died only three years ago, and whose beauty, intelligence, and grace made her for so many years the queen of Parisian fashion, and of whom Madame de Staël so often said that she would give the half of her lifetime to change places with her. The young count has lately come back from Mexico, where he had gained promotion and honors in the French expeditionary corps. On his return, he went at once to Nice to see his father, and there made the acquaintanceship that is about to convert a daughter of the great Republic into the future Duchess de Dino. Several other American beauties are making a sensation in the gay circles of this cosmopolitan capital, and are likely to carry off heavy prizes, thus sharing the run of matrimonial luck with several of the leading actresses of the day, among whom Mademoiselle Taglioni has just married a cousin of the King of Prussia; Mlle. Kreutzer, Prince Paul de Taxis, of one of the noblest houses of Germany; Mlle. Fontelive, the Prince of Thurn and Taxis; and Mlle. Charlotte Wolter, "the German Rachel," Count Charles O'Sullivan. What an importation of the red blood of ordinary humanity into houses in whose veins only the bluest of blue blood has been flowing for centuries!

The society of political economy, headed by Messrs. Michel Chevalier and Wolowski, who took so leading a part in the elaboration of the Anglo-French treaty of commerce, have given a grand banquet to Mr. Gladstone. The affair passed off most successfully. The two leading apostles of free trade in France made excellent speeches; and Mr. Gladstone delivered an oration which, though he committed the solecism of speaking English, seems to have completely won the hearts of his auditors by the extremely attractive delivery which has made him very popular as a speaker in his own country.

A number of literary and artistic dinners have taken place at Brébant's restaurant—one, composed of the friends of a late well-known artist, who, before his death, promised his friends to come back to this sublunary sphere on the first Friday of every month, and to dine with them. Another was got up by a group of authors and actors of repute, eager to profit by the culinary indications furnished in such profusion by Baron Brisse; while a third, whose forty-two guests included Meissonier, Gudin, Achard, Frère, Hamon, Jules Janin, Jouvin, Dumas Jr., and a host of equally eminent artists and men of letters, was given to Hébert, the painter, on his appointment to the directorship of the French school of painting at Rome. At one of these banquets, the Marquis de Créqui, a connoisseur in all that regards the dinner-table, expressed his regretful surprise at the disappearance from modern repasts of various dainties in vogue a century ago, and expatiated especially on the excellence of a robin-red-breast pie, immensely in favor at that epoch, but now unknown. This pie, which the marquis remembered to have eaten at his grandmother's table, and which he declared to be "the most delicate eating he had ever been favored with," was the favorite dainty of her friend, the famous Cardinal de Grèves; equally well known for his oddities, his benevolence, and his love of good cheer. The cardinal, who was very fond of cards, was never known to play for money, but he had no scruple in playing for a bushel of tender young peas in mid-winter, or for a bottle of Schiraz wine, at 300 francs the bottle, or for any other rare and costly delicacy. If he won, the cardinal accepted, and dined on these gastronomic wagers; if he lost, he paid the winner with a copy of his sermons, splendidly printed and embellished, with magnificent binding and gilt-edged leaves, fifty copies of which he always took with him wherever he went, with a prudent eye to such eventualities. It is recorded of this prince of the Church that having one day to cross a forest with his secretary and servants, the party were surrounded by the renowned brigand-band of Cartouche, and that the latter, having learned the quality of his captive, generously set the entire party at liberty without ransom; whereupon the cardinal, perceiving that there still remained about half of a red-breast pasty, on which the brigands had been lunching, requested Cartouche to complete the courtesy of his conduct by giving him the remains of the pasty and a bottle of the excellent wine with which they had been washing it down. To which request, Cartouche replied by inviting the cardinal with his attendants to join him at table; giving him to understand that he would only part with the pie in exchange for the honor of eating with his lordship. The struggle in the cardinal's mind appears to have been severe; but the sense of dignity carried the day, and the ecclesiastical grandee went on his way, leaving the brigands to the enjoyment of the envied delicacy. The prosaic gourmets who dine together every week, at forty francs per head, under the auspices of the great culinary oracle, Baron Brisse, are about to treat themselves to this dainty of a past era, utterly regardless of the poetic associations which should suffice to protect the "wee birdie" so prone to seek the companionship of man. It is bad enough to be obliged to eat fowls and pigeons, but a line must be drawn somewhere; and who that has his nervous centre out of his stomach would not prefer dining on a piece of dry bread rather than on the trustful little visitor the description of which, in his work on "Natural History," Buffon so odiously winds up by remarking that "this affectionate little songster is eaten roasted, with bread-crumbs?"

Maurice Sand has just come out with a delightful book entitled "The World of Butterflies," containing sixty-two exquisite illustrations from the author's pencil of the improvident beauties of which he treats. The illustrious "George" has contributed a charming preface to her son's book, and an admirable letter on "The Mystery of the Beautiful in Creation," intercalated into the text of the work. "The magnificence of the creation," she writes, "consists in its wisdom, in the unity of its plan, and in the variety of its combinations. You will only understand the Creator (in so far as it is given to man to understand him), on condition of leaving in your mind the smallest possible amount of ignorance in regard to the world which you inhabit."

The admirers of Michelet will be glad to learn that his last work, "L'Oiseau," is being illustrated by Giacomelli, the eminent artist, who has so ably performed the same office for those other favorite works of the same author, "La Mer" and "L'Insecte."

The question as to whether M. Ponsard will or will not be allowed to produce his new play of "Galileo," against which the whole clerical party is working as one man, is still undecided, the general opinion being that the Emperor will, at last, throw his influence into the scale on behalf of the rights of history and common sense. George Sand is dramatizing her beautiful novel, "Mont Revêche," for the Odêon. M. Emile de Girardin, with a group of friends, including the impresario who is about to bring out his new play, "A Millionaire's Daughter," is making the round of all the theatres of the capital, for the purpose of selecting actresses to represent the characters of the forthcoming play, on which the ex-editor of La Presse is understood to count for his glorification as a dramatist, his claim to which distinction is by no means so generally recognized as the vanity of the well-known journalist would like it to be. Mademoiselle Déjazet, the oldest actress on the European stage (she is considerably over seventy), and still, for vivacity, grace, and agility, one of the youngest (she plays the parts of ingenuous young heroines of "sweet sixteen"), came near killing herself a few nights since, on the boards of her own pretty little theatre. Tripping across the stage in her usual airy way, she inadvertently got her foot entangled in the long train of another actress, and came heavily to the ground, her forehead striking against a projecting point of the wainscoting. The veteran juvenile was taken up insensible and carried from the stage amidst a chorus of expressions of alarm and regret on the part of the audience, who took it for granted that she had received some serious injury; but a quarter of an hour afterwards she reappeared as smiling and, apparently, as sound as ever, and resumed her part amidst the acclamations of the spectators. The great event, however, of the theatrical world during the past fortnight has been the appearance of Miss Cora Pearl, one of the leading "lionesses" of the demi-monde, as Cupid in Offenbach's famous extravaganza of "Orphée aux Enfers," at the Bouffes, the approaches to which theatre were literally clogged up on the night in question with the carriages of princes, dukes, marquises, counts, barons, and untitled notabilities of all sorts, female as well as male. All that considers itself "virtuous" here has been, of course, in a state of fury at the furore created by this whim of the siren in question; but the tide of fashion is strong in this region, and the adorers of Miss Cora have shown that they possessed, at least, "the courage of their opinion." The new Cupid was once the most beautiful of blue-eyed houris; she is now ugly; she lacks grace and charm, and speaks French with a strong English accent anything but pleasing. But she is the mischievous Circe who has absorbed innumerable fortunes, ruined the peace of innumerable ménages, turned the heads of innumerable fools, and excited as long a list of the baser passions of envy, hatred, and jealousy as any woman living; and, accordingly, all the "fast men" here congregated, a goodly number of "fast" women, and a few women of repute with whom curiosity proved stronger than anger, made up a compact "cram" to witness the début of the "Pearl." The latter made her appearance arrayed principally in diamonds, with which she seemed all atwinkle from top to toe, even to the buttons of her buskins, which were composed of the same precious stones. Such is the madness of Miss Cora's devotees that a golden key (probably only gilded) which she carried in one of the scenes was bought by one of them for 450fr., and another had actually offered 50,000fr. for her buskins, whether with or without the buttons aforesaid, does not appear. The lady's performance was sufficiently poor, but she is said to persist in her determination to adopt the theatrical line; and the other actresses of the Bouffes, enraged at the influence of the interloper with M. Vacollier, the manager of that popular little theatre, have revenged themselves by giving him the title of "Var-Collier de Perle."

While the demi-monde has thus been turning the rest of the world upside down, the grandees of the official and aristocratic spheres are going wild over a troubadour, a young kineherd of Poitou, just discovered by the Marquis de Coral, son-in-law of Marquis d'Audiffret, who has brought back the youth with him, on his return from that remote province, and is now showing him off at the Duchess Tascher de la Pagerie's and other salons of equal brilliancy and renown. This young man is not only a living repository of all the old songs of France, but possesses a wonderful gift of improvisation. At the Duchess Tascher's, a few evenings ago, after he had charmed the distinguished company with his songs, some one gave him a paper containing a list of the most absurd and impossible words, with a request that he would find rhymes for them, and so work them up into verse; and this he did, without a moment's hesitation, to the admiration of all present. A lady then requested him to compose a poem on the cold weather which had then got us in its grip; the young man thereupon declaimed a really charming composition, into which he introduced the tragic event that had just occurred on the ice at Regent's Park, and various scenes of real life, some of which, painting the distress of the poor at these seasons of exceptional severity, were so vivid and so touching as to draw tears from the listeners.

Frederick Mistral, the grand Languedocian poet, who, like the late poet, Jasmin of Aglu, writes only in the old Provençal tongue—so much finer and more delicate, say those who understand it, than the modern French—has just published a new poem, "Calendal," said to be even finer than those which have preceded it, but as utterly unintelligible for the mass of the French people as though it were written in Greek or Hebrew.

A furious battle has sprung up between the more advanced chiefs of the old Republican party and the priests, the former having proposed a national subscription of ten sous per head for the erection of a statue to Voltaire. Imagine the outcry provoked by such a proposition!

An ingenious coiffeur of the Rue Vivilune has just invented a wig of real gold, which he gallantly declares will supply the nimbus with which nature intended, but forgot, to crown the female head; and offers his services to decorate his fair customers in the same style for evening parties.

The Red, White, and Blue is coming over here for the Exhibition, and will be shown in the basin of the fountain of the Pompeiian Palace, in the Avenue Montaigne; and an American company has engaged to keep a ship, during the Exhibition, at a distance of three nautical miles from the French shore; the said ship to be fitted up as a restaurant and boarding-house, and devoted to the exercise of all the games of hazard which the French Government, in its paternal solicitude for the well-being of its subjects, has made illegal on the soil of France.

TARIFFS ON CULTURE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

I do not find time to read The Nation as promptly and regularly as I would wish, and therefore I have only now had the opportunity to see the assault on the proposed tariff on books in your number for February 21. I entertain too sincere a respect for the ability and influence of The Nation to feel inclined to leave uncontradicted the statements you have made, believing that, had you examined the subject more thoroughly, some, at least, of the assertions and conclusions put forth would have been withheld.

We have spent some $3,500,000,000 in vindicating the principles of republican democracy and freedom, and we should not wince in paying the bill. We propose to raise some $500,000,000 per annum for that purpose, and such a revenue cannot be exacted without entering into the cost of every product of human labor. To this books can form no exception. I observe that I pay you five dollars for a year's subscription, and I do not grudge the money, for no outlay brings me in a fuller return; though I know that but for the war I could have enjoyed the same amount of instructive reading for three dollars. Yet as your journal is local and cannot be exposed to competition from abroad, you are independent of tariffs and can serenely suggest the sweeping into the sea of unfortunate book publishers, or their swamping under the torrent of foreign importations. I cannot but think that, like the goat in Phædrus, you take some advantage of your position.

I am paying to-day to my printers and paper-makers quite twice the rates that I did before the war, and I must necessarily ask for my goods an increased price. Unlike most other manufacturers, I have not advanced my prices proportionately. For three or four years I have been doing business on a smaller percentage of profit than of old, and those profits are realized in a depreciated currency, of which the purchasing power, as you know, bears a very unpleasant comparison with that of specie in former times. I can endure all this patiently, for I know that in dealing with the inevitable patience is the only philosophy, and I am cheerfully content to bear my full share of the common burden; but when even this is threatened by the rising tide of importations patience is no longer in place, and I feel that I have a right to ask that the same necessities of revenue which enhance everything which I purchase shall likewise enhance the price of that which I have to sell.

The tariff of 1856 levied, I believe, a duty of eight per cent. ad valorem on books. I never troubled myself about it, for I could manufacture nearly as cheap as our English competitors, and I feel quite able to take care of myself when the odds against me are not too great. If now you could abolish taxation, you might, so far as my business is concerned, abolish duties, and I will engage to manufacture books and sell them in competition with England in any market in the world. When I am weighted down, however, I ask that my rival be not admitted to the race-course without some fraction of his share of avoirdupois.

Having said so much for myself and my brethren of the "trade," I freely admit that literature and learning are to be dealt with on higher considerations than the pecuniary advantage of a class, whether large or small, and had I not considered that the action of those who have been endeavoring to modify the tariff has been directed to the common benefit, I would not have ventured to undertake its defence. I think that you will hardly deny that, in the long run and on general principles, the interests of readers, authors, and publishers are identical, just as are those of labor and capital, however discordant they may appear in special cases. All patent and copyright laws are founded upon this conviction. If authors and publishers make money, the public will be supplied with abundance of reading matter; if they are starved, the starvation will extend to the minds of readers. Mr. Alexander

Strahan, in a very candid letter addressed to the London Bookseller of Jan. 31, 1866, boasted that the existing condition of affairs would soon result in there no more being an English and American edition of the same book than there now is an English and Irish. As all American books of note are now reprinted in England, the fulfilment of this prophecy, which you are doing what you can to bring about, means that no books but a few school manuals and local magazines will be published here. I leave you to estimate what, under such circumstances, would be the intellectual progress and culture for which you make so vigorous a plea. If publishing and authorship are prosperous, the higher education and training are stimulated. In the present exceptional condition of business, a moderate degree of protection is a Mæcenas whose encouragement of literature entails no sacrifice of personal independence.

This leads me to consider the measure of that protection for which we have asked, and to see whether, even granting your view of the matter, it would prove so disastrous to the best interests of culture as you assume that it would be. You assert that the proposed duty of 25 cents per pound weight on recent English books and 10 cents per pound on old and foreign books "is all but prohibitory." I cannot but think that you have accepted without due examination the assertion of some interested party, for I am sure that you would not knowingly make so palpable a misrepresentation, especially as your remarks are directed not to the novels, poetry, books of travels, etc., which are likely to be reprinted here, and for which you profess no particular interest, but to the higher order of works suited to the scholar, for which there is no large demand anywhere.

In comparing a specific with an ad valorem duty, it is necessary to premise that in London the ordinary "trade discount," or deduction from the retail price of books, is 25 per cent. I can make special arrangements with English publishers for editions of popular works, which would otherwise be reprinted here, and can purchase them at very low prices, for the English publishers are eagerly seeking to control our markets and break down competition; but when I order a few copies of a book, I am obliged to be content with the 25 per cent. Now, I have weighed a number of English books, and I find that 25 cents per pound in gold will average less than twenty (20) per cent. upon the net wholesale price which I pay in London. This surely is no prohibitory duty, and it is even less than the existing tariff of 25 per cent. On old books and foreign books the proposed duty of 10 cents per pound is scarcely more than nominal—hardly, indeed, sufficient to pay the cost of collection. It is, as you cannot but see, an enormous diminution of the existing impost, and was especially designed to encourage the formation of libraries and to stimulate that higher culture on which so much of the future destinies of the Republic depends.

On the books, therefore, in which you specially and properly feel an interest, the proposed tariff is far more liberal than the present one. Indeed, those earnest students and men of science whose cause you plead will rarely even have to draw the purse-strings to pay this reduced rate of 25 cents per pound, for nearly all the works of the high class which they require are German and French, and these they will be able to obtain at the lowest and almost nominal rate. In addition to this, libraries and other public institutions are authorized to import copies of books for their own use free of duty.

On the other class of publications, the lighter and more ephemeral literature, which comes into competition with American authors and publishers, the working of the proposed specific rate, low as it is, will increase the duty somewhat, and for this we have striven. We have felt for some time that on books of this class there was no protection afforded by an ad valorem rate. Mr. Odell, the late Naval Officer of New York, I am told, declared it to be his experience that in importations of books undervalued invoices were the rule and honest ones the exception. Mr. Strahan, in the letter alluded to above, was obliging enough to explain how the English publisher could employ a third party to stand between him and his New York branch, and receive and make out invoices at nominal rates. No appraiser can be expected to know the "market value at the place of exportation" of such articles as books, and the unanimous testimony of experienced custom house officials is that the only way to avoid frauds upon the revenue is to levy specific duties on every article capable of being so rated. Why we have been anxious to obtain a specific rate on books you can perhaps understand when I have it on good authority that in the negotiations between the various bookselling interests, resulting in the plan proposed, the importers offered to make no opposition to a duty of 75 per cent. ad valorem if we would abandon a specific rate which, as I have shown above, only amounts to about 20 per cent. on the ordinary English wholesale prices.

No manufacturing interest, I suspect, has approached Congress with so moderate a claim for protection, or one in which the interests of the consumer were more carefully guarded. I think it hard, therefore, that you should hold the publishers up to public detestation as men who are virtually conspiring against the best interests of the republic.

Very respectfully,

A PUBLISHER.

[We do not blame publishers, any more than any other men who have money invested in a business, for doing what they can to prevent themselves from being ruined by taxes and foreign competition. Our remarks, too, in the article referred to, applied to paper-makers just as much as to publishers. But we do maintain that in all the legislation of the last six years Congress has considered the interests of book manufacturers exclusively, and paid no attention to those of readers and authors, and habitually refuses to consider any side of literature but the material side. We do not know what "A Publisher" calls "prohibitory," but we can only say that as long as the dollar now counts only for fifty cents on every book we import, anything added to this—even five per cent.—is "well-nigh prohibitory," and does stop importation on the part of the great body of readers. We have no desire to see all American books published in England. It would be a great misfortune; and so far from trying to bring it about, we are doing what we can to prevent it. We therefore object to all legislation which has no better object than to punish Mr. Alexander Strahan for his foolish speeches; and we warn American publishers that the only true and lasting foundation for their business is the prevalence of high culture in America. Nothing strikes so severe a blow at native publishers as anything which retards or prevents the growth of original native thinkers and writers—and nothing does this as much as dear books.—ED. NATION.]

CLASSICAL AND SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Under this heading I alluded, last week, to a few questions which the public mind is beginning or has begun to ask in regard to our American college system. There are other enquiries on the same subject that no less urgently demand an answer.

For example, the college degrees are becoming an open question. Does the bachelor's diploma mean all it says, and does one small head carry all the knowledge which that parchment warrants to the bearer? To be sure, he is usually a bachelor (all the better for him, since Heaven help him if he has a family to support on the strength of what he has learned in college), but is he all the rest of it? Of course we do not pretend to know, for it is all in Latin. It is very wicked (the missionary agents tell us) for the Popish priests to talk to the people in an unknown tongue, but of course it is pardonable in the colleges. And does the master's degree mean that the young man is a master of all arts, or of any, or is it merely a reward of merit for having consented to live in this sinful world for three years after graduating?

Even the very classics have been desecrated, and the questions which Sydney Smith asked are again demanding the answer which they did not receive in his day. Shall our youth always be offered up on the classical altar? Have the classics the pre-eminence, nay, the monopoly, that is claimed for them as a disciplinary study or a means of culture? What powers of the mind do they strengthen? The memory first, no doubt, and next the power of forgetting. For no unaided faculty of oblivion could enable the student so thoroughly to discharge himself of his linguistic attainments as do our undergraduates in the course of two years. Do Latin and Greek enlarge the powers of observation, of abstraction, of generalization, of ratiocination? Power of language and precision of expression, doubtless, they may give, if the pupil is taught to transfer the exact idea of his author into clear, terse, elegant English. But of what fraction of one per cent. of our students is this true? Power of confining the attention and the general improvement of character that come from diligent occupation and the conquest of difficulties the classics may give, if the pupil does not interline his text-book with the vernacular, copied from the Oxford translations. But if he does so interline, is it not idle to talk about discipline? and if in addition he does this by stealth, what is the bearing of the process upon his character and his morals? Text books shd. be supplied in the class room by the college.

Is not this fact very significant as to the effect on the mind of the pupil? Our young men at the most susceptible period of their lives are daily reading the narratives of the most debasing actions, the deification of drunkenness and lust, and reading books which would be indicted if printed in English, and dwelling on scenes against which the early Christian teachers warned their disciples, and yet we cannot see that their morals are affected. We ask the teachers with some solicitude, and they reassure us by saying, "Really, the fact is, that the boys understand so little what they read, and enter so slightly into its spirit, that it does them no harm."* The defence may be perfect as against the particular charge, but how far does it better the case for the classics? It reminds us of the reply made by Deacon ——, of Bellingham, Mass., in the days when a brisk trade was carried on there in the manufacture of guns to be sent to the Northwest and bartered with the Indians for furs. The good man, willing to turn an honest penny, had just completed a considerable consignment with the barrels made of cast-iron. One of his brethren expostulated with him. "How could you do so, deacon? Why, they will burst and send the poor creatures into eternity." "Brother," said the deacon, with an air of injured rectitude, blended with holy complacency, "I was particular to guard against that very danger. I made them all without any touch-holes."

Is it reasonable to suppose, men will ask, that because the classics were a great aid, were (if you choose) the chief instrument, three or four centuries ago, in the enlightenment of the human mind, they are as indispensable now? Does not all the most valuable food for the human mind to-day lie outside of the classics: to wit, history, science, metaphysics, belles-lettres, and ethics?

And is the same exclusive deference due to the classics as in the ages when they were the repository and vehicle of all knowledge? Because the stage-coach, the packet-ship, the canal boat, the flail, the distaff, the bow and arrows, the arquebus, the flint-lock were of unspeakable value once, must we devote years to learning their use now? Was it not, indeed, for being in advance of their times that we honor the classical authors, and shall we show our admiration for them now by falling behind our own times? Are we not most truly pupils of Aristotle and Plato and Socrates when we practise original enquiry and abandon obsolete traditions?

Is it not, moreover, a very unfair mode of argument that is applied to this question? When it is asked what is the power of the established curriculum and of classical lore to enlarge the human understanding, we are pointed to men who have been thus educated, and then to the men who have had no education at all, and we are complacently desired to compare the two classes. Now, it appears to us, O learned men! that if this were done by anybody but you, we should consider it the grossest sophistry. We know very well that any employment of the mind is better than mental stagnation. But the real question is between this learning and that which men might have gained at the same cost of time and labor. It is not, if we understand the matter, between going by stage and limping on foot, but between the stage-coach and the lightning express. The precise question which we wish answered is this: Would or would not the six, eight, or ten best years of youth, now demanded for Latin or Greek, be better employed in learning something of the marvellous works of God in history, in science, and in the world of mind?

We hope that we shall not be persistently misunderstood. We do not wish to ignore or exclude classical study. We know that there are men whose genius points unmistakably to attainments in this direction, and for whose future labors such pursuits are invaluable. We want to have our clergyman go as far back as he can to the original sources of the doctrines which he teaches. The more he knows of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Aramaic the better.

To forbid men to study the classics would be as despotic as to compel them to do so. We believe in entire liberty of choice. Because we think that we can get a better knowledge of the English tongue by the study of our best English writers,* is no reason why we should forbid you to besiege English by the gradual approaches of Sanscrit, Greek, and the Gothic tongues. Only, pray allow us the same liberty that we concede to you, and do not compel us to forego all the treasures of knowledge, or, as an indispensable condition, to wade through year upon year of classical superficiality. If we cannot be educated men, and know all about the difference between ει και and και ει, at least do not prevent us from being such ignorant men as George Stephenson, Hugh Miller, and Abraham Lincoln.

Just such enquiries as these, men unlearned, perhaps, but not wholly devoid of common sense, are making. The question is open. And the next query addressed the boards of our colleges, we apprehend, will be: "Will you, the guardians of high public education, in your colleges teach us and our sons what we want to learn and must learn, or shall we, after having endowed you with the wealth that our own labors have earned, begin anew and establish institutions that shall afford to those of us who do not choose a learned profession an education in the line of our favorite avocation?"

Such is the utterance of the unclassical and uncollegiate world. And if from them an appeal is made to the men who have tested in their own lives the time-honored classical course, and if we ask their judgment in the premises, we know of one, at least, who would reply, "Haud ignarus loquor," or, in the more idiomatic language of the Bowery, "I have been there." I began at the age of eight years to pursue the study of Latin, which was speedily followed by its cousin Greek. Ten of the best years of youth were passed in their study, under teachers of deserved eminence, and with every advantage for attainment in these departments. Subsequently, at different periods, nearly as much time has been spent in communicating the same knowledge to others. Meanwhile, not a day or an hour passes that I am not harassed, mortified, and crippled for want of the knowledge which I might have gained with ease during a fraction of the years spent with irksomeness and anguish in gaining a superficial knowledge of the ancient tongues. I have no desire that my descendants should buy repentance at so dear a rate. And it is a sense of the inadequacy of these pursuits to satisfy the average mind—a sense derived from my own experience and much observation—which has made me a reformed classicist. A GOTHIC MAN.

PYLE'S O. K. SOAP.

THE BEST IN AMERICA.

Made from pure materials, similar to the best English and French Soaps, becomes extremely hard, and, therefore, not liable to the unavoidable waste suffered in the use of common brown soap. Cottons and linens washed with it retain the desired whiteness. It is also a good toilet and bathing soap.

Each pound is sufficiently rich in stock to make THREE GALLONS of GOOD SOFT soap by the simple addition of water. In New York it leads all other soaps, and only needs a trial to be approved everywhere. We can refer to the editors of this paper and hundreds of intelligent families concerning its merits. Pyle's Saleratus and Cream Tartar are also the best in use.

The Week.

There seems to be good reason to believe that the last Reconstruction bill will work, and bring the South to dry land at last, if not swimmingly and cheerfully, then by the hair of the head, or nape of the neck. There are numerous signs that the prospect of military government for an indefinite period is opening the eyes of the people to their folly in having relied so long on Mr. Johnson's power of obstruction. Preparations are making in Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, and other States, by one party or other, to organize under the act; and there seems in some quarters, Virginia, for instance, to be a race going on to see which shall get hold of the convention first, and thus have the shaping of the new constitution. Of course, even under the law just passed, the military commander might, by a general order, frame rules and regulations for the election of the conventions, and the time and place of meeting. But then it is desirable not only that these rules and regulations should be uniform in all the States, but that they should emanate from Congress only, and that no sanction, express or implied, should be given to the doctrine that it is the business of the Executive, through the army, to organize civil governments in any State or Territory, conquered or unconquered, in or out of the Union. This is a heresy which must not be tolerated. Mr. Wilson, therefore, has very properly introduced into the House a bill, which will no doubt have passed before this meets the eyes of our readers, providing for the registration, before the 1st of September next, of all voters in each State qualified under the Reconstruction bill, and for the election of a constitutional convention within thirty days after this registration shall be complete. The constitution is to be submitted to the registered voters, and if adopted by a majority of them, and approved by Congress, senators and representatives from the State are to be admitted to their places. Whether Mr. Johnson will veto this or not, is of little consequence. If he is sincere in his expressions of opinion as to the condition and prospects of the country, he cannot consider it of much consequence now what anybody does, as our ruin, according to him, is accomplished.

There seems to be very little doubt that whether the last Reconstruction bill be the best bill possible or not, both Congress and the country are prepared to treat it as a finality and content themselves with it. An attempt of Mr. Stevens to revive the Reconstruction Committee of Fifteen has been defeated. Mr. Sumner, too, introduced last week a reconstruction bill of his own, framing "additional guarantees," the principal one being an oath to be administered to every office-holder and voter, binding him to maintain a republican form of government, to resist the payment of the rebel debt or the repudiation of the national debt, to discountenance all laws making distinctions on account of race or color, and to support education and the diffusion of education in public schools open to all. If, however, the success of the reconstruction process has to depend in the smallest degree on the fulfilment by really disloyal men of sworn promises to do certain things in the future, it is pretty certain to fail. A man's oath to support the diffusion of knowledge in common schools would, in nine cases out of ten, be of no more value than his oath to "support" early rising or cold bathing, or the general practice of virtue. This reliance on hard swearing is a thoroughly mediæval feeling, and its revival in our time as a great political agent is a singular phenomenon. An oath just now is of use simply as a test as to past conduct. An oath to bear allegiance in future to a particular government has, as all the world knows, never kept anybody in any age or country from rebelling whenever he thought the time had come. Who refrained from joining in the insurrection at the South solely because he had sworn allegiance to the Federal Government? We may by test oaths keep rebels from participating in the government for the present. We cannot by any test oaths bind rebels to good behaviour in the future.

Mr. Sumner also introduced resolutions declaring the illegality of the existing State governments at the South, the desirableness of providing temporary substitutes for them, and of excluding rebel agency from all influence in framing the new governments; of establishing public schools in the rebel States; and of giving each colored head of a family a "piece of land." In answer to various senators, Mr. Sumner said "the piece of land" might come from land sold for taxes, or that the President (this is surely a mistake of the reporters) might have required the land for the freedmen from each person pardoned as a condition of the pardon; and that this grant of land, though not necessary to a republican form of government, was necessary to "conclude the glorious work of emancipation." Somehow, the Senate did not seem to get the idea clearly, and the resolutions were laid on the table by a vote of 36 to 10.

The indefatigable General Banks has got into the chair of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House once more—a fact not creditable to Mr. Colfax, as Mr. Banks's report on the neutrality laws, of which Mr. George Bemis made such a shocking exposure, ought, in the eyes of every intelligent and honest man, to disqualify the author for any position of responsibility with regard to our foreign relations hereafter. It is hard to say whether the report was more marked by ignorance or unscrupulousness, and it ought to have relegated the writer to as private a station as his peculiar gifts will allow him to occupy.

Mr. Johnson has been delivering a kind of philosophical disquisition on the state and prospects of the country to General Halpine, alias Miles O'Reilly, who prints it from memory in the New York Citizen. It is so weighty and profound that we despair of giving the ordinary reader even an idea of the gist of it. It appears to contain the cream of Mr. Johnson's reflections on the existing crisis; and the conclusion to which he has come is, that we have destroyed one slaveholding aristocracy at the South only to set up another, "a consolidated moneyed oligarchy," at the North, based on seven-thirties and five-twenties. This last-named aristocracy is, it appears, finally to devour us all. He says, "We have all read history"—but this is too sweeping a statement by half. Some of us have; others have not; and some of those who have read it have forgotten what they have read, Mr. Johnson, we fear, for one. For instance, we have carefully examined the statement he made last summer, that Charles II. had his head cut off, and although he afterward corrected himself, and said he meant James II., we doubt very much whether he could make good this correction either, as there are equally weighty reasons for believing that James escaped to Tunis, and died Emperor of Morocco. But let this pass. Mr. Johnson says "that we are to have a great financial crash this year; he holds it to be inevitable, though deprecating it, and having used every effort for its avoidance." When a financial crash has been "deprecated" in this way by a man of Mr. Johnson's standing, it is really too bad of it to come. The country, faulty though he be in many ways, ought to feel deeply grateful to him for the course he has adopted in this matter. If other public men would follow his example, and "deprecate" crashes, in time this plague of the commercial world would doubtless soon cease to trouble us. The following passage we cannot help quoting entire. An attempt at condensation would injure it. He says relying on Congressional enactments in our present condition is—

> "Like a man sustaining his strength on brandy; so long as he can increase the dose daily he may get along in high good humor—just as we have been prospering on an irredeemable paper currency and fresh issues of public securities. But, sooner or later, the day will come in which brandy no longer can stimulate; nor can irredeemable promises to pay pass current as a circulating medium for ever. To the man will come a severe fit of sickness, teaching him that the laws of temperance can only be violated under fearful penalties; and to the nation will come a financial crash, teaching it that paper is only a representative of value, not value itself; and that the only true securities for our public credit must be looked for in a system of rigidly exacted obedience to all constitutional restraints, and a thorough system of economy in all branches of the public service."

The fallacy in the foregoing illustration, we take leave to say, lies in the assumption that when a man finds brandy does not agree with him he must necessarily become temperate and have a fit of sickness. This, as most politicians know, is a mistake. The usual course is to fall back on rye whisky, which some of our greatest statesmen take in daily doses, year after year, and go on getting wiser and wiser, and more and more profound, so that unless the supply of whisky should fail we expect, before the close of the present century, to see every problem, both political and social, solved on the stump or in conversations in back parlors.

THE impeachment enquiry has been committed anew to the Judiciary Committee, and the temper shown in the discussion of the matter both in the caucus and in the House, showed that the Fortieth Congress will deal with the subject with fairness, earnestness, and moderation. The reference to the Judiciary Committee is evidence of the general determination to make the proceeding a strictly judicial one, and not a roundabout way of getting rid of "an obstacle;" and there are various other indications that Congress is not anxious to hurry the Committee in reporting. Of course the result of the enquiry will depend on the nature of the evidence elicited; but the chances seem to be that, barring "startling revelations," the project will languish, and, if the President executes the Reconstruction bill fairly, expire in the fall.

IT seems not unlikely that an attempt will soon be made to "flank" Brigham Young, and dispose satisfactorily of the troublesome question of polygamy, which for some years has loomed large and demanded settlement. The Nevada Legislature has been informed by Senator Stewart that he had good reasons for believing that Congress would be found quite ready, if Nevada would say she was willing, to make the Territory of Utah a part of the State of Nevada. Nevada appears to be willing; and on Feb. 6th the State Senate, by a vote of 14 to 2, ordered engrossed a resolution favorable to accepting Utah, or the "State of Deseret;" for it is true, though not very well known, that the Mormons have a shadowy sort of State government, with Young as governor and other Mormons as senators and members of assembly, who annually go through the form of ratifying the acts of the Territorial and National governments. It was of course to be expected that the citizens of Nevada should entertain a robust self-confidence in their ability to "handle" any number of Mormons and "to clean out Brigham" if need be within a brief period of time. But still it looks very much as if Nevada, when she gets Utah, will find that she has been swallowed instead of swallowing. There are perhaps, says the Salt Lake City Union Vedette, 3,000 legal voters in Utah. But there were in 1860 about 20,000 male inhabitants, and though a great majority of these are foreigners, their disabilities could soon be removed, and they be made voters. The estimated population of Nevada is 30,000 souls, of whom, to be sure, fewer are women and children than in an equal number of Mormons; but yet the voters in Nevada could be outnumbered, it is likely, by those in the Territory. So it is not wonderful that Young expresses his satisfaction with the proposed measure, declines to send money to Nevada to defeat it, and only stipulates that the new State shall be called the State of Deseret.

THE Southern Relief Commission has not, we believe, been very successful in its operations, at least in this city. A few days ago only $20,000 had been raised, and over half this was contributed by members of the Committee. A plan for lending money in moderate sums to persons struggling to restore their fortunes by cultivating their plantations has been discussed with some of the leading bankers, and decided to be impracticable. There is, evidently, little or no faith current in Southern promises to pay. What is more unfortunate is, however, that there is very little disposition to give for the relief of Southern wants. There is very little question that when the war closed a million dollars might have been raised for this purpose as readily as a thousand now can be. People's charity has been dried up; and not only this, but their disgust excited to the last degree by the language of the Southern press and orators, by the position of defiance which the Southern public has allowed itself to be induced to take up, and by the outrageous treatment of Northern settlers and Unionists, black and white, in various parts of the country. No opportunity has been allowed to slip of insulting the Northern people, and even such philanthropic efforts as have been already made for the relief of distress or the diffusion of education have been ascribed to the vilest motives. We do not say these things for the purpose of stimulating the prevailing disposition not to give. On the contrary, putting Christian duty altogether aside, we believe that the North does itself real material service in endeavoring to lighten the burden of Southern suffering. But Northern men and women are made of flesh and blood; and it is not in flesh and blood to bear what they have had to bear from the South during the last thirty or forty years, and still to be charitable in these hard times to persons who curse and revile their benefactors in the act of eating their bread. At all events, there is just now an opinion prevalent amongst very good and wise men, that the South will never be brought to its senses except through greater privation than has yet befallen it.

THE Reform movement in England has entered on a new and interesting stage. Mr. Disraeli has withdrawn his unfortunate declaratory resolutions and brought in a bill with which Mr. Gladstone is disposed to be satisfied, but which meets with Mr. Bright's unqualified disapprobation. The result seems to be a split in the Liberal ranks, Mr. Bright going off and having, it is said, determined on a course of agitation of extraordinary energy and activity during the coming summer. The chances are that, as far as the House of Commons is concerned, the bill will pass, unless the opposition out of doors is very strong. The six-pound rating (for the poor), below which Mr. Disraeli is not apparently disposed to go, and the plurality of votes—that is, two or three votes by one person on different kinds of qualification—are an abomination to the Radicals, but the Gladstonites seem disposed to take what they can get. One most important measure has just passed a second reading, providing for the eligibility of Catholics to the Lord Chancellorship both of England and Ireland and the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland. This may seem a small matter, but it shows in reality that the great principle of religious and political equality is making rapid progress. Another most significant incident is the recent invitation of Cardinal Cullen—hat, red stockings, and all—to dine with the Lord Lieutenant, who has always been personally a Tory of the Tories. It is quite evident that a few more blows will upset the Irish Church Establishment, one of the most disgraceful caricatures on a religious organization the world has ever seen.

The Fenian insurrection in Ireland is clearly a total failure; in fact, the movement is hardly worth the name of an insurrection. Of course it has created a good deal of excitement here, and has doubtless answered one object of its promoters in giving a fresh impetus to the collection of money on this side of the water. In this work of defrauding the poor, these worthies are, we regret to say, aided and abetted by native demagogues and by a portion of the press, such as the New York Tribune, in which one expects to find not only more conscience, but more intellectual pride. This and other journals have, during the past week, been working up "the rebellion" in the regular sensational style with which readers of the "great dailies" are unhappily so familiar, doubting the telegrams from London, and drawing wonderful pictures of imaginary armies that are to assemble in Connaught, and march through Athlone and the Bog of Allen to tear the British Empire to pieces, or else entrench themselves in Tipperary—a county whose strategic advantages The Tribune describes in glowing terms. It appears "cavalry cannot act in such a country; artillery, except in very small pieces, cannot be transported over the hills and mountains; and the ground is favorable to ambuscades." There is more of the same which we forbear quoting; the picture it conjures up of the approaching fate of the British army in Ireland is too harrowing for contemplation, richly as that body of men has deserved its impending annihilation. We venture to say, with all deference, that there is no flourishing daily paper in the United States which will not find a rigid abstinence from humbug of all sorts for the space of two years worth more to it both in character and circulation than a dozen "special contributors" of the highest reputation, at ten thousand dollars apiece. The New York Times has strong claims on the gratitude of the poor Fenians as well as of the general public, for its words of soberness and truth on this sad and repulsive Fenian swindle; for, in America, swindle it is. Mr. Thaddeus Stevens did the country good service too, and himself credit, by refusing to permit the introduction of the ridiculous Donnelly resolutions, claiming belligerent rights for the "Irish Republic." He had a chance for a good joke when doing so, which we are sorry he let slip.

The French Emperor has finally, it appears, resolved to stand by his scheme of military reorganization, by which at one stroke he places 160,000 men every year at the disposal of the Government—that is, every young man in the country of the age of twenty, and not physically incapable; so that one-half the able-bodied men will have to serve five years in the regular army and four in the reserve, and the other half five in the reserve and four in the National Guard—the reserve, be it remembered, being liable to be called out at any time by a mere order from the Minister of War. This will raise the French force under arms, in six years, to 1,232,215 men. The hostility which this measure excited when it was first proposed, especially amongst the peasantry, who are the real basis on which the Imperial dynasty rests, was so very great that it was supposed until within a few days that it would be abandoned. But the Emperor, it appears, is resolute, and is determined to submit his hold on power to the severest strain it has yet experienced. What this draft means to the people may be best estimated by stating that out of 325,000, the total number annually of Frenchmen who attain their twentieth year, about 110,000 of them are unfit for service, throwing the burden of the conscription on the remaining 215,000, of whom over 30,000 have to be exempted for family reasons.

THE FREEDMEN.

We omitted inadvertently last week to add to our paragraph on the new common-school system in Tennessee some remarks on the effect which its adoption will have on the freedmen's schools at present in operation throughout the State. We instanced the valuable services of the American Freedman's Union Commission, and should have stated in the same connection that other societies than those united under this organization have done and are still doing honorable and useful work in Tennessee, and must share the credit of the recent statute establishing common schools. But this Commission and its branches, foreseeing the day when their pioneer labors would be absorbed by State action like this of Tennesseee, purposely discarded sectarian tests in the selection of teachers, yet, believing that "the religious instruction most needed by the freed people is the application of Christianity to moral conduct," appointed none who appeared to be incapable of making this application. Their schools are consequently ready at any moment to be turned over to the State authorities—needing no assimilation—and they bequeath besides a corps of intelligent, well-trained colored teachers who will assuredly not be rejected by the State. With the denominational or distinctively "evangelical" schools the case is different; they cannot contend with the common-school system, and yet they can scarcely coexist with it. Their teachers will probably transfer themselves to new fields. Those of the Commission are already preparing to do so—not, however, as if turned out, but in pursuance of their original design.

—Edmund Ruffin, of South Carolina, fired the first gun of the war against the Union. Governor Bullock, of Massachusetts, has just appointed George L. Ruffin, a colored man, justice of the peace for the county of Suffolk.

—On the 8th, a meeting of white and colored persons was held at Military Hall, Charleston, to take steps for the formation of a Union Republican party in South Carolina. Some 300 persons were in attendance, and a committee was appointed to report a plan of organization.

—According to The Southern Churchman, there are outside of Charleston thirty-one teachers and two thousand pupils in South Carolina, as follows: in Columbia, eleven teachers and eight hundred pupils; in Greenville, three teachers and about a hundred and fifty pupils; in Anderson, one teacher and about a hundred pupils; Lexington, one teacher and ninety-seven pupils; at Belton, one teacher and thirty-five pupils; in Orangeburg, two teachers and about two hundred pupils; at Aiken, one teacher and a hundred and five pupils; in Sumter, Kershaw, and that part of the State in general, eleven teachers and about five hundred pupils. In these schools are taught spelling, reading, writing, arithmetic, and geography.

—The Charleston Mercury acknowledges that the experiment of negro testimony in the courts "has been attended with more than the usual success. The colored witnesses appear to be fully impressed with the obligations placed upon them, and their evidence has been generally given with an evident desire to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth. There is but little tendency to prolixity and discursiveness, and the testimony has in the late criminal trials been clear, intelligible, and to the point."

—The chief of police at Memphis has been arrested by order of Gen. Howard. His alleged offence is arresting negroes without cause, and hiring them out from jail, without trial, to planters, for small sums which the latter paid him.

—The Missouri House, on the 7th, passed a bill to amend the constitution so as to allow negroes to vote. Yeas, 76; nays, 46.

—The teachers of the colored schools of the District of Columbia met in Washington on the 1st inst., to report progress and to adopt a course of parallel studies. The attendance of some schools during the month of February was extraordinary, thirteen ranging from 100 to 90 per cent. The course decided upon is to be printed for the use and guidance of the teachers.

LITERARY.

In our issue of January 3d we noticed the complaint of the proprietors of Littell's Living Age against Messrs. Harper & Bros., for having published in book form the serials "Miss Marjoribanks," "Sir Brook Fossbrooke," and "Madonna Mary," before they had been completed in The Living Age, and when it was known that Messrs. Littell, Son & Co. also contemplated making a book of them. A fresh controversy has arisen between the same parties, standing in the same relation, the subject being the novel called "The Claverings." In the last number of Harper's Weekly appears a statement intended as a defence of the course pursued by the Messrs. Harper, in the former as well as in the latter instance. It is asserted on their behalf: 1. That, being the American publishers of Mr. Trollope's novels, they paid more than two thousand dollars for the advance sheets of "The Claverings," before they were issued in England, and paid that sum for the express purpose of avoiding competition in this country. 2. That they announced the work as in press on the 13th of January, 1866, whereas Messrs. Littell, Son & Co. did not begin its publication in The Living Age till March. 3. That the latter, therefore, made their stereotype plates although they were in full possession of these facts, and that a part of the plates which they reproach the Messrs. Harper with not buying, to cover them from loss, "were made from the Harpers' own edition after its publication." And so the controversy stands for the present.

—Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, who have just issued "Our Mutual Friend," are said to have been very successful in selling their "Diamond Dickens." It is prettier by far than the rival edition put forth by Peterson & Brothers. The latter, however, has two or three decided advantages. We confess to finding the type of the Boston edition rather small for comfortable reading; then, secondly, the Philadelphia edition is rather cheaper than the other; thirdly, it uses the English illustrations, many of which are spirited and good. Mr. Eytinge's designs in "Our Mutual Friend" are nearly as bad as the worst pictures we ever saw in a book. They would disgrace a Sunday-school book. Peterson & Brothers, in their "Mutual Friend," without denouncing Ticknor & Fields by name, print on the title-page a note which declares that Mr. Dickens has never had any money for advanced sheets or manuscripts of his works from any American publishing houses except those of the Harpers, in this city, and the Petersons, in Philadelphia; that from these two houses, one of which publishes his novels in Harper's Weekly, and the other in book form, Mr. Dickens has received thousands of dollars, having had $5,000 in gold for "Our Mutual Friend" and a like sum for each of his other late books. The easy inference is, that Ticknor & Fields have violated what we may call the rights of the Harpers and the Petersons; much as if those latter firms should print cheap editions of certain poets who, as they say in the fly-leaves of the Ticknor & Fields editions, "desire that with those gentlemen the right of publishing in America," etc., etc.

—Fifteen or sixteen years ago, "Artemus Ward," "Mrs. Partington," and "Miles O'Reilly" were laboring together in one office, each in his degree, working on The Carpet Bag, a not very comic comic paper, which was then trying hard to live, and was published in Boston. We may be mistaken, but we think "Fanny Fern" was first successful in the columns of the same journal. Mr. Halpine and Mr. Shillaber, who were at the same time on the staff of the clever and witty Boston Post, filled the positions of editorial managers of The Carpet Bag, while young Browne worked as a compositor. If he wrote at all, it must have been only the most trifling and ephemeral articles, for he was no more than a boy in years. He was not thirty-two, we are told, at the time of his death. But it may very well be that it was partly because of his association with these humorous writers that the attention of the future "Artemus Ward" was turned to the field where he afterwards won money and reputation, and the affection, we may almost say, of very many men in the New World and the Old. His first "Ward" letter, written to fill space in the Cleveland Plaindealer, seems to have been struck off in a hurry, without much thought, and to have been suggested by his recollections of the old office in Boston. Its allusions and phraseology recall to our recollection the "funny" Tabithas and Ethans that used, twenty years ago, to figure in the Massachusetts and Maine comic papers and comic columns of papers. Till the end of his literary career he mingled in his works the humor of the East and West. The first letter in The Plaindealer proving a success, other letters were written which all the world has read, and after 1860, when Mr. Browne came to New York to assist in carrying on Vanity Fair, there was nothing to which he turned his attention—California and Mormon tours, lecturing at home and abroad, book-writing or writing for the newspapers—in which his powers of fun-making did not give him great success. To characterize and describe properly his humor—for he had a fund of native humor, though he used freely the written and spoken humor of the two great sections in which most of his brief life was passed—would require more than our present space to do. He was born in the State of Maine in 1836, in the town of Waterord, and died in Southampton on the 7th inst. Remembering his old trade, he has left his money to his mother during her life, and after her death it is to be used for establishing an asylum for printers.

—Now that England is again in the throes of the Reform agitation, the publication of the correspondence of the late Earl Grey with King William IV. and with Sir Herbert Taylor is very opportune. This correspondence extended from November, 1830, to June, 1832, and includes all that passed between the king and his minister on the subject of the Reform Act. It throws much light on matters that seemed well known, and reveals many new facts. It shows that William's mind was not as free from prejudice as was popularly supposed at the time; but that he had all the narrowness, fears, and political animosity of the oldest Tory, and, in addition, an extraordinary constitutional timidity. Had the premier been less conciliatory, adroit, or judicious, the king would have had an absolute horror of the policy which he unwillingly adopted, and a revolution would have prevented reform. One singular revelation of these letters is the great importance of Sir Herbert Taylor, the king's private secretary, who, to a great extent, seems to have been his master's master. Very few letters were written by the king personally, who was troubled with a rheumatic affection of the hand, but were merely signed by him. Most of the letters in the collection were either written by or addressed to Sir H. Taylor, who played the part of a mediator in smoothing over any difficulties that arose between the king and his ministers. At times he was empowered to use his discretion in deciding whether the king should hear the whole or only a part of a ministerial communication. The correspondence shows that the king's support of his ministers was far from unflinching, and that it was only by the vivid pictures of what might happen in the event of the rejection of the Reform Bill unaccompanied by a dissolution, presented to him by his ministers, that he reluctantly yielded, and gained great applause for his courage and promptitude. In one of the letters signed by the king is a remarkable argument against election by ballot; he says "that nothing should ever induce him to yield to it, or to sanction a practice which would, in his opinion, be a protection to concealment, would abolish the influence of fear and shame, and would be inconsistent with the manly spirit and the free avowal of opinion which distinguish the people of England." Some of the letters of the king have been reserved from publication by the editor, the present Earl Grey.

—"The Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1866," the issue of which has been thus long delayed, is just published. Mr. Wells, Chairman of the U. S. Revenue Commission, not having been able, on account of his duties to the Government, to superintend the preparation of the volume, Messrs. Gould & Lincoln, its publishers, put it in charge of Dr. Samuel Kneeland, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

—A circular from Mr. T. W. Higginson announces that a new edition of the "Harvard Memorial Biographies" is now in preparation, and requests from any source corrections of possible errors in the former edition. Mr. Higginson's address is Newport, R. I., and information should be sent him during the present month to be in season.

—The American Unitarian Association, whose list of publications embraces the works, or some of the works, of James Martineau, William Ellery Channing, Andrews Norton, A. P. Peabody, Henry Ware, Jr., George R. Noyes, William H. Furness, James Freeman Clarke, Daniel Schenkel, and others who have thought deeply on religion, has made a still further reduction in the prices of its books. Many of them are indeed extremely cheap. Channing's works, for example, are to be had in three volumes for a dollar a volume; Dr. Noyes's translations of Ecclesiastes, Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, the Hebrew Prophets, are offered in four volumes for no more money than a dollar and a quarter apiece.

—The printer of the slips issued to the readers of the Philological Society's Dictionary finds that during the last six years he has sent out 530,800 slips, with the printed titles of books read. Many thousands of written slips were sent in during the first four years of the work, so that the number of extracts sent in cannot be set at less than 550,000. This large mass of papers is in the hands of twenty-nine sub-editors, to be arranged and abstracted before coming under the eye of the revising committee of the Philological Society. It is proposed to publish the abstract of the whole of the material as a "Concise Dictionary," in order that the words and authorities for words, meanings, and usages still wanting for the Full Dictionary may, as far as possible, be supplied. It will, however, be two or three years before the "Concise Dictionary" can appear, so much work still remains to be done.

RITUALISM.[*]

THE appearance of this book is a portent not to be neglected by those who feel an interest in the Anglican Church. It is the confession of earnest-minded men that the Establishment has been weighed and found wanting, and it records their gropings for a remedy that shall enable their ecclesiastical system to do some reasonable share of the duty allotted to it, and to give some not totally inadequate return for the vast power and wealth with which it has been entrusted.

While awarding to the authors full measure of recognition for the zeal which prompts their efforts, it is impossible for a disinterested observer not to feel some wonder at the direction of those efforts, and no little misgiving as to their probable result. The questions of vestments and candles are of small importance, and if these only were involved, the enthusiasts who seek by such instrumentalities to overcome the fatal indifferentism of the age might safely be left to amuse themselves with whatever toys they might select to gratify their æsthetic ecclesiology; but these ritualistic observances are only an efflorescence of which the roots lie in strata that the world had supposed to be pretty effectually covered by modern progress.

The gentlemen who have contributed to this volume unite in deprecating the accusation that they are on the high road to Rome. It is true that they admit one of the great objects of the movement to be the reunion of the Church of England with those of Rome and Greece (p. 28), and they fail to show how they expect those great bodies, petrified in the moulds of centuries, to adapt themselves to the exigencies of the insular fragment; but they are careful to assume to themselves the exclusive title of Catholics, while the elder branch is distinguished as the Roman Church. At the same time, the differences between the churches are rapidly narrowing under their reverential zeal for antiquity and tradition, and this without any concessions from the other side.

Eucharistic adoration, of which they have been accused, they indignantly deny; but if symbolism have the vital force which they attribute to it, the esoteric meaning of candles and incense and genuflexions can hardly be long in overcoming a doctrinal repugnance which soon will be scarcely more than nominal. When the power of dispensation is admitted to be lodged somewhere in the Church, the reverence for tradition already displayed will soon be willing to acknowledge that it can only be exercised by the representative of him to whom the symbolical keys were entrusted. When the Lutheran doctrine of justification—the great awakener of the human mind from centuries of torpor—is stigmatized as "the most anti-missionary and anti-Christian of dogmas" (p. 49), the door is at once opened to all the abuses of the Thomist theology, which, as the most profitable part of her power over the consciences of men, the Latin Church can never abandon, and the rejection of which is one of the insuperable obstacles to her reunion with the reformers. When the reformers and the Reformation, indeed, are never alluded to save in terms of dislike and contempt, the unity of feeling with the old Mother of Churches becomes sympathetic, and little is left of concession requisite to reconciliation except the question of clerical celibacy. On that point, too, they are already nearly at one with Rome.

No one who has attentively studied the history of the Christian Church can fail to recognize the vast influence which has been exercised over both its temporal and spiritual concerns by the institution of celibacy. The line of separation which it draws between the priest and the people, while rendering the minister of Christ in some respects less efficient for good, vastly increases his value as an instrument of aggression and aggrandizement, and the sacerdotal caste which is thus formed becomes compact and easily wielded by the central directing power. The force of a church based on such institutions is therefore greatly increased, whether for good or evil, and as the leaders of the Ritualistic movement evidently dread nothing so much as the apathy and stagnation of the Anglican Establishment, they wisely seek to give to their Church of the future the advantages derivable from sundering all the ties that would otherwise divide the allegiance of their recruits.

Accordingly we find in this volume, besides various scattering allusions to the benefits of celibacy, no less than three essays devoted to setting it forth as attractively as possible in both its spiritual and temporal aspects. One essayist, the Rev. T. Thellusson Carter, is earnest in proving the superior holiness of virginity. He does not hesitate to aver that "Our Lord himself first announced this law," basing his faith on the well-worn text, "Sunt eunuchi qui castraverunt seipsos propter regnum cœlorum;" he urges that "virginity, as a specially sacred state, had moreover been from the beginning dimly revealed through the virgin birth foretold as the hope of redeemed humanity;" and the form in which this sanctifying law should be enforced he is willing to accept from the traditions of Latin sacerdotalism: "It was left, as in similar cases, to the Church, in her subsequent development, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, to form regulations which might adapt to changing circumstances of time and place those secret inspirations of the life of God within the souls of his elect" (pp. 366–7). As the Church has decreed that this higher estate of virgin purity shall be sealed and secured by irrevocable vows, Mr. Carter accordingly proceeds to argue that "a continuous self-devotion" to God is no surrender of self unless the devotee specifically vows himself and thus cuts off all possibility of retraction: "We cannot give while yet we retain. To retain the power of continually giving, we must be really still holding it in our possession. We have not given it from the very fact that we still have the power of giving." If these "secret inspirations of the life of God" were to be indulged for the purpose of ministering to the wants of fellow-creatures, there would be some practical Christianity in Mr. Carter's teachings; but his doctrines point merely to the selfish piety of the anchorite, and his followers are only urged to earn the higher rewards which he assures them that God has promised to those who abstract themselves from all the purposes of their being.

It is so strange a sight to see an Englishman of the nineteenth century indulging in these mystic raptures and beatitudes, that we turn with some relief to the Rev. James Edward Vaux, who treats us to a somewhat more practical view of the matter. It is true that he argues from the marriage service that marriage is simply a refuge from fornication, a refuge not required by the elect, for those who may hesitate to bind themselves to an austerity which the weakness of the flesh may not be able to endure are comforted with the assurance, similar to that given by the Council of Trent, that they may expect "the special grace which God would give to such as voluntarily embraced the higher life" (p. 177). Still, Mr. Vaux does not indulge much in abstractions. After a weak and one-sided sketch of the ascetic celibacy, of which the animus may be inferred from his repeating without reprobation the scurril jests of St. Jerome—the most unscrupulous of polemics—in his assault on Vigilantius, Mr. Vaux proceeds to prove that church work can be much more cheaply and efficiently performed by celibates than by married men. Through careful calculation of pounds, shillings, and pence, he shows the impossibility of a curate maintaining even a small family respectably on a stipend of £150, and he gives the ghastly figures of five thousand curates in England and Wales whose incomes do not exceed £80; many hundreds of whom have not £50 a year, while even among incumbents there are five thousand whose revenues are under £150. "Christian prudence and wisdom," therefore, "would dictate a celibate rather than a married life, as that which is best not only for themselves but for those committed to their charge" (p. 162). A pastor's wife, he declares, however estimable she may be, is only an interference with the parochial work of her husband; a pastor's children, in most instances, are notoriously ill-trained; and, where poverty is not to be dreaded, the incomes of rich benefices ought not to be expended in "bonnets, parasols, and perambulators."

Descending in the scale, we find the Rev. S. Baring-Gould urging the introduction of celibacy from a still more worldly point of view. As the Church at present is manifestly unable to perform its work; as in large parishes the rector cannot possibly attend to all his flock; as he must not neglect the higher classes, and thus he, perforce, abandons the lower to dissent or infidelity; as, at the best, missionary efforts among the poor are not suited to gentlemen; as, moreover, gentlemen from the universities are growing rarer and rarer applicants for holy orders, and as gentlemen unfortunately are not furnished by the special theological schools, such as St. Bees and St. Aidan's, while gentlemen are absolutely requisite for rectorships, there is evident need of some system which will enable the rich incumbent to enjoy his living in peace; which will preserve the Church as an attractive refuge for the younger scions of gentle stock; which will enable the rector to hire good working assistants, in the shape of bare-legged friars, at a rate which he can afford without depleting his purse too severely; and which will give a career and sphere of action to the honest religious enthusiasm of the lower classes without intruding into the high places reserved for superior intellect and social standing. To accomplish all this; to preserve the aristocratic character of the Church, while enabling it to perform its real work and to reach the masses that are now utterly beyond its reach, the suggestion of monastic orders, full of holy zeal and careless as to the goods of this world, is not unpromising and certainly is economical.

[*] "The Church and the World: Essays on Questions of the Day. By Various Writers. First Series. Edited by the Rev. Orley Shipley, M.A." Second edition, 1 vol. 8vo. London: Longmans & Co. 1866.

If the testimony of these essayists is to be relied on, something is surely needed to incite the Church to its duty, for, in the words of one of them, "the shopkeepers and artisans have gone to dissent, and the laborers have gone to the devil" (p. 40). They are mistaken, however, as to the efficacy of their panaceas and placebos. That a radical reform is wanted, no one who reads their pages can doubt; but when that reform comes, it will consist of something very different from intoning and incense and chasubles and celibacy. It will not be the revival of mediæval sacerdotalism, but the overthrow of the aristocratic constitution, which is the real cause of the inefficiency of the Establishment. As long as the cure of souls is private property, to be openly and shamelessly bought and sold, or to be used as a provision for penniless young gentlemen, the evils which these new tractarians so vividly depict and so earnestly deprecate cannot but increase and multiply. In the revolution which, sooner or later, is destined to modify all the institutions of England, the Church will have her share. The Irish Establishment, which exaggerates all the shortcomings of its parent, will be the first to feel that this age has no place for shams, and its downfall will be the handwriting on the wall. Anglicanism can do without a temporal head as supreme defender of the faith, without presentations of livings, prelates with fabulous revenues, prebendaries, deans, and rectors richly paid for doing nothing, and five thousand curates starving on £80 a year. Anglicanism, relieved from the incubus of state support and hoary aristocratic abuses, can well vindicate its place in the world and perform the duty that lies before it. Such a reform, however, is past the comprehension of these feudal-minded university gentlemen, who have adopted mediævalism as the remedy, and who look with most amusing disdain on dissent and evangelical Anglicanism as forms of faith which "could at best rank only as a creed for the lower middle-class" (p. 33).

THE GENIUS OF SOLITUDE.*

It was said of Rufus Choate that "he drove a substantive and six." It might be answered that if he did he had twelve excuses for doing it—his adjectives were addressed to jurymen. Mr. Alger, being a clergyman, may, perhaps, plead a not dissimilar excuse for a similar fault in style. However that may be, his readers are sure to be offended by his great diffuseness and frequent displays of fine writing. This latest work of his happens, too, to be a particularly unfortunate one for a writer whose style is vicious in this respect; who doubtless could be dumb, but apparently cannot be terse. His subject, one fancies, ought to have been treated of by an Elizabethan master of sententiousness and learning and force of thought, and waiting till our days of newspapers and bookmaking has waited to fall on evil times. All literature, ancient and modern, is so full of most excellent matter in praise and in dispraise of solitude, that there is hardly another subject to be named concerning which the reader of good reading knows so much deep wisdom, so much poetry, so much true eloquence and fine rhetoric, and any new writer attempting the theme provokes dangerous comparisons. Of the subjects of human thought that have been cause of greater wealth of general literature—death, fame, love, woman, poverty, riches, ambition, virtue—of these we may say that they are too wide and embrace too much for anything like exhaustive treatment by the essayist; so that if one were selecting a theme for an essay which should afford the amplest scope for display of acquired mental treasures, and for the use of every natural power, of thought, feeling, imagination, and yet should at the same time be comprehensible within such limits as might well consist with effective literary handling, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to choose a better theme than this of solitude.

Because, then, the subject is so good, and because so much is so easily attainable by the essayist (it is true that here the difference between much and all is immense), the reader less willingly pardons if, instead of the profound and the beautiful and fresh and fine, the commonplace is offered him, if he is put off with cheap ornamentation and flimsy thinness of reflection for solid and noble elegance and beauty and wealth; and he feels disposed to wish that nothing had been done rather than the field been entered and occupied but not cultivated well and made to yield all it might yield.

> "At the first glance every form of being appears to be social, all the world gregarious. The trees interlace their branches and wave their tops in multitudinous union" [as in de Guérin]; "from the equator to the poles the waves shoulder their fellows" [as in Alexander Smith], "glistening with innumerable smiles; whole orchards of apple blossoms blush in correspondence; in regiments the ranks of corn laugh on the slopes" [as in the poets passim]; "ponds of lilies uncover their bosoms to the moon" [like a single lily in Heine]; "meadows of grass-blades bend before the breeze; and the barley rustles millions of beards together on the lea. Shoals of herring solidify acres of the sea with moving life."

The passage is from the "Introduction," which has the second title, "Gregariousness and Solitude," and is the beginning of Part I. There are four of these parts, "The Solitudes of Nature," "The Solitudes of Man," "The Morals of Solitude," and "Sketches of Lonely Characters"—the last, by much the longest, being composed of essays, varying in length from a page to a dozen pages, on the characters of men whose lives illustrate the good and the evils of solitude. Jesus is the topic of one of these essays, Buddha of another, Zimmermann of another, and the list includes Cicero, Tacitus, Boethius, Leopardi, Byron, Dante, Hobbes, Comte, Schopenhauer, Rousseau, Blanco White, Eugénie de Guérin and her brother, John Foster, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Chopin, Pascal, Confucius, Milton, Tasso, and several others of the great names of ancient and modern times. Under the heading of "The Solitudes of Nature" we have the sub-headings of "The Solitude of the Desert," "The Solitude of the Prairie," "of the Ocean," "of the Pole," "of the Forest," "of the Mountain," "of the Ruin." These preparatory paragraphs were written to induce in the reader a mood of mind proper for the contemplation of the various forms of human loneliness, or, in the author's phrase, "to envelope the soul in a fitting atmosphere of sentiment." They are done in the same manner as the paragraph already quoted. Borrowed thoughts or trite thoughts are enveloped in a befitting or an unbefitting fog of rolling words, a mist that sometimes clears away and lets be seen the poverty of the landscape it seeks to hide, as witness this passage of dials dolorous and admeasurements rather ludicrous:

> "Finally we come to the solitude of ruins—relics of the past, the dolorous dials Time in his passage has raised to count his triumphs and measure his progress by. A ruin is forlorn and pathetic wherever seen—in an isle of African Nilus, or in a forest of American Yucatan. The traveller falls into a pensive mood as, leaning against the stony masses of Meroë, whose glory the barbarian overthrew and the sands buried, he scans the fading marks of the life that once flourished there but is there no more. The same experience comes over him when his steed wearily penetrates the rank grass among the mounds of Copan and Palenque, the riddle of whose forgotten civilization baffles every guesser who inspects its remains, where the luxuriant vegetation has overgrown tombs and temples—here and there a palm, in its resistless upshoot, cleaving altar and image, column and skull. The sphinx, that strange emblematic creature, half beast, half humanity, sixty-two feet in height, a hundred and forty feet long, still tarries amidst the mute desolation whence the whole race and civilization that set it there have vanished."

"The Human Solitudes" are "The Solitude of Individuality," "of Grief," "of Love," "of Occupation," "of Selfishness," "of Genius," "of Death." Here the book begins to have something of value, and the author shows that his reading has been wide. It indulges freely in quotation; and much that has been said by those who have made acquaintance with solitude, whose genius has isolated them, or whose occupation has deprived them of companionship, or whose misanthropy has hedged them from their kind—what has been said by the recluse, the exiled, the hermit, the suffering, may here be read to the profit of the reader. It is mixed, though, with things like this, which are profusely scattered through the second and third divisions of the treatise:

> "If you saw two persons intently reading, and, looking over their shoulders, found that one was absorbed in Lola Montez on the 'Arts of the Toilet,' the other in Saint Bruno on the 'Delights of Solitude,' you would infer a great difference in their respective characters—a difference of mental dignity decidedly to the advantage of the latter. Most men live blindly, to repeat a routine of drudgery and indulgence without any deliberately chosen and maintained aims. Many live to outstrip their rivals, pursue their enemies, gratify their lusts, and make a display."

It is like most sermons after most texts. Stuff like that, bad alone, is doubly dull and tiresome when read in connection with such thoughts as this of Kant's, who, at the end of life, speaking of the shortest month, cries out in bitterness: "O happy February! in which man has least to bear—least pain, least sorrow, least self-reproach;" or this voice of Pascal's misery: "Man is so unhappy that he is weary without any cause for weariness;" or this beautiful expression by the great historian of his sadness, as he paced the covered walk of acacias after he had finished the work which had been for so many years a companion to him, and, as Keats says, a refuge: "But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that whatsoever might be the future date of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious."

* "The Solitudes of Nature and of Man; or, The Loneliness of Human Life. By William Rounseville Alger." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1867. Pp. 413.

Part Third deals with "The Dangers of Solitude" and "The Uses of Solitude," and, with the Second Part, contains most of that on account of which we should care to own the book. Nevertheless, it is the concluding portion, that devoted to illustrative examples, which shows the author in the best light. He has made it a great deal longer than it needed to be by little essays which are really good for nothing as regards his special purpose, or for any purpose. The page devoted to Lucretius, for example, has very much the look of "padding," or is it introduced for the sake of this image?—"When we think of the immense mind of Lucretius escaping into the invisible, it affects us as though some lone planet had rolled off the flaming walls of the universe and sunk into night"—which is bad enough. Lucretius was a great poet, and committed suicide, but we do not know that he was lonely. If you say all such are lonely, you say what, perhaps, is true; but neither the good nor bad effects of solitude, nor the nature of solitude, are made more clear by the assertion. Great and small, we all are lonely at times—as regards the "abysmal depths of personality" are all always lonely—but that does not make a crowd of us, or one of us, a good illustration of the effects of solitude; does not, at any rate, unless more is known of us than that we lived and died, and may or must have experienced solitude. Others in Mr. Alger's list we would likewise strike out. Indeed, we doubt if all the useful matter in this appendix might not better have been judiciously incorporated with the text of the essay proper. Nevertheless, as we have said, these final essays show the author to more advantage than the other parts of his book. There are ten or twelve pages that contain a clear and intelligible account of Buddha; there are some remarks on Thoreau which seem to us just, if they are not wholly new—for there is already in existence an essay that pretty much exhausts the subject, and which Mr. Alger has read; and there is a very good estimate of the genius of Maurice de Guérin. It is high praise—we ought to say we praise it highly—when we say that it seems to us the essay on de Guérin from which one gets the fullest and truest idea of him. The last of these semi-biographical essays is entitled "Jesus," and is noticeable as being—somewhat unnecessarily, we should say—a frank presentation of the writer's views as regards the divinity, or, as he would say, the deity of Christ.

Zimmermann's "Solitude," of which we have read only the Philadelphia edition of the common English translation, in which the original appears reduced to one-fourth of its length, treats of solitude as "occasional retirement" from the busy world. Its scope is thus narrower than Mr. Alger's treatise. Moreover, Zimmermann died almost seventy-two years ago, and much has been written since his time. We recommend, then, the purchase of both books.

LANMAN'S DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.[*]

We have too long deferred a notice of this book, which is a remarkable one, whether we consider the scope of its design or the manner of its execution. American literature, as was long since remarked by de Tocqueville, is singularly deficient in books which reveal the spirit of our politics and the personal characters of our public men. With a documentary history of our Congress fuller than is possessed by any other nation of its national legislature, our political history presents for the most part an arid waste, and our few political biographies are remarkably unreadable. We do not forget some bright exceptions of late years, and we cordially welcome a tendency to improvement. Certainly it is time that some portion of the exuberant life, energy, and independence which characterize our people were reflected in our political literature. Intelligent foreigners, fresh from the piquant gossip of French memoirs, or the full personal biographies and journals of British statesmen, find American politics, as represented in books, to be very dry bones indeed.

Mr. Lanman's book presents no exception to this remark, nor should we expect, in a work which undertakes so much, to find anything more than the briefest and most condensed mention of individuals. What can be done in ten or twenty lines of print toward a proper characterization and account of any public man? Yet Mr. Lanman's plan crowds into a single volume notices of all the members of Congress from 1789 to the present time, to which he has added, in this edition, biographical sketches of all the members of the Continental Congress. Between four and five thousand names are thus commemorated, and the chief value of the work is that it does for the reader what has nowhere else been done in a collected form. While it thus adds one to our few biographical dictionaries of Americans, it gives little or no information respecting most beyond their titular honors, their terms of service in Congress, and the dates of their births or deaths. We are thankful for so much, and give the industrious compiler full credit for his laborious and, in many respects, thankless task.

The work would have been much more valuable had the author's plan permitted him to give along with the notice of each Congressman the designation of the party with which he habitually acted. In Dod's "Parliamentary Companion," a work which is a model of this class of compilations, and is now in its thirty-fifth year of publication, the politics of members of Parliament are treated as too important a part of their biography to be omitted. Mr. Lanman's resolution "to express no opinions of living men, and but seldom to echo public opinion in regard to the dead," need not have been so finely drawn as to exclude a political classification of his subjects. As it is, he remits us from his "Dictionary of Congress" to our files of the "Tribune Almanac" or the daily newspapers in order to learn what is often the only significant fact about a senator or a representative which we care to know. The same principle of so-called "impartiality" prevents our compiler from noticing the salient facts in the Congressional career of his subjects. Thus, we are told much about the dates in the life of Charles G. Atherton, of New Hampshire, and are even treated to the minute information that he "died of apoplexy," but not a word is said of the famous rule for the suppression of petitions on slavery known as the "Atherton gag-law." We are favored with half a column of dry figures respecting John J. Crittenden, but no mention is made of the "Crittenden compromise." Of N. P. Banks we are duly invited to admire the novel and surprising facts that he was "born of poor but respectable parents," and that "the love of books has been a source of gratification to him all his life," while not a syllable is heard of the memorable struggle which made him Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1856. We hear of Senator Benton's "valuable register of the debates in Congress" (which was not his), but nothing of his "Thirty Years' View," which is his sole characteristic legacy as a politician. Of Preston S. Brooks we are painfully and laboriously informed that he "died in Washington, District of Columbia, January 27, 1857, of acute inflammation of the throat," while the only thing which preserves the memory of the man is thus euphuistically recorded: "In 1856 he made a personal assault upon Charles Sumner, in the United States Senate Chamber, which event (!) caused much excitement throughout the country." We have heard much of the political eunuchism which long official residence in Washington is supposed to produce, but it strikes us that the above is a somewhat queer bit of "impartial history," even for the atmosphere of the capital.

We are sorry to find the work disfigured by many misprints and inaccuracies. Mr. Lanman speaks of Adams's "Essay on Canon and Federal (Feudal) Laws" (Law); he makes Francis Hopkinson born in 1737, instead of 1738; he says of Geo. P. Marsh that "in 1842 he took his seat in the U. S. House of Representatives, which he continued to occupy until," etc; he tells us that "the best biographies of him (Washington) were published by John Marshall, Washington Irving, David Ramsay, and George Bancroft"; he makes Mr. Sparks publish the writings of Washington in ten, and the writings of Franklin in twelve volumes. Nathan Dane, member of Congress from Massachusetts and author of the slavery-prohibition in the ordinance of 1787, is put down as "Nathan Dana," and inserted in the alphabet a full page out of place. D. P. Holloway, M.C. from Indiana, and afterward Commissioner of Patents, is entered as D. P. Halloway on page 161, whereas his name belongs and could only be looked for on page 185. All the names commencing with "Mc" are inserted after "May" instead of being treated, as in the best modern dictionaries, as if spelled "Mac," and classified accordingly. Such errors are venial in the first edition of such a work, but when we see "third edition" blazoned upon the title-page we confess to some disappointment. The compiler's knowledge of our political literature appears to have been derived from somewhat ancient sources. Thus, he has the works of Thomas Jefferson as "published in four volumes 8vo, 1829," but says nothing of the only complete edition, published by order of Congress in 1853. He tells us of Fisher Ames's works and memoir, 1809, but is silent respecting the far more valuable edition published by his son in two volumes in 1854. In the article on James Madison no mention is made of his "Report of the Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787," perhaps the most important political text-book our country has produced. We are told of Henry Lee, "He it was who first uttered the memorable saying in regard to Washington, 'First in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen,'" whereas the sentiment was embodied in the resolutions of Congress prepared by John Marshall, and adopted ten days before Lee's oration was pronounced.

We are told in the preface that the compiler has embodied in the appendix "a mass of legislative and executive information calculated to be of service to members of Congress, especially in their examination of the public documents." We turn to the appendix, hoping to find some guide to the chaos of Congressional debates, or some indication by which to unravel the still more intricate mazes of the Congressional documents, but we find nothing which can throw a particle of light upon either. Considering that Mr. Lanman is said to have been for some years librarian to the House of Representatives, whose library consists almost wholly of Congressional documents, we might reasonably have expected some clue to the labyrinthine perplexities which the member of Congress, as well as the private student, finds in our ill-digested public documents. Even so slight and imperfect a classification of them as is given in Mr. Hickey's edition of the Constitution would have been a godsend, and we are not aware that the information in question is copyright.

Some of the biographical notices in this volume read suspiciously like the compositions of the subjects themselves. How otherwise could it have been recorded concerning Caleb Lyon, "of Lyonsdale," that he "was elected to the State Senate (of New York) as its youngest member, and for his services was presented by his brother senators in the state capital with a service of plate;" that "while abroad, he was identified with the Koszta affair as the friend (!) of Capt. Duncan N. Ingraham;" or, finally, that "he writes poetry, lectures on the East, translates Oriental literature, and is a member of several historical societies, with a passion for archæologic and antiquarian lore." After this, it is not surprising to be informed that "the degree of LL.D. has been conferred upon" this Admirable Crichton by the University of Vermont.

Upon what principle other than that of "natural selection" Mr. Lanman has apportioned his materials to his various subjects, must probably remain a mystery. The distinguished gentleman just referred to occupies nearly a column, while James Madison and Alexander Hamilton are despatched in half a column each, and Philip Schuyler and Joseph Reed are honored with a quarter of a column. So utterly insignificant a person as Kellian V. Whaley, of West Virginia, receives over half a column of commemoration, while Samuel Adams and Silas Deane are disposed of in half as many words. Arthur Lee occupies just two lines and a half, and Pierre Soulé an entire column. In the article on James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, no mention is made of his important writings on jurisprudence, nor of the fact that he was for nine years an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

We have said enough to indicate in what directions this work stands in need of improvement, and to explain, in part at least, the reasons why Congress has recently refused, by an overwhelming vote, to print a greatly enlarged edition at the expense of the Government.

THE SPEECHES OF HENRY WINTER DAVIS.*

Born and spending his life in a Southern and slaveholding State, Henry Winter Davis was always a true lover of liberty, yet always, until the last year or two of his life, so fettered by adverse circumstances as to make it impracticable for him fully to acknowledge his convictions to the world, and probably to make him unwilling to admit in his own mind the conclusions to which his principles necessarily led. In reading his earlier speeches, the struggle between the convictions of his conscience and intellect and the prejudices in which he had been reared are very apparent, especially when compared with his later utterances, after he had rescued his State from treason and slavery.

It is very interesting to trace the gradual progress of Mr. Davis's mind towards his ultimate declaration in favor of equal rights. Entering into politics at some period between 1850 and 1855, in which latter year he was elected to Congress, he commenced public life at a time when the most unquestioning devotion to slavery was the highest recommendation to public favor. Yet he hung back, and, while ridiculing abolitionists, he reserved all his denunciations for pro-slavery disunionists, avowing himself a disciple of Henry Clay upon the slavery question as well as upon other national issues. In the Kansas controversy he sought to do justice to the people of the Territory; and while refusing to recognize the Topeka constitution of 1856, he voted for every measure which seemed to promise a fair settlement of the difficulty, and a prevention of further outrage. To the Lecompton constitution of 1857 he offered an opposition as vehement as that of any Northern member of Congress. And finally, in 1860, he closed the protracted contest for the speakership by giving his vote for ex-Governor Pennington, of New Jersey, who was chosen by one majority. By this act, which was formally censured by the Maryland Legislature, Mr. Davis irrevocably cut loose from all pro-slavery influences, and lost his re-election in 1861. But it gave him a national reputation, and was an act as creditable to his foresight as it was to his patriotism.

On the memorable 15th of April, 1861, the day of Northern resurrection, Mr. Davis announced himself as a candidate for re-election to Congress on the basis of unconditional adherence to the Union. Four days afterward Baltimore was swept by a flame of treason; and even after the Federal troops took charge of the city the secessionists were allowed to vote, and Mr. Davis was defeated at the election held in June, 1861, by Henry May. In 1863, however, rebel sympathizers were excluded from voting, and Mr. Davis was again elected. He was the leading spirit in that canvass throughout the State, and organized and led to victory a party in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery in Maryland. This had to be effected by means of a constitutional convention, which was elected in 1864, and the work of which was ratified by a very small majority in October of that year. For the first time in his political history Mr. Davis was rejected by his own party in Baltimore that fall, and Mr. Phelps, whom nobody knows or cares to know, was nominated in his place for reasons which should be stated plainly.

Mr. Davis was a firm adherent of the Constitution. He believed that it gave ample powers for the conduct of the war; and he openly disapproved of Mr. Lincoln's well-meant, but clearly unconstitutional, suspension of the habeas corpus without the sanction of Congress. On the other hand, being himself a man of great energy and impatient of delay, he thought Mr. Lincoln slow and inefficient in the exercise of his constitutional powers for the suppression of the rebellion. He did not conceal his wish that Mr. Lincoln should not be renominated, and had some share in the private negotiations for the substitution of a new candidate. The Wade-Davis manifesto, issued immediately after Mr. Lincoln's "pocket veto" of the reconstruction bill in 1864, will be remembered as one of the severest criticisms ever passed upon him by sincere friends of the Union. Mr. Lincoln was not quite generous enough to prefer the rebukes of a faithful friend to the fawnings of toadies; and the whole influence of the Administration was used with success (a costly success for the loyal men of Maryland) to secure the defeat of Mr. Davis and his supporters. The nominations of Swann for governor and Phelps for representative, both of whom have betrayed their party and gone over to the rebels, were the melancholy results of Mr. Lincoln's interference with Maryland politics.

Mr. Davis was one of the first men to perceive and denounce the usurpations of Mr. Johnson; and his last public utterance was in a letter to The Nation, published in October, 1865, setting forth the errors of the President's policy, asserting the right and duty of Congress to control the subject of reconstruction, clearly foretelling the results of Mr. Johnson's course, and declaring himself unequivocally for universal suffrage. This letter is contained in the volume now before us. It is peculiarly interesting on account of its being the only published paper in which Mr. Davis spoke all that he felt, and as the first open declaration of a Southern man in favor of absolute equality of rights among men.

Mr. Davis died suddenly in February, 1866, just as his predictions were seen to be correct. His loss was deeply felt not only in his own State, but by loyal men everywhere; for there is probably no other man in the South who can exercise such an influence for good. A gentleman in every sense, by birth, education, and manners, he was always in hearty sympathy with the common people, and had a wonderful sway over their minds. His oratory, in early life somewhat too flowery, became gradually purer in style, and carried conviction to the hearts of his immediate hearers, while containing such solid argument as will bear reading after the lapse of years. We know few, if any, public men connected only with the legislative department of government whose biographies would be more instructive than his; and although this volume is only a contribution toward the history of his life, it will be found both valuable and interesting.

A WRITER in The Pall Mall Gazette, a few days ago, carried away, perhaps, by the desire of finding progress in individuals as well as in the race, declared that, with scarcely an exception, the later works of novelists exceeded in worth, or showed no signs of falling off from, their earlier productions. Thus "Mugby Junction" was not inferior to the "Cricket on the Hearth," and "Our Mutual Friend" would compare favorably with "David Copperfield" or "Dombey." But there is hardly one of the famous authors whom he mentions who would be thought by a jury of impartial critics to show no signs of flagging powers; and when we come to the second and third and fourth-rate writers, to the Woods and Southworths and Evanses and others of that school, what do we find but repetitions and retrogressions? Take "Ouida," for instance. When her (we do not know whether the name hides a man or a woman, but we prefer to say her) first novel appeared, one might have given very fair reasons for reading it. It dealt in an overheated and sensuous way with somewhat repulsive incidents. The male personages united great culture with great stupidity, and wise, if we may believe "Ouida," in everything else, they most unaccountably fell victims to a very poor kind of women. Then their lives were blighted and they became morbid. But yet the reader felt some interest in the characters that the book described, and perceived some vigor in the mode of presenting them; so he, or she, could read the book through without pronouncing it remarkably tedious. But compare "De Vigne" with "Idalia," and their author will at once be put among the many by whom the Pall Mall critic cannot hope to find his rule supported. If there was some show of power and some approach to naturalness in "De Vigne," in "Idalia" everything is weak, false, and exaggerated.

Consider the book in the various points in which a novel may claim attention; and first look at the plot and the characters. If you expect the characters to be true to nature, you find that they are governed by none of the powers that usually move men, and that they are swayed neither by passion nor by reason. If they fall under the influence of some strong motive or into some critical situation, the motive is not allowed to produce its proper effect, nor the characters to extricate themselves by their own energy, but a Deus ex machinâ must intervene to set them free. The heroes and the heroines in the book we commend to the attention of psychologists, and the plot with its developments by jerks cannot fail to please the most conservative geologist.

Turning from the plot and the characters to consider the general style, the descriptions of scenery, or the merits of the dialogue, one is moved to equal wonder and amusement. There is probably no country that has sufficient novelty to awaken the author from her conventionalities. The notices of the lands that her personages visit are as formal and unimpassioned as the account in a guide-book, and as stiff and monotonous as the hieroglyphs of an Assyrian temple. If she seems to be on the point of giving a faithful portrait of nature, her wretched style comes in to spoil the effect, and the taste is shocked by her wanton abuse of English. She does not quote French with the freedom that marked her earlier novels; but she falls a helpless prey to Eastern words and Italian. "Sailor," for instance, she cannot say, but she delights in marinaro. And if one would get an idea of her skill in compounding expressions, he has only to look at these bits of pure senselessness which are culled from a number far greater than the six hundred tedious pages that form her book: grandly careless—the luminance which blinds the eye of men (meaning the sun)—chance its loss—in that world unseen which revolves under the rose (can this be sub rosa?)—grand dead names of Gracchan Rome—too integrally proud—every woman is at heart a Bohemian—slumberously restful—seized him by the linen of his vest (probably a Hebrew idiom for "his linen vest")—he recovered his momentary discomfiture (a very undesirable thing to recover, one would think; but does not a celebrated D.D., in a work still extant, tell us that iron becomes deoxidized on exposure to the air?)—and so on.

But these instances are too glaring to escape the reader's notice, and we refrain from further quotations. Yet such blunders form the sole merit of "Idalia." If the book has any value, it is this: that it will furnish high school committees and examiners of teachers a most convenient manual of false syntax and generally execrable English. For this last object it can be heartily recommended.

Writers of text-books of dogmatics should notice *Hou*mousians and *Hon*moiousians, and the editors of Gibbon, Commeni; and there are none of us who cannot admire sentences like this: "Her thoughts were far away among the shadows of the past, the great past, when the Io Triumphe had been echoed up to the dim majesty of the Acropolis, and the roses had drooped their fragrant heads upon the gracious gold of Alcibiades' love-locks." But what does "dim majesty" mean in this connection, and what does "gracious gold" mean in any connection? And look at this absurd sculptor: "The sculptor looks at the broken fragments of her statues, and throws aside his Calliope in despair before those matchless works." But let us cease to waste time on a worthless book. Yet the author is to a certain extent a favorite, and words are not wasted that may help even stupid and silly people like fond readers of "Idalia" to look with proper contempt on the ignorance, sensuality, and vulgarity of a person who has never written a book that has done good nor a chapter that has not done harm—a woman who has lost the respect of the good, an author that an intelligent school-boy can laugh at.

ONE of our sins as regards the doctrine of Chiliasm has been the sin of dense and wilful ignorance. We have persisted in assuming that the world would last out our time, and have stolidly eaten and drunk, and married and been given in marriage, as if "The Great Tribulation" and "The Great Preparation" and "The Great Consummation" had never been written. But for this sin we hope forgiveness, inasmuch as it is shared so far as concerns density of ignorance by every Christian who has not and every Christian who has studied the Book of Daniel. The wilfulness is a worse feature in the case. So, also, is the fact that we have always laughed at Millerites in general, and Dr. Cumming in particular have had in special derision, as once, for instance, when Punch depicted the prophet of the Second Advent ceasing from his dolorous cry long enough to secure a twenty years' lease of his earthly house.

We make what atonement we can by publishing it abroad, so that all may inform themselves, that Messrs. Carleton & Co., of this city, have reprinted the three works by Dr. Cumming which are mentioned above, and with them one other, his latest, "The Last Warning Cry," a new and revised cry which finally, so far as the greatest of Chiliasts is concerned, closes up the whole business. It is now their own fault, not ours or Dr. Cumming's, if men are not fully prepared for the end of all things; at any rate, here is the doctrine of Chiliasm in a single volume, which may be cheaply bought and easily read.

We give the substance of it, for there may be men who will decline to read the book. The parable of the ten virgins describes under a figure the spouse of the Church returning to the earth to renovate it, reconsecrate it, and reign over it for a thousand years. The foolish virgins, says Dr. Cumming, are Christians who do not look for the speedy advent of the Saviour; the wise virgins are those who, like Dr. Cumming, do expect him. Now the ten virgins, just before the bridegroom's arrival, heard a cry, "The bridegroom cometh." The Church, if it will hearken, may hear this cry at the present moment. The Crimean war was followed by the Indian mutiny, that by the Italian war, that by the war between the North and South, that was closed by the assassination of Mr. Lincoln; "recently the son of the Autocrat of all the Russians was smitten by the pestilence from which he fled, and so the hope of a mighty empire sleeps in the dust." To this list we take the liberty of adding the Seven Days' War, the Cretan rebellion, the famine in India, the famine in the South, the fighting in the Corea, and the war in Mexico. We agree with Dr. Cumming that all this may be considered "distress of nations with perplexity;" and "distress of nations with perplexity," according to Dr. Cumming, was foretold by the Messiah as a sign of the eve of his approaching. We may doubt, however, if this description will apply to our Republican party, at any rate, though the doctor gives it as a description of the condition of things in the Northern States, "men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking for the things that are coming on the earth." But there are other signs, and Dr. Cumming quotes Sir Robert Peel, who said—we are not informed when or why—"every aspect of the present time, viewed in the light of the past, warrants the belief that we are on the verge of a universal change." Dr. Arnold is another witness; "Professor Robinson, the eminent American who has written so fully and ably on Palestine," is another; The Quarterly Review is another; "Dr. Krummacher, author of 'Elijah, the Tishbite';" Dr. Seiss, "Cunningham of Lainshaw," Bishop Chase, "Habershon," "Brooks"—gentlemen who seem to us to possess one, at least, of the distinguishing marks of prophets—are also cited as among the voices predicting the immediate coming of the final storm. A more remarkable member of the doctor's company of authorities is Lord Macaulay, who, we must say, is rather forcibly dragged in to testify; and Dr. Cumming may ponder the fate of Mr. Montgomery, and be thankful that his lordship is dead and can no longer contribute to The Edinburgh Review.

"Such is the opinion of Macaulay," he somewhat disingenuously says, at the end of a quotation from that author's well-known plea for the removal of disabilities from the Jews. Then there is Herschel, a chief rabbi in the synagogue of the Jews in London, "who thinks that the advent of the Messiah cannot be long delayed after the year 1863;" and there is Lord Shaftesbury, who thinks, as we may say we do, "that it does not proceed from any spirit of criticism" if we say that we believe the signs of the times are really unparalleled and wonderful, and are leading to some final consummation.

It being admitted that the end approaches, can we fix upon the exact time of its coming? It is well known that Dr. Cumming thinks we can; that, indeed, he has already several times fixed it. In "The Last Warning Cry" he once more returns to the prophetic books of the Old Testament, and, carefully going over all the ground again, he is led to the conclusion that the great event is pretty sure to take place in the course of this year or before the end of 1868. These are the data:

We read in Daniel of a period called 2,300 days. Also, we read in Daniel of time, times and half a time. We read in Revelations of time, times and half a time, which is there said to be 1,260 days. Again, we read in Revelations of 42 months. Now, these last three periods, whether they be days or hours or years or months, are plainly of the same length; a time is 360 days, and time, times and half a time is 360 days plus 720 days plus 180 days, making in all 1,260 days. 42 months, counting 30 days to a month, are equal to 1,260 days. In the end of his last chapter, Daniel adds 30 days to his 1,260, making 1,290; then he adds 45 more, making 1,355, and he says, if Dr. Cumming is to be believed—we have not looked up the passage—that whoever lives to see the end of this 1,335 days, "will live to see the first blush of the millennial morn." Then the doctor goes on to show that in Scriptural phraseology "day" is used when "year" is meant. Nothing remains but to fix on the year when the 1,335 days began, and at once we know when to expect the end of the dispensation under which we now live and the beginning of the thousand years of peace. We want to find a time when there rose up, while still existed the ten kingdoms into which the fourth great power, the Roman, was divided, a power that should be an overlooking power, an episcopal power, a power that should crush the people of God, a power that should set aside recognized seasons and times, for Daniel wrote, "He shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws," and all this the said power shall do for 1,260 years—"a time, times and the dividing of a time." Then he shall begin to be consumed away.

Well, in the year 533 the Emperor Justinian wrote to Pope John II.: "We have hastened to bring under your subjection, and to unite to the Church of your Holiness, all the priests of the eastern as well as the western district—to the see of your Holiness, the Head of all Churches." Thus, Dr. Cumming says, was organized the great apostasy which elevated a man to the headship which belongs to Christ, and this event and year, not the year A.D. 606, is the true terminus a quo in calculations of the beginning of Christ's reign. 533 and 1,260 make 1,793, the era of the French Revolution and of Napoleon, who dragged the Pope at his chariot wheels, and then the consuming of the papacy began; "whom the Lord will consume," the apostle says, "with the spirit of his mouth (a continuing action), and strike down with the brightness of his coming" (a sudden action). Daniel's final 75 years added to the 1,260, at the expiration of which period the consuming began, gives us the period when "the brightness of his coming" shall finish the work; and 75 added to 1,793 gives us 1,868, which is next year. We have only room to add that the papacy, the apostate power, has notoriously fulfilled the prophecy in regard to crushing the saints and speaking great words; and as for the predicted changing of times and seasons, Pio Nono dates his famous Encyclical in the tenth year after the authoritative promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception—much as Mr. Seward dates proclamations in such or such a year of the independence of the United States.

In outward appearances the books have the familiar cheap theological look—stiff, black, and gilt.

SOME men's "thoughts" are all that there is of them. It was not so with Horace Mann. His life was more than anything he ever said. And though his words would be inspiring if we knew nothing of the man that uttered them except what they convey, the story of his life gives them a wondrous emphasis. Not that his life went less than is common into his words. Rather is the opposite of this true, that few men coined their hearts so much as he. But so intensely did he feel and live that his gift of expression would have been most extraordinary had it enabled him to symbolize in speech the length and breadth of his capacity. He said and wrote a great deal that deserves to be remembered, but he communicated more than he taught. The personal force that was behind his words made them "half battles," and won the victories which men attributed to his eloquence. He had much logic but more character.

The publishers of the little volume now before us have done good service to the public in preparing such a compilation. It will go into many circles which a larger volume would not penetrate. It will tempt not a few persons to go further and know more about a man the fragments of whose thought have so much nourishment in them. But as his thought is not a perfect index of his life, so is this volume but an imperfect index of his thought. He always loved a fine antithesis, and could, upon occasion, cram a great deal of meaning into a few sentences; and so it has been possible to make a volume of his sayings that is good, although it does not give his thoughts in their connection. But it is in the connection that they should be given if we would see them at their best. His power was not in parts, but in the whole; or if in the parts, still more in the entirety and sweep of his discourse. To know him as a thinker, we must read his speeches made in Congress, his articles in The Common School Journal, and his reports as Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education. These show the cumulative nature of his thought. To convince men was his purpose, not merely to illustrate his ideas, and to this end he was not satisfied with crushing opposition with the weight of his arguments, he would also bury it with their bulk.

If this collection of his thoughts does not impress the reader as being either very suggestive or very original, it will not, then, be strange. Had it been made to appear so, it would have been even less truly representative than it is now. For these traits did not distinguish him. He was not a seer, but a sayer and a doer. He was not a first-rate man. He was an organizer. The men who organize are always second-rate. He originated nothing, and did not pretend to do so. His test of truth was portability. He liked phrenology on this account, because it was so practical and business-like. He left other men to seek new truth. For himself, he went to work to see if he could not embody some of that which was already in the world.

He was the incarnation of the practical. Writing to a friend, he says: "Men say that God is never in a hurry; but we are." In another letter he scouts the notion that having done our best, we are to leave to God the consequences. He fixed his eye upon these consequences, and argued from them to the means by which they could be gained. He was impatient for results. He despaired of the Republic almost every day. The death of a great man in whom he trusted seemed to fill him with alarm. "Can it be that God is not upon our side?" he asked, when Robert Rantoul died so suddenly just when he was needed most. The last words he ever spoke in public were the key-note of his whole life: "Be ashamed to die till you have won some victory for humanity." He was not content to be a skirmisher, to fight and fall not knowing how the tide would turn. He wished to see the end. Some men accept truth as their guide and follow it without reserve, certain that only good can come of doing so. Other men follow use. Of this sort was Horace Mann. He hated working in the dark. Whatever may have been his theory in practice, he was a strict utilitarian.

He consecrated all his energies to the improvement of his kind. In public life one does not often meet with men so free from selfishness. As a lawyer, he refused to take a case that he did not conscientiously believe he ought to win. He gave up his profession, which was growing every day more lucrative, and in which he might have risen to great eminence, in order to give all his energies to the cause of education. The extent and persistency of his labors seem almost incredible. The time he should have had for rest he gave to other causes closely allied to that which he most cherished—to the movement against intemperance, to measures in behalf of the insane, to penal legislation, to anti-slavery agitation. Would that the common-school system might find one such friend in every generation! But the story of his labors in behalf of education is almost tragical. At every step he met with bigoted and violent opposition. But it only put him on his metal, and, while it saddened him, made him work harder than ever. His views of education were not always so broad and philosophical as they might have been. Aurora Leigh tells Romney that his

Horace Mann was no poet, at any rate not enough of one to see what

Mrs. Browning felt the poet should be able to see. He was a great believer in habit and drill. He believed rather in instruction than in education; had boundless faith in circumstance and will, made small account of a man's organization. Put any soul in favorable circumstances and arouse its will, and no defect of organization could long keep it down. Had his success depended on the correctness of his speculations it might have been much marred. But it did not; and so, although no poet, he did not fail. The common-school system is not bound to any special form of education. But once fairly established it can be made the vehicle of the finest methods, and to Horace Mann, more than to any dozen men beside, belongs the credit of having so established it.

It is impossible to read the closing records of his life without being saddened. The petty annoyances that afflicted him as president of Antioch College were of a sort he did not need to discipline his character. But they told terribly upon a nature that had been already overtaxed. It was the old story. The place was too small for so large a man. But he could perhaps have borne the harness had not the gad-flies stung him so. It was a good thing for Antioch to have this man. No wonder that the young men loved and honored him. It is only for himself that it must be regretted that he accepted drudgery when he needed rest. For, judged by any standard but his own, these last years of his life were a success; but the victory cost him his life.

A Treatise on Entrenchments. By Francis J. Lippitt, Brevet Brigadier-General United States Volunteers, late Colonel Second California Infantry, author of "Tactical Use of the Three Arms." (New York: D. Van Nostrand, publisher, 192 Broadway. 1866.)—This little book is such an excellent one that our only regret in welcoming it is that it was not published in 1861 instead of in 1866. It contains instructions and suggestions that would have been of the utmost value to our intelligent officers of volunteers. It is a handsomely printed duodecimo volume of one hundred and fifty pages. The technical terms which belong to the art of field fortification are clearly and briefly defined by the author in such a way that they readily fix themselves in the memory. The principles of the art are accurately laid down, and many illustrations of their application are drawn from the history of modern warfare, including the recent war of secession.

The increased range which modern improvements have given to projectiles has had some influence upon the conditions of the problems presented in cases requiring the use of field-works, but it is rather in the application of the principles than in the principles themselves that any change is to be noticed. Thus, the line of defence of a bastion fort has been fixed at one hundred and sixty yards, upon the supposition that that was the greatest length at which the musketry fire of flanks could be relied on to sweep the ditch and reach the enemy in front of the salients. It is obvious that the increased range of the rifled musket permits the lengthening of this line very considerably. Again, the penetration of a rifled projectile being greater than that of one fired from a smooth-bore gun, it is necessary that the parapet should now be somewhat thicker than was sufficient a few years ago. General Lippitt is prompt in noticing these changes incident to the modern improvements in ordnance.

It is as a hand-book and aide-mêmoire that his book has substantial value. It is so simple that any intelligent man of fair education can master its contents with a moderate amount of study, and yet it seems to contain all that an officer whose command is not large enough for him to have an officer of the engineers on his staff can almost ever need to know about entrenchments. Mahan's "Field Fortification" is not much larger than this, and made larger only by the addition of chapters on water-courses and bridges and on permanent works, but it is so much more concise as to require closer attention. General Lippitt's book is better suited to the needs of those who have had no training in engineering, and, for the student, may well serve as an introduction to the admirable treatise of Mahan.

In a scientific work all illustrations of principles should be found in facts about which there is no dispute. It is, therefore, a fault in the book before us that the principle that "from the moment an entrenched position is turned, it is no longer of any value," should be thus illustrated: "So, at the battle of Fredericksburg, nothing saved the Confederates' entrenched lines from being turned . . . but the extraordinary inertness of the commander . . . specially entrusted with that duty." The author here seems to forget that the case he cites is one as to which students of the facts differ widely, and that a treatise on entrenchments is not the place for an ex cathedra judgment not only that Franklin was "specially entrusted" with a certain duty, but that he was guilty of "extraordinary inertness" in failing to perform that duty. It may be added that he seems to forget that an event which never happened cannot be accepted as proof that a certain consequence would have followed if it had.

The chapters upon the attack and defence of entrenchments are excellent in principle and full of useful practical suggestions. Like the other chapters, they are enlivened by "modern instances." The diagrams scattered through the work are sufficient in number, and well suited to their purpose. It is not often that a book passes through the press in which there is so much to commend and so little to criticise.

The Huguenot Galley-Slave. From the French of Jean Marteilhe. (Leypoldt & Holt, New York.)—This book is a good translation of the memoirs of Jean Marteilhe, which were originally published at Rotterdam in 1757. It is the true history of a slow martyrdom of thirteen years, chiefly spent toiling, half-naked, as a French galley-slave. The genuineness of the work has been doubted, but with no sufficient reason. Both external and internal evidence are satisfactory. The author was a humble confessor of the reformed faith, and might have prefixed to his story the words of a great apostle concerning twenty years of his life: "In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." These sentences of Paul are an epitome of this story, but the heathen here are Catholic priests and the most Christian king Louis XIV.

The style of the book is simple and natural even in its occasional tediousness. The writer is not versed in composition. He hardly knows how to write. But his sincerity and his very inexperience give an air of reality. Not only in its plainness and lack of ornament, but in its calmness and patience the book is evangelical. It is the gospel of the sufferings of Jean Marteilhe. The value of the book is threefold. First, as a piece of unpretending natural writing; second, as materials for the history of religion and French Catholic policy in the opening of the eighteenth century; and third, as a study of human nature. The book is true and real, and therefore interesting and valuable, being the life of a human being. It is the narrative of an eye-witness and sharer in extraordinary religious phenomena, and so of worth to the student of religion. Lastly, it paints with conscience and without passion various and striking characters, showing man in his greatness and his meanness, his degradation and his divinity. The great King Louis is exhibited in his magnanimity condemning a man to the gallows for one impertinent sentence, and in his mercy softening death to perpetual slavery. The charity and brotherly love of Turkish slaves put to shame the priests of the Christian religion. We see, too, how thirteen years of torture could not conquer a human soul filled with a great hope and seeing, though afar off, the living truth.

Charles Wesley seen in his finer and less familiar Poems. (New York: published by Hurd & Houghton, 459 Broome Street. 1867.)—The compiler of this little volume, Rev. Frederick M. Bird, is evidently well versed in matters of hymnology. To his present task he has brought enthusiasm and ability in equal parts, and as a consequence we have a very interesting compilation made from Wesley's entire works, which, as we are told, occupy above three thousand printed pages. Less than one-fifth of this amount of verse is generally known, and furthermore as it appears in the hymn-books is most fragmentary, and not infrequently is not a little altered from the original. To preserve the literary integrity of as many poems as have here been collected from their various hiding-places is a rule which Mr. Bird has resolutely followed. Nothing is here altered or abridged. The main object of the book is to convince us that Wesley was a poet and not a mere hymnist, or perhaps, more correctly, that in being a true hymnist he was at the same time a true poet. This object we are very sure will be attained. The charge that Wesley's matter has no more variety than his manner is abundantly refuted by the poems themselves. This book will go into many hands outside of Methodism, and for these it might have been better for Mr. Bird to bring "forth from his treasures things both new and old," according to their quality alone. By far the most interesting feature of the book is the autobiographic character of the first sixty pages. The most striking events and experiences of Wesley's life are here mirrored in his verse. Here the dark shadow of his early faith falls on the page; here, too, we see the light of his awakening to more cheerful views, the marks of persecution and sore struggle, the trace of love's alternate hope and fear, the bitterness of soul begotten of his son's "apostasy," and many other signs to indicate his style of character and life. The book is very neatly published and is as unpretending in appearance as it is thoroughly excellent in its conception and arrangement.

Two Marriages. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Christian's Mistake," etc. (New York: Harper & Brothers.)—As the merits and demerits of Mrs. Craik as a novelist have been already considered at length in this paper (Vol. I., p. 376), a few words only need be added concerning the volume now before us. "Two Marriages" are two separate stories, whose moral lessons are intended for the fathers of marriageable children. The one shows how a young life may be blighted by the blind tyranny of a worldly-minded father; the other, how the highest earthly blessing can be brought to a son, even despite a great transgression, by the judicious course of a truly unselfish and spiritual-minded parent. Both these tales are told in so simple and straightforward a manner as to make them seem like histories taken directly, and almost literally, from real life. They are of a nature to draw out Mrs. Craik's best qualities of womanliness and instinctive correctness of judgment between good and evil. It is not often that stories of seduction can be recommended to all readers, and especially to young men; but "Parson Garland's Daughter" is worthy of being widely known, inspired as it is by purity and that profound knowledge of duty which is wisdom. "John Bowerbank's Wife" is far less interesting. One does not care to read of cases which are sad and hopeless from the very outset.

Languages Without a Master. (Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.)—Sanscrit bothered Ensign O'Doherty, and to learn it thoroughly took a fortnight of his valuable time; other tongues he acquired in the space of a few hours. Bar him, and we fancy all languages would be without a master so long as they were taught in this manner—that is, in a hurry, on the Robertsonian method. A. H. Monteith, Esq., offers us here Spanish in four lessons, Italian in but five; French, German, and Latin in six apiece. Forty cents is the price of each small paper-covered volume. Of course any one who wishes to learn any of the languages above mentioned is not wise if he does not get himself a good teacher if he can. If he cannot, we may say to him that there is something to be learned from these books, and, so far as we can judge, little of it will have to be afterwards unlearned.

THE PROSPECT OF RECONSTRUCTION.

THE eyes of the country are just now turned more to the South than to Congress. The latter having passed a law providing a definite method by which the Southern States may regain their old footing in the Union, yet having left something to their option, the chief questions of political interest are whether those States will conform to the terms of the offer, and if so, what will be the result of their action.

The so-called legislatures of two States have already acted decisively, and in opposite directions. The Legislature of Virginia (we cannot well avoid the use of phrases that seem to admit a legality which we wholly deny) has passed a bill providing for the election of a convention in May, with liberty to colored men to vote. The Legislature of Louisiana, on the contrary, has passed resolutions declaring the acts of Congress void, and has summoned a convention, to be elected by white men only. Governor Wells has met this action by a proclamation announcing the law of Congress to be in force, and declaring all elections not held conformably thereto to be void. The Legislature of North Carolina has adjourned without taking any action.

In several States there are decided indications of a rising agitation, the sentiments of the white population being divided as to the expediency of reorganizing in accordance with the law, or of remaining inactive. Ex-Gov. Brown leads the movement in favor of reorganization in Georgia, where he is opposed by Col. Gartrell (formerly a member of Congress) and others. The only prominent Mississippian who has recommended such action is Gen. Chalmers, but he will soon be supported by others, although Gov. Humphreys is understood to be opposed to doing anything under the law. In North Carolina, the minority of the Legislature, comprising all who heartily welcomed the restoration of the Union in 1865, have taken steps toward the summoning of a convention in an informal manner. We have not heard of anything definite from the other States.

Upon the whole, we judge that, if the law is faithfully enforced by the President and his subordinates, the whole South will speedily conform to the terms of Congress. The amendment enacted at the instance of Mr. Shellabarger deprives the Southern whites of the option between military government and universal suffrage, which Mr. Sherman's proposition left to them; so that, whether they elect conventions or not, they must admit colored men to vote at all their current elections, while their only chance of escaping from military surveillance is by adopting constitutions recognizing the political equality of all men. The disfranchising clause affects only a very limited class, not including a single man under twenty-seven years of age; and it is improbable that the mass of people not excluded by law from political action will long continue to exclude themselves out of mere sympathy for the old race of politicians who are shut out. Even among the disfranchised class there are many sensible enough to comprehend the wisdom of submitting for a time to a limited disability rather than to keep their States out of all participation in the Government. Congress has deprived the stubborn of their favorite argument, that it was better to control the States, without seats in Congress, than to gain a place in Congress by sharing power with the colored race; for they are no longer to be left in supreme control of their States, and they can now see clearly the necessity of being represented in Congress.

It cannot be denied, however, that the soundest reasoning may fail to afford a basis for predicting the action of the Southern people. After the elections last fall it certainly seemed as if none but idiots would, in the situation of the Southern whites, refuse to accept the constitutional amendment as a basis of reconstruction. Yet they did so with comparative unanimity. And we presume that if they had a similar option under the Sherman statute they would reject it, even if they knew that worse terms would be imposed. But the new law gives them only the option between involuntary universal suffrage with military rule, and voluntary universal suffrage without military rule. This is, of course, upon the assumption that Mr. Johnson will execute the law in good faith. If he orders it to be set aside upon the first decision of a petty court against its validity, or if he repeats the let-alone policy adopted at the Alexandria election, the law will effect no good. But we think that he has too much sense of his own danger to make any such rash experiments on the forbearance of Congress.

Measures have been initiated in both Houses of Congress for the purpose of putting the machinery of reorganization in motion, under the direct supervision of the national authorities; and some measure of the kind will doubtless be enacted forthwith. This is clearly the proper method; and the only wonder is that so able a body as the late Committee of Fifteen should have so utterly failed in its duty as not to have reported such a bill at the last session. We rejoice, for the sake of all sections, North and South, that Congress has finally adopted the doctrine which we have steadily advocated, even when its success seemed hopeless, viz., that reconstruction should be immediate and compulsory, and not left to the choice of the insurrectionary population, either as to time or mode. Nothing could be more opposed to the theory of the Constitution than the let-alone policy which, while denying the validity of the de facto governments at the South, provided no means for the creation of legitimate governments. This false position, the result of timidity and distrust of the people, has been all along the weak point of the Radical policy. Its abandonment will give general satisfaction.

Under all the circumstances, there can be no doubt that nearly or quite all of the Southern States will be properly organized and reinstated in the Union within twelve or eighteen months from this time. The only question concerning our subject that really remains for solution in the future is as to the practical working of the new governments, and especially of universal suffrage.

It has been confidently asserted—and we have ourselves shared the apprehension—that the negroes, being confessedly ignorant, poor, and unorganized, would be surely controlled by their old masters when they came to vote. Of course there is much to be said upon that side; and, had universal suffrage been conceded in 1865, we think that such must have been the result in districts not fully garrisoned by national troops. But for nearly two years past urgent efforts have been made to introduce light among the colored people; and Northern men and women have steadily gained influence over them, while their Southern masters have, to a very large extent, thrown away whatever influence they may have had by their oppressive laws and obstinate resistance to the elevation of the colored race. Of this latter fact, the immense emigration of negroes from South Carolina and Georgia, and the loud complaints of planters in Louisiana and Texas, afford conclusive proof. The colored people have, moreover, organized themselves in every large town of the South, if not even more widely, during the last two years; and, with such assistance as their white allies will be prompt to give, they will be fully able to inform their brethren on plantations of the issues and the candidates. We therefore believe that the last hope of the disloyal will fail them, and that the colored voters will generally sustain candidates acceptable to the North.

No one can doubt that the complete restoration of the Southern States, freed from all their old inequalities and oppressions, will materially benefit the whole country. An impartial administration of justice will give new energy to the laborer; for who that has ever worked while in doubt of being paid (whether at mechanical or mental labor) has not felt the impossibility of putting forth all his energy and skill? Labor in the South has been performed for two centuries with a certainty of not being paid, and for the last two years in a total uncertainty upon that point. The lash, which formerly supplied a motive for drudging effort, has been latterly withdrawn, or at least has not come as promptly and surely as it was wont. What wonder is it that, with the accustomed terror removed, and no certain hope supplied, the labor system of the South has failed to produce the old results? But this defect will be thoroughly cured by a sound reconstruction, which will assure to all classes their rights. It will also remove from the white people the fear of confiscation and punishment, which now hampers the efforts of some of the most effective men at the South.

It will take away the last element of uncertainty from our political future, and leave us free to enter upon plans of business without fear of political disturbances. On every ground, moral, political, and financial, we welcome the near approach of a perfect reunion of the States.

THE "RISING" IN IRELAND.

The Fenian "rising" in Ireland, of which the news has been reaching us piecemeal during the past week, seems to have been the result of a plan for a simultaneous outbreak at various points in the island on the same day. The leaders are apparently all persons who have served on one side or other during the war in this country, and it is probably confidence in their skill and experience, and in their promises of help from the United States, which has secured them even the limited amount of help from the people which they have so far received; but, like most other plans of the kind, it has, as far as we can judge, totally failed. When men have to act in secret, under the eye of the police, at widely different places, complete concert becomes impossible. Unforeseen circumstances are sure to occur to prevent somebody doing what he undertook to do, at the time and in the way previously arranged, and a general change or postponement at the last moment is, of course, out of the question. Thus the "rising" in Kerry occurred some days before any movement was made anywhere else, and seems to have received no general support from the peasantry. One of the leaders, Moriarty, was arrested before it took place, when on his way to the scene of operations, and it does not appear that over two or three hundred, if so many, took the field. They were about to attack a police "barracks," but met a priest on the way who went and gave the police notice, and then came back and told the insurgents what he had done, and urged them to give up their enterprise. This, with the news that they were not supported in any other quarter, seems to have utterly disconcerted them. They at once scattered, and all that remains of the outbreak in Kerry appears to be a dozen or two fugitives in the hills whom the police are slowly hunting down.

A few days later similar "risings" occurred in Cork and in Queen's County and Kildare and Louth, each apparently consisting of the marching and countermarching of small bands, whose operations are confined to attacks on police "barracks," of one of which they are said, by the telegraph, to have secured possession. But in order to estimate the value of this achievement, the public here ought to know that these "barracks" are small stone cottages or "stations" scattered at certain intervals through the country, and garrisoned by a sergeant and five men. The Fenians would have to capture a great many of them before the "Irish Republic" came any nearer being established than it is now. Most of these attacks have been unsuccessful, a volley or two being, naturally enough, sufficient to disperse the ignorant, unofficered, and half-armed mobs by which they were made; and in cases in which the stations have been "captured," we suspect it has been owing to the police having previously evacuated them in order to concentrate.

If such a rising took place as the leaders, no doubt, contemplated and hoped for—the sudden appearance under arms of every man who had enrolled himself in the Fenian organization, followed wholly or even in great part by the peasantry—of course it would be a serious matter, and such a revolt, if prolonged and stimulated by a few successes at the outset, would doubtless require a large army for its suppression, and might maintain itself for at least one campaign if pains were taken by the chiefs to avoid great battles in the open field with regular troops. What may be done in this way by even half-organized bodies of men really in earnest, in a country affording good natural facilities for defence, was seen in the case of the Polish insurrection a year ago. But, then, it is safe to say that out of every one hundred men who took the Fenian oath, learned the "grips" and pass-words, and sung the songs in public houses, not over two have made their appearance in arms on the appointed night. In Ireland more than most other countries—though the same thing may be said of many other countries—there are always plenty of people who enjoy conspiring and being mixed up in the mystery of an illegal association, having the excitement of keeping an awful secret and dodging the police. The Irish have been doing this for two hundred years, and revel in it. The "Rapparees," "Whiteboys," "Peep o' Day Boys," "Rockites," "Molly Maguires," have all been Fenian brotherhoods on a small scale. But the number of active members of these associations as compared to the population at large has always been very small, and the work they undertook to do—the murder of bailiffs, landlords, informers, the houghing of cattle, and burning of houses—was always tolerably safe. The mass of the people rendered no assistance in it beyond refusing to give evidence or information against the perpetrators, and the chance of discovery or conviction was only one in a thousand.

Taking the field to fight regular troops in open daylight, to stand up against grape and musketry, is quite a different thing; and it would be against all experience of Irish conspiracies if any but a very small proportion of those who have undertaken to do it were found in the ranks on the appointed hour. The great body of the Fenians probably were snugly in their beds on the night of the rising, determined to wait and see how the thing got on before they showed themselves; and as to those who had not joined the organization at all, they have doubtless been so thoroughly canvassed already that their refusal to join was pretty good proof that they would give the movement no aid beyond refusing to give evidence against those who took part in it. This has been the story of all Irish rebellions. From 1688 down to 1798, the Catholics bore the most horrible oppression without stirring hand or foot, the very flower of their number going every year to recruit the armies of Louis XIV. When they rose in 1798 they had the secret sympathy or open approval of the clergy, and were headed by a very respectable body of the Catholic gentry; and they had much the same encouragement from France, brought about by a very similar course of events, that they are now receiving from America, and yet the movement was feeble and partial. It was confined to two counties, broke down after one or two shabby skirmishes, and left the chiefs in the hands of the hangman. Much the same story may be told of the unfortunate outbreak of 1803, in which Emmett perished, and of that of 1849, which began and ended in the battle of Ballingary. In fact, the plain truth must be told that the feebleness of the Irish attempts at rebellion, the loud talking which precedes them, the small amount of desperation or determination or concert or persistence or forethought which characterizes them, and the ridiculous failures in which they end, form one of the most awful illustrations of the demoralization worked by a long course of oppression. There is no lack of physical courage in the race. They have proved, both in the English and French and in our own service, with an organized government at their back and experienced officers at their head, that there is no lack amongst them of the highest military excellence. They have been as impetuous as Frenchmen, as steadfast as Englishmen, on some of the hardest-fought fields of history; but when they are called upon in their own country for the display of "the unconquerable hate, the study of revenge, the courage never to submit or yield," which are absolutely necessary to make a rebellion against a powerful government anything but a farce, they have been invariably found wanting. Something in the atmosphere—some moral poison, bred of centuries of misery and helplessness and despair—seems to quite vanquish them when the moment comes to strike, and leaves of the best-planned and best sworn-to conspiracies nothing but empty bottles, stale tobacco, bombastic speeches, and new uniforms and flags. The iron of English rule seems to have so entered into their souls that nothing political do they do well—not even rebel.

But we must not judge the poor fellows who have embarked in the present hopeless struggle in Ireland with the same judgment as the bands of "blatherskites" who set up an "Irish Republic" in New York and who organize the conquest of Canada safely behind dry-goods counters in the Bowery, or who cross the frontier in arms, knowing that when the fighting begins they can if they please run back in a few minutes to safe and friendly soil. Every man who takes the field in Ireland fights in a trap, and with a halter around his neck. Soldiers may well be amused by their attempts to upset a government like that of England, with their own clergy and men of education and the hardiest and dourest portion of the Irish population, the Leinster and Ulster Protestants, dead against them. But neither statesman nor moralist can witness their endeavors without pity. Only those who believe Ireland has no grievances, and that appeals for their redress to the English Parliament have met or seem likely to meet with fair consideration from it, constituted as it is at present, can judge harshly the few hundred men, fools and blind men though they be, who are now risking their lives in one more protest against a system which has produced so much misery, and of which the crowning condemnation is that it has made Fenianism possible. When He who sees in secret comes to reward us all openly, the unfortunates who are now wandering about the Irish roads as "rebels" will, we may be sure, be measured by a very different standard from that by which the world measures them to-day. No man who looks at the events of his own time in the light of history can fail to see in their efforts, puny though they be, a solemn appeal to the conscience of the English people, which we hope will not be marred by crimes or outrages, and which we are satisfied will not be made wholly in vain.

IMPEACHMENT FROM A LEGAL POINT OF VIEW.

PROFESSOR DWIGHT, of Columbia College, has recently made a very thorough examination of the nature of impeachment, of the crimes for which this mode of prosecution may be resorted to, and of the method of procedure, and the conclusions he has reached have been published in The American Law Register, and subsequently in a pamphlet which now lies before us. As he is the first lawyer of any prominence, so far as we know, who has undertaken to discuss impeachment as a legal question simply, and as he is removed both by position and habits from the arena of party strife, what he says on this subject is worthy the attention of everybody to whom the forms of law, as they are to us, are of deep and paramount importance, and who dreads as we dread the conversion of a legal process into a weapon of party warfare.

Mr. Dwight has made a very full and minute examination of the precedents from which the founders of this Government derived all their notions of what impeachment was, and from which, in fact, the word impeachment derives all its meaning, and he finds that impeachment and indictment are but two different modes of attaining the same end, but both are legal processes and governed in their course by legal principles. A man can only be impeached in England in cases in which he might be indicted. He is impeached on the presentment of the House of Commons; he is indicted on the presentment of a grand jury. But neither impeachment nor indictment means anything more than that there is sufficient reason to believe the defendant guilty of the offences laid to his charge to warrant his being put on his trial before the proper court, and pending the trial he is to be subjected to no greater inconvenience or restraint or deprivation than may be deemed necessary to secure his attendance from day to day. Says Mr. Dwight:

> "It may be asked why, then, is the cumbrous process of impeachment ever resorted to? The answer is, that there were often found in England persons who could not readily be tried by the common law courts, either owing to an influence which overshadowed the ordinary tribunals, or because technical rules of practice made the usual remedies scarcely worth pursuing. Moreover, impeachment was often adopted as an instrument of faction, and was especially active when society was disturbed by party contests or was in the throes of a revolution. In fact, through this process, Parliament ultimately triumphed over the executive, and Parliamentary government, with ministers responsible to the Commons for executive acts, was formed.
> "When the United States Constitution was framed, trial by impeachment was fully developed. It was not, however, adopted in that instrument as a regular mode of criminal procedure, to be employed in lieu of an indictment. It was made a means of trial of a crime so far as it had a political bearing. It is used as a means of depriving officers of their offices and of disqualifying them from holding such positions in the future. Still, it is requisite that a crime should be committed as a basis for the accusation. The Constitution provides, in substance, that the offence, so far as it has a purely criminal aspect, shall be tried in the ordinary courts; while so far as it affects the official character, it shall be the subject of impeachment. Though the English theory and procedure still substantially continue, impeachment in our law has a comparatively narrow scope. The House of Representatives, in analogy to the English House of Commons, has the exclusive power of impeachment, and the judicial power is vested in the Senate, in analogy to its deposit in the House of Lords."

As to the crimes for which a man may be impeached, they must, as settled by the English cases, be true crimes, known to the common law. The court of impeachment must administer the same law as an ordinary criminal court. It was the chafing of the Commons under this rule which in exciting times led them so frequently to pass bills of attainder. One great case, the impeachment of Lord Macclesfield, occurred a few years before the adoption of the American Constitution, in which the point whether any offence not an offence by common or statute law could be tried by impeachment was expressly raised, and it was decided that it could not. A similar decision was solemnly made in Lord Melville's case in 1806, when there was an entire absence of party feeling. The text-books, too, agree in declaring that impeachment does not differ in essentials from trials before ordinary courts; the rules of evidence are the same, and so are the legal doctrines as to crimes and misdemeanors.

From all this Mr. Dwight deduces the conclusion that as there are, under the laws of the United States, no common-law crimes, but only those which are contrary to some positive statutory rule, there can be no impeachment except for a violation of a law of Congress, or for the commission of a crime named in the Constitution. "English precedents," he says, "concerning impeachable crimes are consequently not applicable." Whether there are any crimes against the United States not statutory, was for some time the subject of much controversy; but Mr. Dwight holds the point to be now settled in the negative by a great number of cases collected by Mr. Wharton in his work on criminal law. The Senate has condemned in one case only — Pickering's—and as he did not appear, and the judgment was given by a strict party vote, the decision is of little value. The decisions of the other courts settle beyond question that United States tribunals do not take cognizance of offenses not statutory. But even if they did, Mr. Johnson could not be impeached for abusive language or general indecorum of behavior. Here, however, we are met by a serious difficulty which Professor Dwight does nothing to solve. Suppose the President were to commit, say, burglary when on a stumping tour, and were convicted and sent to prison by the ordinary criminal courts of the State in which the offence was committed, would there be no way of removing him from office? Would he still remain President? May the House impeach him, and the Senate try and depose him for being a criminal and in jail, if not for being a generally unworthy and vicious person? A great many cases of this kind might be imagined in which the exemption of the President from responsibility to Congress might produce extraordinary inconvenience.

As to suspension from office during the trial, the English precedents show that even where the office of the person impeached was held at the King's pleasure, the House of Lords, even when requested by the Commons, refused invariably to join in an address to the King asking for his removal; where the office was permanent, and not dependent on the King's pleasure, the Commons never even asked for suspension. As to suspension on impeachment under the American Constitution, Professor Dwight says:

> "Where an officer, like the President, holds his office by a certain tenure, the people, according to the principles of law, have a right to his continuous services, of which they cannot be deprived before his conviction for an impeachable offence, unless there is something in the language of the Constitution which confers the power of suspension by express words or necessary implication. If the officer holds at the pleasure of the appointing power, he may, of course, be arbitrarily removed by the person exercising the power of appointment.
> "There is no express language in the Constitution conferring the power of suspension. There is no necessary implication, because it has been shown by English practice that the power to impeach does not involve the power to suspend.
> "It is well, however, to go further than this. I maintain that the history of the Constitution, the debates upon it, and contemporary documents, plainly show that the power of suspension was studiously excluded."

In support of this position he cites the New York constitution of 1777, drawn by John Jay, and from which the provisions of the United States Constitution with regard to impeachment were closely copied. Now, the constitution of New York of that date does contain a clause expressly providing for the suspension of the governor on impeachment, and appointing the lieutenant-governor to fill his place; but this provision is omitted in the Federal Constitution, while all other clauses are copied. In addition to this, he makes the now familiar citation of Mr. Madison's opinion from the "Madison Papers," and cites, also

Chief-Justice Oliver's case from the works of John Adams, showing that the Chief-Justice continued to exercise his judicial functions in Massachusetts while under impeachment, although freeholders were so scandalized by it that they refused to be sworn before him.

ENGLAND.

I REMEMBER that two friends of mine, who were dabbling in chemistry, once made a highly explosive compound. They were so much frightened at what they had done that they crept out of the room in which it lay, upon their hands and knees. Presently, as no explosion followed, they came back and poked at it with sticks. Still it would not explode. Then they thumped it harder, and, at last, when it still remained obdurate, they threw it into the fire, where it smouldered away calmly with one tiny fizz. This interesting reminiscence may serve as an allegory descriptive of the great Fenian insurrection. After many months of anxiety, suspension of the habeas corpus act, and all kinds of ominous forebodings, it has come at last; the explosion has taken place, and the sound has scarcely been audible to the unassisted ear. The Fenian campaign was apparently to consist of two parts: a rising in Ireland, with a sudden coup de main in England to act by way of diversion. Accordingly, one Monday afternoon the inhabitants of the ancient city of Chester saw their streets swarming with strangers. It is true that they were unarmed and confined themselves to walking up and down, but in their accents the pale burghers distinguished the dreaded Irish-American twang, and in their walk there was a certain military swagger. Chester Castle contained a certain quantity of arms and ammunition and very few troops—as befits an old castle in the heart of a peaceful country. Mayors and lord-lieutenants and commanders of volunteers sent off telegrams in hot haste; troops were sent in from one quarter and another; the volunteers were armed; the citizens were sworn in as special constables; and the Fenians continued to walk up and down with a certain military swagger for the space of two days. They gathered into little knots which dispersed when spoken to, and even under the influence of liquor they let out no hints as to their nefarious plans. On Tuesday evening they went quietly back by train to Liverpool; the Fenian diversion was over, and an enthusiastic mayor was enabled to despatch a true Napoleonic bulletin, beginning "Chester is safe." Some sceptics said that a prize-fight had been arranged for that day near Chester, and that the mysterious strangers were merely the roughs who were on their road to attend it; but I think there can be but little doubt that they were in fact Fenians, if only because it is so exquisitely Fenian that the whole affair should end in the exhibition of a certain military swagger.

But next day came more awful intelligence. The Fenians were up in Ireland; police stations were being stormed; telegraph wires cut; railways broken up; bands of men were collecting in green uniforms under the command of experienced officers; fresh bands had been landed from ships off the coast; and, in fact, the explosion was really coming off this time. Rumors of all sorts flew about for a day or two, and so much dust was thrown up that it became exceedingly difficult to distinguish the facts. When at last a definite substratum of information merged from the bewildering clouds of fiction, the insurrection reduced itself to this: A number of men had begun to plunder a coast-guard station. They had shot a policeman who fell in with them whilst carrying a message for assistance, but did not wound him mortally. They then seem to have dispersed; but the troops, after scouring the mountains round Killarney for two or three days, found a few cartridges, and saw, or thought that they saw, fifteen or sixteen men on the top of a distant mountain. It must be a consolation to the Fenians that they have undoubtedly wounded one policeman, as, but for that incident, future historians might imagine that the whole outbreak was purely mythical. And certainly, considering that the net result of the insurrection was one partially effective rifle-shot, they made a very fair amount of noise for their money; as I presume this is one great object of Fenian disturbances, I am happy to congratulate them upon their success.

It should be added, as a last touch, to prove the felicitous nature of their combinations, that Government had just promised not to apply for a renewal of the habeas corpus suspension act, which would naturally expire in a few weeks. Of course this disturbance may, though I hope it will not, lead to a continuance of the suspension. Meanwhile we have seen the end of another of those melancholy farces which recur with such curious regularity in Irish history.

Whilst Chester was in the agonies of attempted revolution, a failure, almost as great as that of the Fenians, was being encountered by her Majesty's Government in the House of Commons. Mr. Disraeli was expected on that night to reveal the Government scheme of reform. The nature of that scheme had been kept a profound secret; the veil was to be raised at length, and the world was to know whether the Tories would trump the Liberals by larger offers of enfranchisement, or would endeavor by some skilful juggling to get the credit of offering Reform whilst rendering the measure delusive. The House was, of course, crowded to its utmost limits; and great was the expectation when Mr. Disraeli rose to speak. I have always been told, and can fully believe, that Mr. Disraeli is at times an admirable speaker; I have heard him speak effectively when he is taunting his opponents on some personal question; no one can throw in a biting bit of sarcasm with more telling effect or with greater appearance of unconscious ease. But when Mr. Disraeli gets upon his high horse, and pours forth a string of generalities, intended as political wisdom, it is impossible to deny that he is disagreeably pompous. He has a beautiful voice; but he hums and haws and mouths his sentences, and gesticulates after an artificial and theatrical fashion, and is, in short, entirely unable to get up that flow of generous enthusiasm which carries Mr. Gladstone away, and enables him to carry his audience with him. He is always the clever politician, trying various artificial substitutes for genius, which never quite answer; his political wisdom rings hollow; it is flashy and tinselly, and makes no appeal to passion; the higher he attempts to soar, the more thoroughly unsatisfactory he becomes. Moreover, Mr. Disraeli is not only too much of an actor, but he never quite suits his acting to his audience; whether it is that he has something too much of the Jewish element in his character I know not, but certainly he signally fails in the important art to an English minister of being thoroughly in harmony with the sentiments of English gentlemen.

Now, on Monday night Mr. Disraeli was at his worst; he spoke for two hours, and throughout those two hours the chief material of his speech was composed of frothy platitude. A few personal hits—one bitter remark upon Mr. Goldwin Smith, whom he described as a "rampant lecturer"—were applauded; the rest fell very coldly even upon his own party. Scarcely a cheer was heard during a speech certainly ill-calculated to rouse party enthusiasm. The pith and substance of it came to two propositions: First, Mr. Disraeli declared with much parade that it was time that Reform should cease to be a party question; which means to say that Mr. Disraeli thinks he ought to stay in, whether he can carry his own views on the most important question of the day or not. This rather cool proposal was wrapped up in a good deal of very fine philosophy; but somehow it still seemed cool. Secondly, Mr. Disraeli said that the views of Government would be indicated in certain resolutions to be published the next day. Thus the secret still remained a secret; and when the resolutions appeared the secret was preserved nearly as well as ever, for most of them were platitudes, which really decided none of the main points. The chief question is, of course, the extent to which the franchise should be enlarged, and the resolutions only say that it is to be enlarged without condescending to say how far. This, together with the redistribution of seats, forms the real battle-field, and will still remain open for discussion after the resolutions have been debated. Hence, the resolutions seem merely calculated to waste time, as they involve a whole preliminary discussion before the really important matters can be settled. If the Liberal party were sincere, there would doubtless be an attempt to turn out the Government at once, on the ground that such shilly-shallying with a matter of such importance cannot be allowed; but the Liberal party is anything but sincere. I do not believe that a hundred members in the House really desire a large extension of the franchise; the remainder of the soi-disant reformers merely vote for an extension because their constituents insist upon it, but will be glad of any pretext for bestowing the gift as grudgingly as possible. Hence the decision of the question depends upon the zeal of a small minority, upon the general desire to get the question settled in some way or other in order to make room for other business, and upon the pledges given by the leaders of all sides of the House. But with so small a leavening of real enthusiasm, it is hard to say what will be the end of a measure tossed about by so many and such conflicting political forces.

One other failure took place the same evening, which may be compared with that of the Fenians on the Government. It had been resolved to get up a monster procession to show the sense of the people on the reform question, which was to march from Trafalgar Square to Islington and there to hold a monster meeting. The procession, like the former one, was quiet and respectable, but it was still smaller in numbers—so small as to be a distinct failure. The fact is, either the people don't care very much about reform or they don't like processions. I believe both these statements to be partially true. There is a general desire for reform, but it has not yet reached the point at which monster meetings become a natural mode of expression. There is nothing at all revolutionary or violent about the sentiment, and there will not be unless Government commits some gross folly. Moreover, Londoners, having seen our procession, had had quite enough of it; the interruption to business and traffic caused by a long row of shabby men with very bad bands of music becomes a bore. We do not see why Regent Street should be sacrificed for two or three hours to abortive efforts to get up such demonstrations. If they were successful, it would be another thing; but a mediocre procession, like a mediocre poet, is tolerable neither to gods nor men.

The mention of Trafalgar Square reminds me of one fact which may interest those of your readers who know London. Nelson's monument is completed—only sixty years after his death—by the four bronze lions which have long been expected. Sir Edwin Landseer has been employed upon them for eight years, and it is rather disappointing to find that, instead of four different lions, we are only allowed four repetitions of one lion. Such as they are, they lie admired by most spectators, and as grimly couchant as the British lion ought to be. The well-known lion of the Percys, on the top of Northumberland House, looks down upon them indignantly with his tail stiffly extended, but in spite of his obvious disapproval, and the criticisms of The Saturday Review, I think that the lions are generally liked. At any rate, I hope that Nelson—if he is still in a position to care about bronze lions—is gratified by this proof of our affectionate regard for his memory. His effigy on the top of the column looks more like a small mast-headed midshipman than ever, now that he is dwarfed by these metallic monsters. They cost £11,000 for casting, which is said to be extravagant, and Sir Edwin received in addition £4,000 and Baron Marochetti (who superintended the casting in his own studio) £2,000. It is an ill movement which brings nobody any good.

Correspondence.

A CORRECTION FROM MR. WHITTIER.

To the Editor of The Nation:

I am very well aware that merely personal explanations are not likely to be as interesting to the public as to the parties concerned; but I am induced to notice what is either a misconception on thy part, or, as is most probable, a failure on my own to make myself clearly understood. In the review of "The Tent on the Beach," in thy paper of last week, I confess I was not a little surprised to find myself represented as regretting my life-long and active participation in the great conflict which has ended in the emancipation of the slave, and that I had not devoted myself to purely literary pursuits. In the half-playful lines upon which this statement is founded, if I did not feel at liberty to boast of my anti-slavery labors and magnify my editorial profession, I certainly did not mean to underrate them or express the shadow of a regret that they had occupied so large a share of my time and thought. The simple fact is, that I cannot be sufficiently thankful to the Divine Providence that so early called my attention to the great interests of humanity, saving me from the poor ambitions and miserable jealousies of a selfish pursuit of literary reputation. Up to a comparatively recent period my literary writings have been simply episodical, something apart from the real object and aim of my life; and whatever of favor they have found with the public, has come to me as a grateful surprise rather than as an expected reward. As I have never staked all upon the chances of authorship, I have been spared the pain of disappointment and the temptation to envy those who, as men of letters, deservedly occupy a higher place in the popular estimation than I have ever aspired to.

Truly thy friend, John G. Whittier.

Amesbury, 9th 3d Mo., 1867.

[To say that an author has "more than once of late seemed to express a regretful feeling that his life had not been devoted to poetry pure and simple" instead of being spent in turning "the crank of an opinion mill," is not to say that he entertains a settled conviction that his life has been unprofitably or disagreeably spent. We all have our occasional moments of regret, but in a year there are three hundred and sixty-five days and in each many moments. We have never doubted that Mr. Whittier's habitual feeling in looking back on his distinguished and most honorable career is, as it ought to be, one of honest satisfaction and thankfulness that he has been enabled to improve great opportunities. Still, he has recently seemed to express, humorously in the "Tent on the Beach," more seriously elsewhere—for instance, in a rhymed preface to the late two-volume edition of his poems—the half-regret which was all we had in mind when the review in question was printed. —Ed. "HORTICULTURAL MORALITY."

To the Editor of The Nation:

In an article in your journal of Feb. 28, headed "Horticultural Morality," statements are made in regard to my volume entitled "Flowers for the Parlor and Garden" which, as they reflect personally upon me, I feel compelled to answer.

Were the article a mere review of a volume which has now been before the public unquestioned for more than four years, I might pass over the matter in silence.

In reply, however, I will confine myself wholly to the allegations asserted to be matters of fact, leaving unnoticed the personalities and the general discourteous and ungenerous tone of the whole article.

The first statement is that "the bulk of the book is taken, some would say stolen, from the work of a brother (English) horticulturist and author, Shirley Hibbard, who published, through Groombridge & Son, in 1857, a book called 'Rustic Adornments.'"

This statement is, in the first place, deliberately false as far as the text is concerned, as, indeed, the writer virtually admits himself when, having spoken of "Flowers for the Parlor and Garden" as a book of 408 pages, he at length confines himself to the pages between 232 and 286 as including the "stolen" matter, being in all 54 pages.

Now let us look at these 54 pages in detail: pages 232 to 253 are devoted to the Wardian case; of these 20 pages a portion are occupied by illustrations and the descriptions of the same, parts of which were condensed from various writers, and among others from Mr. Hibbard, as my publisher sent me leaves with illustrations torn from a volume which I have within a few days learned to be Mr. Hibbard's. These, by publication in journals and papers, had become public property, yet, in fact, they comprise but a small part of the twenty pages, the remainder being wholly original and the results of my own experience. The history of the discovery of the principle of the Wardian case and its description are also matters of common property. To sum up the matter, we have in these two chapters at the most four pages which are not original.

The next ten pages, from 253 to 263, treat of hanging baskets and ivy; these are wholly original; there is nothing upon the subject in Mr. Hibbard's book.

The next ten pages are upon Waltonian cases. At the beginning of the chapter, vide p. 263, the following sentence will be found: "We can, however, lay no claim to originality in this chapter; we have but collected all the best information on the subject." This information and the illustrations of the chapter came mostly from "The Cottage Gardener," vide Vol. III., p. 2—new series and passim for several years before. The next fourteen pages are devoted to the aquarium; as in the chapter on Wardian cases, a portion of these gives a description of the cuts, and these are not original; the cuts, however, do not come from Mr. Hibbard's book, but from a volume on aquaria published in London about 1855, and from which Mr. Hibbard's cuts were probably copied.

The best answer to the assertion in regard to the chapter on the tuberose is contained in the following letter from the gentleman whose experience I am alleged to have stolen:

"Boston, March 4, 1867.

"E. S. Rand, Jr., Esq.:

"Dear Sir: Having seen in The Nation newspaper an article reflecting upon you as author of 'Flowers for the Parlor and Garden,' I deem it but an act of simple justice that I set the writer right in relation to one of the allegations of his charge. I therefore address you this note, with leave to use it as you please.

"I allude to the portion of the article on tuberoses, the simple history of which is this: During the year 1861, while on the Committee on Plants and Flowers in the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, I (at your request as chairman of that committee) prepared an article upon its cultivation, the result of my experience and experiments, which was published in the 'Transactions of the Society' for that year, and thus became public property. Yet you were gracious enough, while preparing your book, to ask my leave to transfer its substance to your pages, which I freely granted. If the author of the attack will take the trouble to look into your book again, he will see that you do not claim the experience as yours, but give due credit to another (see p. 199). Kindly yours,

"E. W. Buswell."

Thus far as to text, the amount of the whole being that, out of a volume of four hundred and eight pages, about eight pages are not original.

Now as to illustration: and in the first place the author is in no way responsible for any of the illustrations which were furnished by the publishers, by whom the whole expense of the volume was borne.

The book contains in all about ninety illustrations, counting initial letters and tail-pieces; of these twenty-four are alleged to have been copied.

Of these so said to be copied those on pages 15 and 48 are original.

Those on pages 252, 253, 262, and 273 are insignificant initial letters or tail-pieces.

Those on pages 232, 235, 237, 238, 265, 266, 267, 274, 275, 280, 281, and 282 illustrate the text of the Wardian and Waltonian cases and the aquarium, and are copied, as we have stated; as are also those on pages 140, 224, 244, 286, and 307.

When it is remembered, as will be seen by reference to the volume, that these are generally the smallest illustrations in the volume, the spirit of the article will at once be manifest.

In regard to Mr. Hibbard's book, I never had it in my possession; as before stated, my publisher sent me certain cuts with a small portion of annexed text; what more natural than to use the ideas or even the words of another in illustrating his figures? I have never claimed these figures as original, but have ever in public and private told their origin as far as known to me, as many will bear me witness.

These remarks, however, have reference, as we have seen, to only a very small part of the volume, most of which, both in text and illustration, is entirely original, and embodies the results of my own experience.

What object the writer of "Horticultural Morality" had in view it would be difficult to conceive.

I may also be allowed to say, as it has been hinted to the contrary, that my only object in writing this series of volumes has been and is the advancement of horticulture, the pecuniary interest which I may have being so trifling as not to be worth mentioning.

In conclusion, I can only say that I have no wish to avail myself of the labors of others without giving due credit; if in the least respect I have seemed to do so, it has been unintentional; and in regard to the matter specially in question, any person interested, by comparing the two volumes, can be himself a judge of the merits of the case.

I deprecate a newspaper controversy, and ordinarily should allow an attack to pass unnoticed; but when statements so entirely false and calculated to mislead the public are gratuitously made, and when these statements also reflect personally upon me, I feel it a duty to myself and the public that such an article should not go unanswered.

EDWARD S. RAND, JR.

BOSTON, March 5, 1867.

[Mr. Rand complains that the notice of his book, "Parlor and Garden," in THE NATION of Feb. 28, is unjust and untrue, and assigns, in support of his complaint, several reasons, which may be classed as follows:

1. The statements made by the critic are false.

2. If they are true, they are of no consequence.

3. Some of the charges are undoubtedly true, but Mr. Tilton is responsible for the faults charged.

4. Mr. Rand has admitted in some places that he had no personal knowledge of the subject treated, and has, therefore, honorably acknowledged that what he wrote must have been borrowed.

5. Mr. Buswell is perfectly satisfied with the treatment he received.

6. Mr. Rand did not know that Mr. Hibbard's book was the source from which he obtained his information, because Mr. Tilton sent him pages torn out of a book from which to extract his materials, and he never knew what the book was.

7. Mr. Rand has frequently, in the presence of friends and acquaintances, disclaimed the credit due for the portions of the book he did not originate.

8. Malice must have prompted the reviewer to resuscitate a book published five years ago, and hitherto unchallenged.

Mr. Rand asserts that a comparison will show any one that his book was not borrowed from Mr. Hibbard. Let us look at the book itself:

> "Flowers for the Parlor and Garden. By Edward Sprague Rand, Jr. Illustrations by John Andrews and A. C. Warren. Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1863, by Edward S. Rand, Jr., in the Clerk's office of the District Court of the District of Massachusetts."

E. S. Rand, Jr., and no one else, plainly claims the whole book as his work and property, yet he pleads that he had nothing to do with the illustrations, which "were furnished by the publisher;" and again he says: "parts of which (the text) were condensed from various writers, and amongst others from Mr. Hibbard, as my publisher sent me leaves with illustrations torn from a volume which I have, within a few days, learned to be Mr. Hibbard's." Such a want of curiosity on the part of Mr. Rand is without parallel.

This plainly represents Mr. Tilton as editor and author, and yet the book presents no evidence of his complicity. He must have been at least equal to Mr. Rand in authority if he could furnish large portions of the book, Mr. Rand not even knowing where the extracts came from. Mr. Rand must have great confidence in Mr. Tilton's judgment to permit him to interpolate pages into his MS. in this manner. Can we believe our eyes when we read that Mr. Rand confesses to the public he wishes to teach that he has no power over his own MS., but that his publisher illustrates it as he pleases? This is purely ridiculous. Neither Mr. Rand nor the merest neophyte of an author would permit such an interference. Mr. Rand would have us believe that the illustrations, instead of being aids to the text to impress it more firmly on the mind, are mere prettinesses sprinkled in according to the economy or fancy of a publisher. If this is true of the relations between Mr. Rand and Mr. Tilton, Mr. Rand had better stop making books.

But admitting the fact that some of the illustrations were from Hibbard, Mr. Rand thinks we are making a great deal of fuss about a trifle. At most there are but twenty-four stolen cuts out of ninety, and many of them are very small. If he would confess where the other cuts came from, if not taken from "Rustic Adornments," we should find the ninety still further and very greatly reduced. The drawings are said to be the work of A. C. Warren, a very conscientious man. But we do not find Mr. Warren's name on more than four cuts. These, then, are all he cares to claim as his, leaving eighty-six taken from some book and directly transferred to the wood block. We find that there are more taken from Hibbard than we claimed before, the whole number being thirty-one. Mr. Rand asserts that the cuts on pp. 48 and 15 are original. The cut on p. 15 is not original; it is one of the emasculated illustrations referred to before, and is identical with pp. 3 and 2 of Hibbard, excepting its centre. The rock-work of Hibbard's illustration has been replaced by a green-house in Rand. This same treatment has been applied to the half-page illustration on p. 326—not claimed before—where the terrace of the cut on p. 327 of Hibbard is altered into a sloping walk; the Normandy poplars are converted into a green-house; a lady sitting on a chair is turned into a group of shrubs. The cut on p. 48 we did wrongly quote as from Hibbard, but we fill its place in our list by the cut on p. 7, which serves as a frontispiece to the book, which comes from p. 403 of "Rustic Adornments."

"But," says Mr. Rand, "when it is remembered, as will be seen by reference to the volume, that these are generally the smaller illustrations in the volume" (not true, by the way), "the spirit of the article will be manifest." Well, perhaps size is an excuse. It may not be so wrong to steal a calf as a cow, and he should be excused so far as the things he took were little things; but of the number one-third are either full or half-page illustrations. There are thirty-one taken from Hibbard, and as the wrong is to be reduced two-thirds for size, we must consider that only fifteen are really taken without acknowledgment.

But to come to the text: Mr. Rand publishes a letter from E. A. Buswell, who therein disclaims any feeling about the tuberose chapter, and says that the mention of Mr. Rand's old friend on p. 199 is all that he requires to satisfy him.

We will quote the passage to enable the reader to judge for himself if the public should be as easily satisfied as Mr. Buswell:

> CHAP. IX. "How can I blow my tuberoses? They grow well; they produce abundance of foliage, healthy as could be desired, but no flowers. Yet their culture is easy. They will blow freely with but little care, yet you must learn how to do it. And this secret was communicated to me a few years since [our italics] by an ardent lover of this flower, who proved it by producing spikes of bloom with twenty or thirty flowers." "The tuberose is a native," etc.

What does this acknowledgment amount to? No reader ever supposed, as he passed on from these quoted passages to the next sentences, that this friend who, several years since, taught Mr. Rand, wrote two and a half of the three and a half pages (between pages 199 and 203) which make this chapter on the tuberose, and published them in the "Transactions of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society" (pp. 45, 46, 47), from which Mr. Rand has taken them verbatim. It is an evasion for Mr. Rand to try to escape the charge of using the printed labor of another person unacknowledged, by publishing Mr. Buswell's letter. What less could Mr. Buswell do than write it, considering that he is in daily intercourse with Mr. Rand and had no part in criticising him?

To analyze this book and cite all the borrowed matter would require a book as large as Mr. Rand's, but we will select a few examples to throw a little light on the way Mr. Rand makes books.

Two-thirds of the book describes the specific treatment of different plants. The horticulturist who reads Mr. Rand's directions finds nothing new in them, nothing but what has been frequently said elsewhere. An example of Mr. Rand's method of giving original directions may be found on page 221, where he treats of "The Lily of the Valley." This part of the book was not referred to before. Mr. Rand claims as his own all but that which was mentioned by THE NATION. But we find ten pages devoted to "The Lily of the Valley;" half of a page is the introduction, mostly Rand's, then commence the sentences which are the gist of the chapter: "If it is intended to remove the tubers when in flower," etc. From "if" to the words "is the same," nearly at the end of the second page, the whole is taken verbatim from page 612 of "The Cottage Gardener," 3d vol., new series; quite original, certainly, but not with Mr. Rand.

This does not prevent Mr. Rand's advice from being desirable, because an old thing newly and well said is often more valuable than new matter; but to claim the old thing as private property is stealing. Many of Mr. Rand's methods, in lieu of being new, or even the words of the author, are simply restatements or hashes of other people's ideas. Thus:

"For ordinary tanks almost any of the common aquatic plants found in brooks or ponds will be suitable. It is an interesting fact that the coarsest plants soon adapt themselves to circumstances, and that their growth becomes more delicate. "The common (Potamogeton) pondweed appears too rank as a plant for an aquarium, but in less than a month its character becomes changed; it throws out delicate roots, sheds its coarse foliage, and acquires a smaller, neater and more delicately veined dress of leaves, and is a beautiful plant."	"For ordinary tanks and bell glasses almost any of the common weeds found in ponds and brooks will be suitable. Those which have a large growth, like Potamogeton and Ranunculus aqualitis, being the least suitable. "It is, however, an interesting fact that the coarse plants soon adapt themselves to the circumstances of the case, and native robustness being subdued by confinement, their habit of growth becomes more delicate and refined. "Potamogeton densus, when lifted from its cozy bed, appears too rank a plant for growth in a tank, but in less than a month its character changes; it throws out delicate white rootlets, sheds its coarse foliage, and acquires smaller, neater and more delicately veined leaves, and at last becomes a beautiful object."

We should hardly deem it necessary to give other examples of Mr. Rand's method, had he not said in writing, "I have no recollection of ever copying a word from any volume," perhaps because he used "leaves torn from a book." "After a rough MS. left my hands, it was corrected by the publisher, and I never saw it again till I read the proof, which I did (as is my custom) without reference to the MS." If Mr. Tilton interpolated the many pages taken from Hibbard (not eight, as Mr. Rand says), Mr. Rand must have been rather surprised when he got his proof.

But, however culpable otherwise, Mr. Rand feels clear about the Waltonian case chapter, because he says in the first part of the chapter, "We can lay no claim to originality in this chapter; we have but collected all the best information on the subject." This would be a good defence if the pages following had been written in the same spirit; but no person would ever suspect, as he continues to read, that all the rest of the chapter is taken from Hibbard verbatim, or adapted. Thus, he continues from the passage quoted with extracts from Hibbard until he comes to the passage quoted in THE NATION of Feb. 28, which he alters as therein described, and then continues verbatim until he comes to the words "a shilling a week;" as the currency might betray him, he substitutes "fifty cents a week." The next three lines he changes in like manner, and then returns to Hibbard for two pages and a half. Then follow two pages of some other author or "leaves torn" from some other book, and then Hibbard again for another page, ending with one of his changes:

"The limited size of the case may seem to militate against it somewhat; but though it is not intended for the commercial florist, who must strike cuttings by the thousand, it nevertheless will perform such an amount of work, when well managed, as to meet the wants of most amateurs who delight in a garden of limited dimensions."	"The small size of the case may seem to be against it, but will perform such an amount of work, when well managed, as to meet the wants of most amateurs." [We have here about four and a half pages of Hibbard, plus two taken from page 2 "Cottage Gardener," Vol. III., new series.]

This chapter is so ingeniously managed that no one would suspect that Mr. Rand was not the original writer of the whole matter. He treats the chapter on the Wardian case in the same way (p. 233). After reading a few paragraphs of Mr. Rand's, we come to one beginning, "Mr. Ward extended the experiments," etc., where, without any warning, we pass from Rand to Hibbard. After half a page of Hibbard, Mr. Rand reduces the two following pages of Hibbard, beginning, "Mr. Ward extended the experiments, and arrived at the conclusion that certain kinds of vegetation readily," into about nine lines, commencing: "The experiment was extended, the case was shown," etc. He returns to Mr. Hibbard, with very slight changes of text to the end of the chapter. He makes such introversions as this:

HIBBARD.	RAND.
"One side of the sarcophagus top should be fixed on hinges to let down as a door, to give the necessary ventilation occasionally."	"One side of the top should be fixed on hinges, so as to give occasional ventilation."

To the end of this chapter, ten pages in all, Mr. Rand adheres closely to Mr. Hibbard, using his words, lines, and sentences, condensing in some places, taking literally in others; but no one, with Shirley Hibbard and Rand before him, would for a moment deny that Rand is a simple reproduction of Hibbard. If, as he says, he condensed it from various authors, to none of whom he gives any credit, it is strange that he should employ Hibbard's words.

We might continue these quotations from other parts of the book, but enough has been said to overthrow Mr. Rand's charge of falsehood, and to prove him, as we have said, a plagiarist.

Mr. Rand makes a strong point of the misuse of the word bulk, in THE NATION of February 28, because, as he shows, the larger part of the book is not taken from Hibbard. The book is to be considered as a whole, and when one finds the first page taken from Hibbard, and then in traversing the book page after page of illustrations, with accompanying text, throughout from the same author, the effect upon the mind is such that one is warranted in declaring the bulk of the book to be Hibbard's. We might, however, make a further defence of the use of the word. The printed sentence differs from that in the original MS., which said, "The bulk of the book is taken, some would say stolen, directly from the works of brother horticultural authors, and especially Shirley Hibbard," etc., and the change occurred by some inadvertence in copying the MS. for the press. But without using this as an argument, which, of course, could not be known to Mr. Rand, we still maintain that more than enough has been proved to sustain the charge of having presented a book to the public as his own production of which he was in no sense the author, and, if his own statements are to be taken, hardly the editor.

Mr. Rand complains that having been left unnoticed for five years, nothing but malice could have induced the criticism of February 28. We can heartily disclaim malice or personal feeling, as the writer of the notice of his book had never seen him when it was written.

Had Mr. Rand ceased writing books and magazines his error would have been left to slumber, but as the two first numbers of The American Journal of Horticulture are clouded by similar faults, it seemed a duty to the reading public to call their attention to the facts.

That Mr. Rand has frequently disclaimed the portions of "Parlor and Garden" not his own is to his credit, but his private disclaimers have never reached the public ear. His name is still on the title-page and in the copyright, and we who read have no way of knowing that he is ashamed of his production. Mr. Rand talks about things becoming "public property." What we complain of is that he has tried to convert public into private property, and then copyright it.

A man who edits or compiles a book often obtains more credit than the man who first wrote it. What we demand is that authors shall state by some obvious sign where they get their borrowed material, and that the task of supplying publishers with text for cuts, without knowing or caring where the cuts come from, be left to hacks, of whom there are plenty here, if not in Boston.—ED. THE TARIFF ON BOOKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Your correspondent, "A Publisher," in THE NATION of March 7, tells us that "25 cents per pound in gold will average less than 20 per cent. upon the net wholesale price in London." Let us see. I will take the books known as Bohn's Libraries as a fair standard, because—1. They were all published since 1850, and therefore come within the class of new books upon which "A Publisher" wants Congress to levy a heavy additional duty. 2. They are very largely imported, being continually wanted by gentlemen collecting libraries, as well as by the poorer class of students; and 3. Being within everybody's reach, the facts can be easily verified or disproved by any reader. The volumes embraced in Bohn's Standard Library, then, weigh from 15 to 20 ounces each. Putting the average weight at 18 ounces, the duty on each volume, at 25 cents per lb., is a little over 28 cents in gold. Let us now see what it is at the present duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem. The books are published at 3s. 6d. per vol. in London, and they are bought (even by private buyers) at 2s. 6d. sterling. This, at 25 cents to the shilling, makes them cost 63 cents each, as invoiced for duty, the tariff on which, at 25 per cent., is precisely 16 cents, or a fraction under. From 28 take 16, and the difference represents the amount of "protection" which "A Publisher" modestly asks, that he may reprint Bohn's libraries! We already pay a tax of 35 per cent. (currency) on every book from abroad to support the Government and protect him; and yet we are asked to add nearly 30 per cent. more (28 cents gold on Bohn's 63 cent volumes equals 45 per cent. duty ad valorem, equals 65 per cent. in currency nearly) in order that one book in ten may be issued in an American edition.

Take another example. I have lately imported a copy of the works of King Frederic II. of Prussia, in 13 volumes 8vo, the cost of which in London was 18s. sterling. Under the existing tariff the duty cost me just $1 in gold. Being an old work, the proposed new imposition (I mean what I say) of 10 cents per pound, so much lauded by "A Publisher" as "scarcely more than nominal," and "designed to encourage the formation of libraries and stimulate higher culture," will apply. I weigh the book, and find 21 lbs. of "dirty linen," as Voltaire called the works of his royal patron. This, at 10 cents per pound, is precisely $2 10, or a little more than 100 per cent. increase on the present duty. "Scarcely more than nominal," you see!

That I am not citing extreme instances, I appeal to the experience of every man who has imported second-hand books for his own use, to prove. Take up Willis & Sotheran's catalogues, or those of any London dealer in old books, and you will find multitudes of English and foreign books, such as are continually ordered for libraries, quoted at an average price of 3s. per volume. Now, the average weight of these volumes is 30 ounces for the octavo size. This, at 25 cents per pound, is 47 cents per volume, gold duty, whereas the gold duty on a 3s. book, at 25 per cent. ad valorem, is but 19 cents. Here is a difference of much more than 100 per cent. on books printed since 1850. Even in the highly seductive shape of a 10 cents per pound duty on all books prior to that date, the increase of duty on cheap books, on the same basis of weight and cost as above, carries up the duty from 19 cents to 30 cents, or over fifty per cent.

Another objection. This dividing of books by an arbitrary date into two classes, and taxing one class twice and one-half as much as the other, is monstrously absurd, and would prove in practice intolerably vexatious. Either every foreign seller must divide off the contents of every box or package of books by their dates of publication, and make two separate invoices, or else the Custom House officials must open every book, and go through an intricate maze of calculations to arrive at the several duties to be charged on each invoice. What is to be done with books printed without any date at all? What with serial sets of books, like Grote's "History of Greece," the publication of which began in 1846 and finished in 1856? Was the book published before 1850, or since? a question involving, perhaps, several dollars of duty to the Government or the purchaser, yet liable to be decided arbitrarily and unjustly.

Again, the proposed new specific duty discriminates between books of which no editions are printed in this country and others which are reprinted. Who is to tell what is or is not reprinted? Must the Custom House discharge its old experienced entry-clerks and appraisers and engage a brand-new set of hands whose qualifications are that they know the trade-lists by heart? Add to this the intricate calculations above-named, and the almost certain probability that the law will be repealed or revolutionized before two years' operation, and it is apparent that it will cost Uncle Sam quite as much to enforce it as it will come to.

"A Publisher" asserts that the proposed law imposes "no prohibitory duty," and charges you with having "accepted without due examination the assertion of some interested party." I have given you facts, not assertions. Fifty or a hundred per cent. increase may or may not be a prohibitory duty, according to the means of those who have to pay the imposition. I am a private student, and import books for my own improvement when I can afford it. Probably that makes me "an interested party;" and "A Publisher," who looks down upon the vulgar herd of American scholars from the lofty standpoint of disinterested virtue, may not relish our mild protest against being additionally squeezed in order that our liberal and successful publishers may double their already handsome fortunes. VERITAS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

I am surprised to find the following in a communication to THE NATION of March 7:

> "On old books and foreign books the proposed duty of 10 cents per pound is scarcely more than nominal—hardly, indeed, sufficient to pay the cost of collection. It is, as you can not but see, an enormous diminution of the existing impost, and was especially designed to encourage the formation of libraries and to stimulate that higher culture on which so much of the future destinies of the Republic depends."

I have purchased a large number of old books during the past year, and my impression has been that the proposed duty of ten cents per pound on old books would increase their price. I have weighed some books, taken at random, with the following results. In order to find the amount of the present duty, I take your correspondent's data and deduct 25 per cent. from the retail price for the importer's profit. The remainder shows the whole cost price, including the duty. As the present duty is 25 per cent. ad valorem, one-fifth of the cost price will be the duty. This allows a liberal amount for the duty, as I have taken no account of freight, insurance, etc.:

		Duty in Currency at 25 p. ct. ad val.	Weight.	Duty in Gold at 10 cts. p. lb.
Rees's Cyclopædia. 45 vols. 4to. London. 1819	$55	$8 25	184 lbs.	$18 40
Aiken's Biography. 10 vols. 4to. London. 1803	10	1 50	38 "	3 80
Donelli de Jure Civili. 16 vols. 8vo. Nuremberg. 1826	5	75	16½ "	1 65
Gisborne's Sermons. 3 vols. 8vo. London. 1809	1 50	23	4 "	40
Dictionnairede Médicine et de Chirurgie Pratiques. 15 vols. 8vo. Paris. 1829	8	1 20	22 "	2 20
Q. Horatii Flacci Opera. 2 vols. 4to. London. 1792	5	75	13 "	1 30

Christian Guardian. 25 vols. 8vo. London. 1809-33	6	90	36½ "	3 65
Dictionnaire de L'Académie Française, 3 vols. 4to. Paris. 1822	5	75	14 "	1 40
		$18 83		$41 25

But in the above estimate the ad valorem duty is set down in currency. To find the true relation between the present duty and the duty at 10 cents per pound, we must reduce the currency to gold. $18 83 currency=$13 95 gold at $1 35, the present rate. So we have $13 95 in gold ad valorem against $41 25 gold specific, and yet "A Publisher" says:

> "No manufacturing interest, I suspect, has approached Congress with so moderate a claim for protection, or one in which the interests of the consumer were more carefully guarded."

I am aware that many old books are expensive, and in many cases the duty at 10 cents per pound would be less than the present duty; but I am also well aware that the proposed duty would be much higher, upon the whole, than the present one. If we must have a specific duty, let us have a fair and sensible one. Can any one read the provisions of the bill last proposed without at once concluding that the intention of the publishers was to make the importing of books as difficult and perplexing as possible?

It seems to me that readers and students have some rights that publishers and booksellers are bound to respect.

Respectfully, AVOIRDUPOIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of the 7th instant there is a statement contained in the communication signed "A Publisher" which has a strong odor of untruth. It is as follows:

> "Why we have been anxious to obtain a specific rate on books you can perhaps understand when I have it on good authority that in the negotiations between the various bookselling interests, resulting in the plan proposed, the importers offered to make no opposition to a duty of 75 per cent. ad valorem if we would abandon a specific rate, which, as I have shown above, only amounts to about 20 per cent. on the ordinary English wholesale prices."

As it reads, the public are informed that the importing interest offered to submit to a duty of 75 per cent. ad valorem rather than to a specific duty, which is equivalent to about 20 per cent. only. Of course the inference is that the importing interest is a swindling one, and prefers to take the chances of defrauding the Government out of 55 per cent. of the legal duty rather than submit to a specific duty. Now, we deny the above statement, and perhaps your correspondent will be kind enough to give his "good authority." Yours truly, IMPORTERS.

"THE SOCIAL EVIL AND ITS REMEDY."

To the Editor of The Nation:

The admirable article in your paper of Feb. 21, 1867, with the above title, calls for the thanks of every sensible man. It is a subject which has exercised the minds of many, and yet one which is difficult, for various obvious reasons, to speak or write plainly about.

If you will indulge me in a few remarks on the subject, I desire to treat it, as it has occurred to me it ought to be treated, with exceeding plainness of "Saxon" diction, taking as a text ("preachers" can hardly get along without one) these words of the article referred to (page 153): "Society, through legislation, . . . does not pretend to assail a sin. That duty devolves on the sociologists, the moralists, the preachers, and other guardians of the public ethics; and it is a duty from which they are in no manner or degree absolved."

This is very true; and yet all must acknowledge that the topic is one exceedingly difficult to handle in the pulpit. In ancient Sparta it was not deemed a crime or even a disgrace to steal; but if any one was caught in the theft, that was treated both as a crime and a disgrace. With us, to such a degree is an unhealthy prudery cultivated, it is considered very wrong and unpolished to speak of things plainly; while the commission of those things it is held improper to speak of in public is held (practically) to be the more venial fault. We may in the pulpit generalize about sins, those of lust included; but to go into detail, to show what leads to sin, to mark the sin plainly, to suggest remedies or preventives accurately, is hardly allowable. The women would be driven from church, the men would feel that their wives and sisters and daughters were insulted.

As, therefore, you have opened your columns to the discussion of this subject, I beg, in the only way left, to give a "preacher's" view of causes, remedies, preventives; the two last being admitted to be of but partial efficacy. Still, a partial abatement of the evil is better than no abatement.

It will be admitted by all that the great moving cause of prostitution is the lust of man, not of woman. To prevent the wrong thus done by man to woman, the lust of man must be controlled, or at any rate regulated. If it be possible to bring this about to any extent, the evil will be so far forth mitigated, if not eradicated.

Now, the question arises, how is this control or regulation to be effected? To answer this, the causes of lust and those things which foster and promote it when existing must be clearly seen to be reasonably dealt with.

Every healthy man has natural desires, which are as much a part of his constitution as are hunger and thirst. Confined within lawful bounds they are not reprehensible. Why is it that they so universally exceed those bounds? In the first place, because boys do not grow up with a healthy knowledge of their constitutional powers. Parents and teachers feel a natural delicacy in teaching the boys committed to their care anything at all connected with this matter. But this is wrong. If boys were properly instructed—if they were taught, as soon as able to learn, what solemn things human life and human virtue are, how dreadful is the wrong of this vice, how by natural laws it is visited by pains and penalties in the body, how degrading and unmanly a thing to gratify desire at the expense of innocence and weakness and misfortune is, how fearful is the guilt of helping even one woman down the pathway of shame and sorrow; if, in addition to such theoretical teaching, the plates of medical works were shown them in which the horrors of the disease are so truthfully and fearfully delineated—if such instruction were given solemnly and faithfully to boys, one great safeguard would be attained. It may be objected to this that it is enlightening them too early upon subjects which children are supposed to be better ignorant of; but let it be remembered that the knowledge always comes, and comes early. The only difference is that the knowledge given by parental instruction is healthy, and produces healthy results; the knowledge boys pick up here and there for themselves is always prurient and unhealthy, producing in the vast majority of cases the results which culminate in all the horrors of prostitution.

So much for the mental training of instruction. Parents and teachers should do more. Nothing so much stimulates lust as idleness, luxury, and sloth, working with a depraved imagination. Hence care should be taken that the bodies and minds of boys and young men should be constantly kept busy by exercise and work. Let manly sports be cultivated, let the mind be busied with study, let the child be sent to bed reasonably tired, and made to get up and bathe in cold water as soon as he wakes in the morning, and immediately have something in the nature of work or play to attend to. Let the diet be plain—as unstimulating as possible. Such care, added to the care of proper instruction, cannot fail to produce most beneficial results.

But bad books must be kept out of the way. Here is something for legislation to do. I fail to see why indecent pictures and the low-priced books of vice are dealt with by law, while such books as "Laus Veneris and Other Poems," having upon them the imprint of a respectable publishing house and gotten up with all the charms of fine binding and good type, are allowed to be scattered broadcast. The natural results of such elegant pruriency as the pages of that book exhibit are to send young men of excitable temperaments to houses of prostitution, in order to gratify passions which have been inflamed by their perusal. There is another provoking stimulant of man's lust which legislation cannot reach, which can only be touched by the common sense of moral women. Joseph had a means of escape by running away—into the street, I suppose. We cannot find even in the streets an asylum at any rate from evil thoughts, which are the prolific parents of evil actions. So long as modest women will countenance "tilters," and wear such short undergarments, so long will the street displays which they make be anything but a help to virtuous struggles on the part of men who wish to fear God and honor woman; so long will a willing pruriency be fostered and inflamed in those whose imagination is led to run riot by the revelations whose coy suddenness is so suggestive. That shameless women should thus display their persons is no wonder; it is a great wonder that so many moral, pure-minded, Christian women are so culpably careless. There is enough of this element among the sex so to control fashion as to help virtue and discourage vice. Suggestion is more prurient than open display. Many men would be disgusted with the latter who would simply be allured by the former.

The influence of pure-minded women is almost boundless. Let them exercise a little thought in this matter, let them be guided by common sense, let them give no occasion themselves, and let them, with that majesty which feminine virtue possesses, indignantly frown down, even by social ostracism, others who give occasion to men to be less pure-minded and pure-lived than they ought to be. A great responsibility rests upon married women, especially mothers. They know what their thoughtless daughters, in their innocence, do not know; and they should see to it that their daughters are modest in dress as well as in action.

It is not to be denied that early marriage is a great safeguard to both men and women. But how, especially in that "good society" which, from the ease and luxury abounding in it, produces stimulants to vice on the part of men, is it possible in our time for men to marry early? Extravagance and love of display, a desire on the part of both young men and young women starting in life to maintain the same state as their parents live in, the costliness of female attire in the present day, etc.—all operate as so many insuperable hindrances to early marriage; and, for the men at any rate, the natural results follow. They will gratify themselves illicitly, and society suffers proportionably; especially as, while a fallen woman is ostracized promptly, the fast men are rather popular than otherwise. If they were ostracized in like manner, as they ought to be, the evil would be greatly checked. One of the chief glories of Victoria's reign is that the English court has been rendered comparatively pure. This is due exclusively to her personal influence. All Christian women can exercise a like influence within a smaller sphere; and the cumulative influence of Christian women in society would produce grander because more general results.

Let them take the matter in hand, quietly but determinedly; and while the Christian charities of "midnight missions" might still be necessary, they would not be so universally so. Legislation would not be so loudly called upon to interfere; man would be purer and woman more uninjured.

But so long as even our Christian churches display the allurements of revealing fashion; so long as prurient literature is condemned only when it is presented in a cheap or repulsive form; so long as the intellectual and physical education of boys with regard to this most solemn matter is as culpably neglected as it is, so long will the only check, the only palliative, the only repression, be lodged in the strong arm of the law, which can, at best, only salve over a hideous sore, whose nastiness might have been greatly prevented by simply beginning at the right end and using

The Week.

THE Supplemental Reconstruction bill, after passing the Senate, with a provision that, to make the election valid, half the registered voters must vote at the election of the conventions, and that the majority of this half shall be sufficient to ratify the constitutions, passed the House with this clause altered so as to provide that a majority of all the registered voters shall be necessary to ratification. In this change the Senate on Monday refused to concur, and there will probably be a conference, the result of which will not be known before we go to press. There will be no difficulty in reaching a compromise on the point in dispute. The Southern States, as far as we can judge by the newspapers, are disposed to organize under the act, in order to prevent the conventions getting totally into the hands of the Unionists and negroes, but with the intention of bringing the constitutionality of the act of Congress before the Supreme Court. The strong resemblance of the Southern mind to that of the Bourbons has often been pointed out, so that we are not saying anything very novel when we say that most of the Southern articles which discuss what the South ought to do at present, remind one strongly of the late manifesto of "Henry V." of France. Why not appeal to the Supreme Court also touching the legality of the abolition of slavery or of the whole war from the beginning? We notice that the Michigan Legislature has lately passed a resolution calling on the Regents of the University to expel all students who have taken part in the rebellion. But when one sees the fog in which the Southern brain works, the crass ignorance of the leading Southern men of the feelings and opinions not of foreign nations only, but of the people of the Northern States, one feels that so far from driving away young Southerners from Northern universities, it would be sound policy to educate some hundreds of them here every year at the public expense. Mr. Sumner made an attempt to insert in the bill in the Senate a provision for popular education, which we are very sorry to say failed. On this we have commented elsewhere.

THERE have been few other attempts at legislation during the week. It seems to be admitted, on all hands, that the present session of Congress is held simply to put the Supplemental Reconstruction bill out of danger, and that as soon as it has been passed over the veto, there will be an adjournment till the fall. The Senate, it is true, shows some disposition to take up questions of general legislation, but the House holds firm. The most notable debate of the week has been on the proposition to vote $1,000,000 for the relief of Southern destitution. It passed the Senate, but seems to lag in the House, and may die there. Nobody seems very enthusiastic about it, for various but obvious reasons. Even Fernando Wood opposed it, out of regard for Southern pride. Its great champion was Mr. Bingham, who went on very well till he got near the close of his speech, when the Congressional Plutarch quite vanquished him, and he became classical. He said that "we might learn a lesson upon this subject" (the duty of charity) "by words that had come down to us three thousand years from Pagan antiquity, when famine swept over Thrace, and a father, in dying agony, . . cried out, 'Xanthus, good Xanthus, save my child from famine!'" A better example than the foregoing of the nonsense into which Congressmen are led by Plutarch and the Classical Dictionary could hardly be pointed out. A man's having, three thousand years ago, in Thrace, asked "good Xanthus" to "save his child from famine," conveys not more of a lesson to the Congress of the United States as to its duty about voting money for the relief of Southern destitution, than the speech which we hear every day from the little crossing-sweepers in this city, "Boss, give us a penny, will ye?"

THE election in New Hampshire is the first held in any Northern State since the Republican party committed itself to universal suffrage. The result is encouraging to the Radical wing of the party. It is not doubtful that disagreements between friends of Mr. Harriman, the Republican candidate, and friends of Mr. Stearns, who came very near being the Republican candidate, somewhat diminished the Republican vote, and slightly increased the Democratic. But Harriman's majority is as nearly as possible 3,100 in a total vote of about 67,000, which is a majority smaller by 1,556 than that of last year, when the Constitutional Amendment was the platform laid down by the Republicans, and when no "railroad issues" weakened the winning party. On the whole, New Hampshire makes the prospect of a Republican victory in Connecticut very favorable. We sincerely hope every Republican candidate but one may be successful. Mr. Barnum, we trust, will be left at home. A Republican from the Fourth District is not absolutely necessary; the majority in Congress is already almost too large; and there seems to be no reason why Mr. Barnum should not be left in attendance on the "Bearded Woman." It is a great misfortune that General Hawley should be saddled with him, but we, nevertheless, trust Mr. Barnum will be defeated. It is only by one or two such examples that nominating conventions can be taught decency. At present the sole consideration with many of the members is not how good a man they can get, but how bad a man the electors will stand, and as long as the voters go on electing everybody they present "for the sake of the party," our course will be downwards--and it is now downwards almost everywhere in this particular. We therefore cordially recommend every Connecticut voter to "scratch" Mr. P. T. Barnum's name, as a religious duty. Never mind "the party." It will survive it. Providence has not left any good cause dependent on the appearance in the National Legislature of a gentleman of his peculiar views of life.

MR. THADDEUS STEVENS has offered the confiscation bill of which we have been hearing so long; these are its main features: Pretty much all the property in the lately rebellious States is to be seized by the National Government. No property owner in that region can escape ruin, except him who never aided or abetted the rebellion, and him whom Mr. Johnson has pardoned. The act of July 17, 1862, which was a most comprehensive measure, is taken as the basis of the new legislation sought for. After the property has been seized, each adult male negro resident in the Southern States is to get forty acres of land, and to each of these homesteads the sum of fifty dollars is to be apportioned for the erection of buildings. The title to the homestead is to be vested in trustees at first, and at the end of ten years passes absolutely to the owner or his heirs. After the sum for the buildings above mentioned has been obtained and the farms have been distributed, the confiscated property is to be made to yield the further sum of $500,000,000, of which $300,000,000 goes to pay loyal Southerners for damage done by the rebel governments, both State and Confederate, and the interest of the remaining $200,000,000 to the pensions of our own pensioners. A bill in which provision is made for the violation of a greater number of the principles of good government and for the opening of a deeper sink of corruption has never been submitted to a legislative body, and we venture to add that had anybody proposed such a measure to the Sultan after the storming of Constantinople he would have been expelled from the "Medjlis" as a ruthless and troublesome visionary. There is, of course, no probability that Congress will pass it; but the mere prospect that it will be discussed in the House afflicts us, and must afflict everybody who cares for the credit of the country.

We think it is safe to say that in all that concerns Reconstruction, affairs have never yet looked so bright as at this moment. There appears—if we are to judge from the selection of generals to command the military districts at the South, under the new law, and from the course already adopted by General Schofield, the only doubtful one of them all—to be no disposition on the President's part to frustrate or evade the execution of the Congressional scheme of Reconstruction, and there are abundant indications that the new act, and the restoration of military protection under it, are facilitating the formation of a real Union party in every State in the South, of which the negroes will form a strong and valuable portion, as there seems no reason to doubt that they do know their friends, and are as capable of party discipline as any other set of men. We may, therefore, fairly expect to see several of the States pass into new hands under the new constitutions. In fact, there is only one black spot in the political sky, and that is the increasing disposition of Congress to use the present enormous revenue for the perpetration of jobs on a great scale, in the shape of bounties, land grants, pensions, and what not. This tendency, if not promptly repressed by the people, will, before very long, launch us on a sea of trouble, compared with which that on which we have been tossing is only a duck-pond. Combinations are already being formed in all parts of the country for a share of the plunder, and we therefore warn all whom it may concern against all schemes for the grant either of lands, or goods, or money, to men of any race, hue, or creed, as merely—we care not how high the character of the proposers may be—swindles in disguise, of which hordes of knaves stand ready somewhere to reap the fruits. The principle of this Government is "a fair field and no favor" for everybody, black and white, male and female—no restrictions, but no loans or gifts.

The New York Custom House scandal has resolved itself very much into a question of veracity. The "general order" business seems to be a bit of corruption which Collector Smythe found in full operation when he took office, and by which either the Government or the merchants are swindled to the tune of $40,000 or $50,000 a year; and Mr. Smythe's fault seems to be that he accepted usage as a proof of harmlessness, and went into the business himself with as much gusto as if a man's moral sense was of no use to him when he took a Government office. Between him and the Congressional Committee there is a conflict of testimony, but even on Mr. Smythe's own showing the management of the Custom-House is a disgrace to the nation.

Judge Bond has the honor of having had a bill aimed at him individually by the Maryland Legislature. The Judge of the Criminal Court of the City of Baltimore is forbidden to issue writs or in any way exercise jurisdiction in cases growing out of the relation of master and apprentice. All such are to be left to the Orphans' Courts. Comment on the animus or the method of the Legislature in this enactment is not necessary. But as a fact not wholly disconnected, we may mention that when Senator Johnson presented the credentials of Mr. Thomas, senator elect from Maryland, he encountered opposition which is not likely to be allayed by the passage of bills like the one we speak of.

"An Artist" writes an extraordinary letter to The Evening Post in defence of the proposed tariff on pictures, showing by a table that the duty of 100 per cent. would gradually diminish in weight, till on a picture worth $1,000 it would only be ten per cent., and then asks the editor, with an air of triumph, whether "he thinks this a prohibition on the importation of fine works of art, such as cultivated people desire to have brought here?" The Post asks, with great propriety, What are fine works of art? Who is to decide? Why should the Government decide? Whom can the Government get to decide? A duty on pictures diminishing in the inverse ratio of their goodness involves a censorship of pictures—the decision by one man of what kind of pictures another man of limited means ought to buy or have in his house. This plan of improving the public taste, as we have often said before, if worth anything, is applicable to books, and any native author has a right to ask the Government to value foreign books at the Custom-House, not by the cost of their material, but by their probable effect on the mind of the purchaser, and tax them accordingly. If artists will insist on lobbying for protection, or, in other words, turning politicians and treating their works as so much "native manufacture," the public will be driven, as a last resource, into insisting on their knowing a little of logic and political economy.

The Rev. J. S. C. Abbott, of New Haven, has gone to Paris to collect materials for one of his "histories," and has just sent to The New Haven Journal & Courier an amusing account of an interview with the Emperor, which the malicious editor has published. Mr. Abbott reproduces an epitome of the Emperor's own biography from his birth to the present year, which he repeated to his Majesty's face. He was also pleased to approve of the Emperor's entire policy, domestic and foreign, during the last fifteen years, including the Mexican expedition, and to draw for the imperial satisfaction a horrible picture of the fate that awaits Mexico now that the French troops are withdrawn. Mr. Abbott had his reward for all his labors in the service of the Napoleon family on the following evening, when, at a ball, before four thousand people, "the Emperor shook hands with him," and did not shake hands with anybody else. In fact, as Mr. Abbott says, "it may not be improper to state he was honored with particular attention." He also adds that "it is with a continually hesitating pen he records these scenes," and says he is aware he "exposes himself to imputations which will be painful to him." We sincerely trust he will continue to "record" them all, and that his friend in New Haven will be base enough to publish them. The feelings of a great writer at the court of his hero are things which the human race will be the better of seeing described as often as possible.

The Evening Post of the 18th inst. has an interesting letter from a North Carolinian, who gives an account of the action already taken with a view to reconstruction under the military bill by the Union men of his State. The North Carolina Union party, he says, has been brought into life suddenly by an act of Congress. The position which it occupies is indicated clearly enough by the words of one of its members, that he would "stand by this Congress though it slew him," and by its formal admission into its fold of the negro voters. This was done at a meeting for consultation called by the thirty Union members of the Legislature, and attended by their representatives and by the colored people of Raleigh. It had been decided to forestall the rebel population by summoning a State convention at once; but the Supplemental Reconstruction act has made this impossible. The only danger, the letter-writer says, which threatens the Southern Union men from this Supplemental bill, is the provision allowing "the commanding generals to delegate the power and duty of reconstruction to the present governors of the rebel States," and this he regards as a serious danger, for each general "will be overwhelmed with attentions and flattery till he yields, and then—well, then down goes the Congressional policy into the same pit into which Andrew Johnson's so suddenly disappeared." We agree with the North Carolinian in his opinion, which would be confirmed by the testimony of nearly every officer who has held command in the South, that when a point is to be gained by truckling and mean flattery, no Americans are equal to "the chivalrous gentlemen of the South." But the danger he apprehends is pretty well guarded against in the bill as it now stands, and a great security against it is in the character of the generals appointed to the districts. The Republican party, then, exists in North Carolina. The other party has itself only to thank if the course of the new party in North Carolina is like that of the Republicans in Tennessee and Missouri—and we see some reason to apprehend it.

The only news of importance from England is the telegraphic summary of the leading provisions of the new Reform bill, which the Derby Ministry are bringing in, after having got rid of three recalcitrant members of the Cabinet, who did not want any bill at all. The bill is to bestow the suffrage on all householders rated for the poor-rate, after two years' residence; on all men paying $5 yearly taxes, or having $150 in the savings-bank, or $250 in the public funds; and to all members of the learned professions and graduates of the universities. It is estimated that this will add about 500,000 to the electoral body, and will bring in a very large body of artisans; but whether it is sufficient to satisfy Mr. Bright, remains to be seen. Governor Eyre remains in the country, so as to have the benefit of a grand jury of country gentlemen, who are pretty sure to throw out any bill against him, and has resisted the invitations of the Jamaica Committee to present himself in London, where he would have to encounter a different kind of magistrates and jury. The Eyre affair has divided English society very much as the American war divided it, and has roused, on both sides, much the same feeling; and a good deal of intensity has been infused into the quarrel by the contingency, which everybody sees dimly foreshadowed, though no one likes to speak of it, of a collision between the Government and the people, arising out of the existing political agitation, both in England and Ireland, in which Government officials might find themselves saddled with the responsibility which Governor Eyre finds so heavy. "Good society" has, in fact, thrown itself on Eyre's side with such vehemence that it is with difficulty that the Jamaica Committee can even keep their own counsel up to their work.

The last mail shows the number of "battles" which have taken place in the late Fenian "rising" in Ireland to have been six. There was another Fenian "battle" in this city on St. Patrick's Day, at the corner of Grand Street and East Broadway, of much the same character and proportions as those in Ireland—which makes seven in all. The casualties, as well as we have been able to count them, foot up three men killed and some thirty wounded, of whom twenty were wounded in the fight in this city, making an average of three-sevenths of a man killed and five men wounded in each "battle." The engagements seem to have been amongst the shortest in military history, and to have consisted generally of two volleys of musketry, one from each side, after which the Fenians invariably changed their base. The New York Tribune has summed up the results of the campaign with great lucidity, and shows in an article which evidently emanates from a military pen, that the struggle will probably terminate unfavorably for the Fenians, and advises the Brotherhood to betake itself to peaceful agitation in conjunction with Bright and Gladstone and the English Liberals—advice which, valuable as it is now, would have been twice as valuable some months or even some weeks ago. But we fear The Tribune has itself neutralized this advice by the glowing account it gave last week of the strategic advantages of Tipperary County—that remarkable county in which "neither artillery nor cavalry can act," and in which the ground is so "favorable for ambuscades." The danger now is that the Fenians may be tempted into concentrating in this district, and keeping up the fight for ages and ages.

THE FREEDMEN.

In condensing Superintendent Tomlinson's school report for January, we either copied or originated an erroneous statement concerning the school at Belton, S. C. Lieut. William Stone, agent of the Bureau at Aiken, writes us that the school in question is not sustained by the colored people. During the latter half of 1866 the teacher, Mr. P. L. Walker, was paid by citizens of Salem, Mass., and since January 1, 1867, by the Salem Freedmen's Aid Society. The correction is due to the contributing parties, and the freedmen have other laurels of which they cannot be deprived.

—The late Rev. Charles Avey, of Pittsburgh, left $150,000 in trust, to be devoted, according to the best judgment of the executors, to the "education and elevation of the colored people in the United States and Canadas." Of this amount $25,000 have been paid to Oberlin College, which is to furnish free tuition to fifty of its most needy colored students who may apply for it.

—The February statistics of colored schools in the District of Columbia show that there are, of day and night together, 90, having 129 white and 13 colored teachers, and 4,822 scholars. In Alexandria City and County and Fairfax County, Va.—schools, 26; white teachers, 29; colored, 6; scholars, 1,756. In the District there are also, not regularly reported, 7 schools and 460 scholars.

—A shipload of colored emigrants that left Charleston for Liberia, last autumn, has been heard from. Three died on the passage, but the rest fared well, and have entered upon the land allotted by Government to immigrants, viz., three acres to every single adult, and twenty-five acres to every family.

—Flake's Bulletin, of Feb. 27, publishes two statements, filed at the local bureau, Galveston, Texas, which indicate, as the editor truly remarks, "a condition of things in the interior perfectly appalling." Leon County is the scene of the enormities reported—upon whites and blacks. Although the people exhibit a proper abhorrence of the acts which are committed among them, the U. S. Commissioner, Mr. J. H. Potts, testifies: "I believe the arm of the civil law to be too short to apprehend and bring those persons to justice, owing to the great prejudice that exists towards the freedmen and Union men of this section. The same paper publishes a petition from fifteen citizens of Grayson County, setting forth a long list of outrages and murders committed in their neighborhood and the adjoining counties since the removal of the U. S. troops. This catalogue embraces both black and white victims, and they earnestly entreat Gen. Griffin to send them troops again, inasmuch as the civil authorities have taken no cognizance of the disorders described. They fully endorse the official conduct of Captain Evans, a sub-agent of the Bureau. Gen. Griffin has complied with the petition, and ordered the military to co-operate with the Bureau in arresting the lawless ruffians of Grayson County.

—"Dixon," the Washington correspondent of the Boston Advertiser, thus does honor to one of the most efficient legislators in the national Congress:

> "It is but the just meed of praise to Mr. [Senator] Wilson to call attention to the four most important measures affecting colored people that he introduced and carried through Congress at the last session. These are: first, the bill to prevent the flogging of freedmen as a punishment for crime; second, the proposition to disband the militia of the rebel States; third, the proposition to strike the word 'white' out of all United States militia laws; and, fourth, the bill to abolish peonage in the United States. He also introduced and carried through the proposition declaring that workmen in the navy-yards shall not be assessed for political purposes, or dismissed for political reasons."

The first two measures have been embodied in the Military Reconstruction Act.

—Gen. Howard estimates the number of rations that must be issued to destitute whites and blacks at the South for the next five months to be 8,535,000, costing $2,133,750, or $1,508,750 more than has yet been appropriated for that purpose. The recent floods in the border country of Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia, and also in Mississippi, have widely increased the suffering and destitution already existing. The appeals of the Southern Relief Commission are therefore more weighty than at any previous time. The $20,000 which we announced last week had been collected in this city, has now, we are informed, been raised to $76,000 and upwards, and the Commission has already purchased 64,000 bushels of corn.

In the general neglect of a careful study of the English language and literature by our schools and colleges, Anglo-Saxon has, of course, found few to study it. Occasionally some enthusiastic young man has, with the help of Vernon's "Guide" or Rask's "Grammar," mastered the elements of the language. Hardly one, however, even of our best and finest scholars, is thoroughly conversant with its literature, scanty as it is. Even in England it has been greatly neglected. It remained for a German scholar, Grein, to edit the best collection of Anglo-Saxon poetry, with a complete translation. No doubt one cause why Anglo-Saxon has been less studied here is the deficiency of any good and convenient text-book. There is no grammar that is thoroughly accurate, brief, and comprehensive, and Bosworth's dictionary has many errors. Prof. Samuel M. Shute, of Columbian College, Washington, proposes to remedy this want, so far as he is able, by publishing a text-book of Anglo-Saxon. It will contain, in one volume of convenient size, a grammar, selections for reading, and a glossary, and is calculated to meet the wants of students of the oldest and original English. The book will soon be published by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, of New York. The valuable "Thesaurus of Archaic English," by Prof. Corson, so long advertised by the same firm, is still unpublished. The chief cause of the long delay is the lack of subscribers. Still one hundred are needed to complete the list. Are there not two hundred and fifty people in the United States who read Chaucer and other early English writers and need a glossary for them? There are more high schools and colleges than this in whose libraries there should be at least one copy.

—Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, who reprint London Society, have the pleasure of seeing Every Saturday come out each week and of knowing that the public in general are getting in the cheaper form all the articles which would make it worth any one's while to reprint the English magazine for the American market. Neither Ticknor & Fields nor Hurd & Houghton are to blame for this disagreeable state of things. Mr. John Hogg, the proprietor of London Society, long ago made an arrangement with the Boston firm, under which their advanced sheets of the magazine are sent to Boston nearly a month before the day of publication in London. Afterwards he sold to Hurd & Houghton the privilege of republishing London Society in New York. It is to be regretted that Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are losing money, if they are losing money, by the fault of another, but we do not know that the public would suffer a great loss if London Society were not reprinted. We have had to look at several numbers, and are free to say that we did not find much in any of them. A million such pictures of well-dressed young women and well-dressed young gentlemen, and millions of pages of such letterpress as accompanies them, might be, and, for anything we know to the contrary, are, put forth yearly in England. "The American Bureau for Literary Reference" does not wholly confine itself to cis-atlantic labors, we see. Why could not Hurd & Houghton make an arrangement with that establishment for a steady supply of such matter as appears in London Society and Belgravia, and escape these heartburnings and jealousies?

—The Agathynian Club announce that the second volume of their publications will be issued on the 15th of April, and will be a reprint of the rare old English translation of the "Proverbs" of Erasmus, by Richard Taverner, first printed in 1550. It will be edited by Mr. George P. Philes, who has for many years made a special study of Erasmus, and who will write for this edition a biographical and critical notice of the author and his works, and a biographical account of the various editions of the present book. The work will be reprinted in black-letter, and will be as perfect a copy of the original as can be made with type cast at the present day. It will contain about two hundred medium octavo pages, and will be sold for five dollars. One hundred copies only will be for sale to subscribers.

—President Van Buren, when he died, left behind him autobiographical memoirs upon which he had been laboring while living in retirement at Lindenwald. They are voluminous, but incomplete, bringing his history down no further than the period just before his election to the Presidency, and they had not had the author's revision. But a long episodical portion of them, an elaborate review of the origin and course of political parties in the United States, was fully completed; and while the rest of the memoirs has been put into the hands of Charles H. Hunt, Esq., who is at work on a biography of the ex-President, this episode is to be published separately, and will very soon be issued by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. We expect an interesting work—the work of a man who, by birth and education, was not only a politician, but a New York politician, a "Democrat" trained in that school of political intrigue which this State boasted in the old times, who made use through all his life, and in the highest positions, of what he learnt at Albany, and who now tells us something, at any rate, of his teachers and fellow-students.

—The "Catalogue of the Hebrew Books in the Library of the British Museum" has recently been published, and The Spectator gleans from it some interesting information. In 1759 there was but one Hebrew volume in the library; there are now more than ten thousand volumes, which form the largest existing collection of Hebrew books. Indications of the sad history of the race, the dispersion and persecution of its members, are found in the names of the places where many of these volumes were published. There are volumes printed in Shanghai and volumes printed in Cincinnati; and the Jewish press frequently found its sole security in obscurity, and had to retire to barbarous villages whose names are hardly known to the maps. Many of the books are written in Spanish or Arabic or German, or some other Gentile tongue, but in all the Hebrew character is used. The Jew might speak the language of his master, but he would use his own alphabet. Often, too, he was forbidden, as in Morocco, to use the sacred alphabet of the Koran. Most of the ten thousand volumes are devoted to the Bible, the traditions of the fathers, law, which in Hebrew literature is never dissociated from biblical theology, and to works of instruction in Hebrew grammar. But there are 500 volumes which relate to science, history, natural history, and geography; and 750 which relate to poetry and criticism.

—A work which we hope to see soon reprinted in this country is the volume entitled "Modern Culture: its True Aims and Requirements," which is the joint work of Tyndall, Daubeny, Henfrey, Huxley, Whewell, Faraday, Herbert Spencer, Dr. J. Paget, and Dr. E. L. Youmans. The last-mentioned gentleman edits the compilation, and contributes an essay on "The Scientific Study of Human Nature." The other essays are on "The Study of Physics," "of Chemistry," "of Botany," "of Geology," "of Physiology;" Dr. Whewell's on "The Educational History of Science," Dr. Faraday's on "The Education of the Judgment," and Mr. Spencer's on "Political Education." The very indefinite word "culture" will hardly, we suppose, get full definition in this book; no doubt the essayists are in a measure advocates, and their treatises probably have not the judicial tone. But scientific studies it has been so much the fashion in England to disregard or despise, that men of science do good service to the cause of culture when they magnify their favorite pursuits or strongly insist on a just valuation of them.

—In a late number of The Athenæum, M. Philarète Chasles, a well-known French critic, publishes a new explanation of the enigmatical dedication of Shakespeare's sonnets. He has abandoned his former idea that W. H. stands for William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, and now concludes that by those letters is designated William Hathaway, the poet's brother-in-law, the dedicator and not the dedicatee. Hathaway, he conjectures, obtained from Shakespeare these sonnets, for whose preservation little pains had been taken, and published them for his own benefit, dedicating them in an obscure way to the Earl of Southampton, who, as Shakespeare's patron, was their "only begetter." The T. T. is of course Thomas Thorpe, the publisher, who, having adventured his money on the publication, claims his share in the dedication. Many examples of similar enigmatical dedications are given in Mr. Gerald Massey's recent book. M. Chasles would read the dedication as follows, making W. H. the subject of wisheth: "To the onlie begetter of these insuing sonnets, Mr. W. H. all happinesse and that eternitie promised by our ever-living poet wisheth. The well-wishing adventurer in setting forth, T. T." M. Chasles promises soon to publish a book containing the fruits of his ten years' study on the sonnets. But the Rev. Samuel Neil, an English Shakespearean, roundly asserts that it is the fruit of his study which the French critic promises to publish. Mr. Neil declares that in 1861 he published a volume which contains all the facts and arguments which M. Chasles now parades as his own; and, moreover, that out of friendship and respect he sent the book to M. Chasles. M. Chasles will perhaps have something to say by way of answer to this, but it is difficult to see what.

—France is just now affording an example that it does not follow, because a ruler enrolls himself among the authors and writes history, that his subjects will be protected in the liberty of the press. The recent violation of the sanctity of the post-office, in search of the printed circular of the Count de Chambord, proves that an emperor who intrudes into the republic of letters is not more fit for that region than a bull for a china-shop. It augured ill for the good intentions of Napoleon and for the permanence of his latest "reforms" that the first interrogation of his semi-responsible ministers in the Corps Législatif should have related to tampering with the mails. But even he must have smiled (as he winced) at the sarcasm of Mr. Deputy Pelletan, who styled this opening of sealed letters a Cæsarean operation.

—The German translation of Max Müller's "Science of Language" has, in spite of its shabbiness, been accorded a second impression. In addition to the text are given an essay on the state of English and German philology and many references not in the English edition.

—In the list of the Berlin book auction for the 12th of March is a very valuable collection of periodicals and works of travel; among the latter several of the earlier are on America. Of the costlier works are the "Petrefacta Germaniæ," by Goldfuss; Humboldt's first essay concerning basalts on the Rhine, with an autographical dedication; Thurneyser's "Mineralische Wasser" (Mineral Waters), with autographical dedication; Lepsius' "Denkmäler aus Ægypten" (Memorials of Egypt), in 12 vols. folio, bound in morocco, the royal presentation copy. There are also autographical letters of Abel, the mathematician, and of Euler, of Linn, etc.

—Some of the works in Lappenberg's library brought prices hitherto unexampled in Germany, e. g.: Pertz, "Monumenta Germaniæ," 19 vols., $210 54; "Publications of the Literary Society in Stuttgart, 1–75, $51 81; Dugdale's "Monasticon Anglicanum," 6 vols., $98 01; Percy Society's publications, 30 vols., $91 48; Lappenberg, "Hamburg Urkundebuch," $15 73; Montfaucon, "Les Monuments de la Monarchie Française," 6 vols., $51 81; "Cronica Slavica' (1490), $71 32, etc. Thalers we reduce to dollars and cents (specie).

—A "Review of the Publications of the German Book Trade" in the year 1866, from the firm of Heinrich, in Leipzig, shows that the war of last summer had some effect on most branches of literature. The whole number of books published in 1866 was 8,699, against 9,661 in 1865. Of light literature, 935 works appeared in 1865 and 704 in 1866; of memoirs and historical works, 651 in 1865 and 534 in 1866; on theology, so prolific of writing and strife, 1,411 works were published in 1865, and in 1866 1,250. Under the title "Maps," 139 is given for 1865 and 203 for 1866; and under "Science of War," 148 is given for 1865 and 171 for 1866. The number of school-books is only 36 less in 1866, and even more books were published concerning the old classical and Oriental languages in the latter than in the former year.

—American matters are forming the subject of numerous German pamphlets and magazine articles. Two papers in the last number of the Internationale Revue, on the "American School System" and "North American Legal Culture," are pretty good samples of their general tenor. The writers lay down the dogma that success is due to something, bring forward as reasons for American thrift many things which a citizen of the United States would scarcely think so important, and almost ignore the educating influence of American institutions. Herr Sturz, for many years representative of the Brazilian Government at the court of Berlin, is preparing to publish the impressions made by an extended trip through the United States last summer. He will advocate the "protective system" very strongly.

—One of those pleasant exhibitions of the reverential side of German "Gemüthlichkeit" was the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Professor von Ranke's "Doktorat," February 20 In the morning a deputation from the Friedrich-Wilhelm Gymnasium presented him a Latin address, by Prof. Zumpt, and, led by Director Wuerst, sang the choral "Nun danket Alle Gott." Later, his scholars and friends assembled to present their congratulations, which were offered by Professor Köpke, in the name of his numerous scholars; by Rector von Langenbeck, in the name of the University; and by Doctor Pertz, chief royal librarian, in the name of the "Historische Kommission" in Munich, of which Professor Ranke is president. Deputations were also present from Stuttgart, Halle, Göttingen, Jena, and Erlangen. The presence of so many former and now honored pupils and friends, the flattering mention of his services and his laurels and kindly wishes for his welfare, would have affected a less impressible man than the esteemed professor, who replied with deep emotion. Over a hundred of his admirers also gave him the compliment of a public dinner in the afternoon. The Kultus-Minister, von Mühler, by order of the King, invested him with the insignia of the second class of the "Order of the Red Eagle," with the star, and the King of Bavaria sent him the cross of a Grand Master of the "Order of St. Michael." Duncker and Humblot, of Leipzig, announced as their contribution to his honor an elegant octavo edition of his complete works, revised by the author himself, and containing, besides many alterations in the text, several hitherto unpublished articles. Most of von Ranke's historical researches have their field in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and a great charm of his works is the completeness with which he made the contents of unprinted manuscripts, documents, ambassadors' reports, etc., of this period, his own. Though not so well known in America as his "History of the Popes, their Church and their State," his "History of England," in seven volumes, surprises every English reader by the accuracy of its statements and the clearness of its pictures. His "Fürsten und Völker von Süd-Europa im XVI. und XVII. Jahrhundert" (Princes and Peoples of Southern Europe in the XVIth and XVIIth Centuries), which called Ranke (now von Ranke) from a professorship in the Gymnasium in Frankfort-on-the-Oder, has been entirely rewritten, and is perhaps the best example of his style, as it is the result of his maturest and most careful scholarship.

—There was lately discovered in a corner of the Clam-Gallas library a quantity of letters forming part of the original correspondence of Count Matthias Gallas, during the Thirty Years' War. Among them were three hundred and twenty-one dated documents, from the years 1633 to 1636, with a number of others belonging to the same period, but without dates. The most important are those of 1634, which refer directly to Wallenstein. Between the 20th of January and the 1st of April, 1634, there are sixty-three letters from imperial generals, Medici, Suys, Piccolomini, Manadas, Colloredo, and others, to Gallas; and a letter from Gallas to the Emperor, dated Frauenberg, Feb. 24. This discovery can hardly fail to clear up some disputed points with regard to Wallenstein's conspiracy.

A PAMPHLET has been published in Albany giving in full the principal papers which were presented at the third annual convocation of college officers and academy teachers of the State of New York. The proceedings of the assembly are also reported in full.

The most noteworthy paper of the collection, as it appears to us, is that of Dr. T. A. P. Barnard, President of Columbia College, on the terms which should be prescribed for admission to the colleges of the State. He advocates the study of some modern language prior to entering college, and also the cultivation of the observing faculties by some scientific pursuit. The paper is a very sensible one, and deserves to be widely read. His former essay on the "Improvements practicable in American Colleges" is well remembered yet in educational circles.

Besides this article we commend to attention a vigorous protest from Principal Jones, of Franklin Academy, Delaware County, against requiring academies to teach so many branches. He would banish Greek from their curriculum. Prof. Monroe advocates the teaching of Latin as if it were a living and not a dead language; and Prof. Tayler Lewis insists, with his usual vigor, upon making the Bible a prominent study in a liberal education.

—The Senate of the United States, on the last day of February, passed the bill, which has been for many months on the table, establishing a National Bureau of Education. Its features are very simple: it provides for the appointment of a commissioner and three assistants, whose duty it shall be to collect and diffuse information on the subject of education, and to report annually to Congress such statements and recommendations as may be of value to the country, beginning with a history of the various land grants made by Congress for the promotion of education. The bill was elaborated, as we understand, by a select committee of the House, including Garfield, of Ohio; Boutwell, of Massachusetts; Patterson, of New Hampshire; and other gentlemen whose names in their several States are identified with the progress of public instruction. It has been strongly supported by many of the State superintendents of schools. Mr. Garfield made the principal speech in favor of the project, which soon afterwards (June 19, 1866) received the approval of the House by a vote of 80 yeas to 44 nays. The President has given the bill his signature, and has nominated Henry Barnard as the first United States Commissioner of Education. We have reason to rejoice that the President has conferred this appointment upon a man of unquestioned ability, long experience in educational affairs, and wide reputation both at home and abroad. Probably nobody in the country is so well acquainted as Mr. Barnard with the advantages and the defects, the history, laws, and condition of the school systems of the several States. His life has been devoted to their study, and he has had unusual opportunities for acquiring correct information and opinions. His judgment, we believe, in all such questions, is highly valued. The only question we have heard respecting his fitness for the newly constituted office has arisen from the doubt whether his habits of intellectual labor are such as will enable him to endure the drudgery of a "bureau," and patiently to reduce the complex data which will come under his eye into such order and harmony as are essential to a thorough exhibition of our educational progress. If he can perform this service, which is one of the fundamental duties of the office, we have no doubt that the country will derive great benefit from his experience and influence. His work in life has thus far been varied in form, but single in its aim—the improvement of every means of public education, the common school, the reformatory, the high school, the normal school, the college, and the public library. Connecticut and Rhode Island, which had the benefit of his early enthusiasm and vigor, will never cease to feel the good effects of his labors. His more recent services in Wisconsin were less successful. From Maryland, where he has lately been engaged, we have heard very flattering reports. His Journal of Education, with much that is unimportant, contains a vast amount of valuable discussion. His library is probably the most complete in the country in educational documents. Under all these circumstances, we look hopefully for the best results from the new bureau and its first director.

—Mr. Peabody's latest public act of generosity, by which a million dollars, and possibly over a million more, are placed in the hands of a board of trustees for the promotion of popular instruction in the Southern States, has attracted the attention of the nation, and has given rise to much discussion respecting the true educational necessities of the South. By the terms of the gift the trustees are left quite free in respect to the adoption of specific measures for the accomplishment of the main object. Their responsibility is consequently of the gravest character. The future quite as much as the present will be affected by the wisdom of their conclusions. A rare opportunity is now afforded to point out the good points and the errors of the American systems of public education as established in the Northern and Western States. No one pretends that our systems are perfect; yet almost every new State, in organizing its public schools, copies the faults as well as the virtues of the schools in the older States. Errors which the wisest educators in New England and New York would gladly eradicate are thus reproduced in young and vigorous forms at the West. We would spare the South such prolific sources of trouble. With the corn we plant there should be no thistles. A series of careful investigations and of impartial, judicial, discriminating reports respecting plans of organization, courses of study, and methods of instruction, published under the auspices of so enlightened a body as the Peabody Educational Trustees, would command universal attention, would save the South many hundreds of thousands of dollars, would awaken the North, and would advance the education of the people in Europe as well as in this land. Will not the Peabody Trustees, at the outset of their labors, bestow this boon upon the country?

—The metrical system of weights and measures is becoming popular by the instrumentality of the public schools, and we may safely anticipate that a short time hence no opposition to its general introduction will be made on the ground of its difficult and unintelligible nomenclature. Children learn the system just as readily as the tables of avoirdupois and duodecimals. Here are some of the signs of progress, showing that the action of Congress in authorizing the use of the system was not in advance of the popular sentiment:

A few months ago a circular, signed by a large number of scientific and literary gentlemen, was addressed to the publishers of the school arithmetics in common use, requesting that the necessary explanations of the metric system should be introduced into their books, with such problems as would show the applications of the system in simple calculations. Several of the publishers have complied with this request. Greenleaf's, Ray's, Stoddard's, and Eaton's Arithmetical Series now include brief statements of this system. There are probably others unknown to us which have also introduced this feature.

2. Several brief explanations of the system, independent of text-books, have been skilfully prepared and published—the earliest, we believe, by Professor H. A. Newton, author of the above-mentioned circular; and the latest by Prof. Chas. Davies.

3. The Legislature of Connecticut (and possibly those of other States) has by a formal vote recommended that the system be taught in the common schools.

4. The most recent action on the subject which has come to our knowledge is a resolution of the National Academy of Sciences, at their recent meeting in Washington, instructing the secretary to request the instructors of colleges throughout the land to make an acquaintance with this system one of the requisites for admission.

MEMOIRS OF MADAME RÉCAMIER.[*]

If any writer shall ever take it in hand to write a history of fascination, the substance of these memoirs will make a very striking chapter in his book. Madame Récamier was born in 1777 and died in 1849, and for a period of sixty years she held in thrall not merely the affection but the respect and reverence of many men and women, some of whom were the most gifted and distinguished of her time. The story of this process is one that might be quickly told. The greater part of these memoirs is incidental, and though very interesting as a retrospect of French society and for the glimpses it affords us into the inner life of men who in their day played no mean part in social and political affairs, it adds but little to our knowledge of Madame Récamier's character. Quite as distinct an idea of this could no doubt be gained from an article by the translator in The Atlantic Monthly for October, 1864. A part of this article has been wrought into the introduction of the present work. The whole of it would have been more acceptable to those who have not read it. And if, in addition, the sketch of Madame Récamier which is one of Sainte-Beuve's "Causeries de Lundi" could have been well translated, our means of judging of this charming woman would be much more complete. The extracts from Sainte-Beuve's essay which the translator has given here and there are so discriminating that the reader will inevitably regret that more of the same sort is not given.

The present work is a translation of Madame Lenormant's "Souvenirs et Correspondance tirés des Papiers de Madame Récamier." Madame Lenormant was M. Récamier's niece and the adopted daughter of his wife. It was Mme. Récamier's desire that this lady should write her biography, and to this end she entrusted her with her papers. But Mme. Lenormant being devoid of literary skill, made poor work of her accepted task. It was published in Paris in 1859. Our translator tells us it was diffuse and ill-arranged and contained much that was totally irrelevant. These defects have been remedied as far as possible in the translation. No changes have been made except by way of rearrangement and omission. The original contained 453 letters; 384 are preserved in the translation, including all of Chateaubriand's. The most remarkable feature in the correspondence is that only seven letters are written by Mme. Récamier. None of these are to her dearest friends. The remainder are all addressed to her. It is not easy to determine why Mme. Récamier saw fit, while giving to the world the letters of her friends, to withhold carefully her own. That they were not unworthy of publication would appear from the encomiums awarded them by her friends, especially Mme. de Staël. “What a charm there is in your style,” she exclaims. “If I wanted to write a novel, wherein to portray a celestial being, it would be your expressions I should use, without changing a single line.” During the last years of her life she commenced writing her autobiography, but was obliged to discontinue it on account of her increasing blindness. Could she have completed it, it would no doubt have been a very graceful and entertaining story of her life.

[*] "Memoirs and Correspondence of Madame Récamier. Translated from the French and edited by Isaphene M. Luyster." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1867.

Mme. Récamier's life was made up of so many incidents that to be brief in making a report of it is to be superficial, but still we venture the attempt. At the age of fifteen she marries M. Récamier, a wealthy banker, aged 42. The relation between them was a strange one, to say the least. It was characterized by mutual kindness and respect, by parental fondness on his part, by filial regard on hers; so much so that the theory has been maintained that they were father and child—a theory which the memoirs abundantly refute. Given to hospitality, their house, under the Consulate and the Empire, is much frequented by such men as Bernadotte, Moreau, M. de La Harpe, Lucien Bonaparte, and others of much note. Lucien Bonaparte becomes deeply enamored of Mme. Récamier's beauty and writes her very wild and stupid protestations of his love, but meets with no response. Napoleon himself offers her a position at court, and because she will not accept it hates her very cordially and banishes her from Paris. A further excuse for his so doing is that her house is a resort for persons hostile to the government. Owing to Mme. Récamier's unpopularity with Napoleon, the government refuses to assist her husband in his business straits, and consequently his fortune suffers wreck. The change of circumstances following upon this is very nobly borne. During her banishment she visits Rome, and there Canova makes a bust of her without her knowledge, a proceeding which she does not like. Returning to Paris at the Restoration, she becomes acquainted with the Duke of Wellington, who writes notes to her in miserable French, and, thinking to please her, says of Napoleon: “I have given him a good beating.” When he comes again he is refused admittance; her national pride was stronger than her personal dislike. In the sick room of Mme. de Staël she makes the acquaintance of Chateaubriand, an acquaintance which shortly ripens into an intimacy that causes her more joy and more unhappiness than any other. For thirty years she is devoted to his happiness. His correspondence with her is unstinted in amount and affords an excellent opportunity for studying the inner life of this selfish, irritable, exacting man of most undoubted genius. A second reverse of fortune happening in 1819, Mme. Récamier leaves her husband and retires to the Abbaye-aux-Bois, and there, with brief exceptions, spends the remainder of her life. Here she gathers about her her best friends, and lives a life that would be quiet but that the vanity of M. Chateaubriand must be continually fed, and those who are disposed to feed it must be invited constantly to meet him. In 1826, Matthieu de Montmorency dies, and after that Chateaubriand more than ever has his own way. Soon after the death of his wife in 1847 he begs her to accept his name, but she refuses.

> “Why should we marry?” she said. “At our age there can be no impropriety in my taking care of you. If solitude is painful to you, I am ready to live in the same house with you. The world, I am certain, will do justice to the purity of our friendship, and sanction anything that will render the task—of making you in your old age happy and comfortable—more easy for me. If we were younger I should not hesitate, but accept with joy the right to consecrate my life to you. Years and blindness have given me this right. Let us change nothing in so perfect an affection.”

On the 4th of July, 1848, amid the thunders of another revolution, Chateaubriand dies, and Mme. Récamier is left lonely enough. She survives him less than a year. It is time for her to go. Her four best friends, Mme. de Staël, Montmorency, Ballanche, and Chateaubriand are gone already. She dies on the 11th of May. “By an exception,” which Mme. Lenormant cannot help regarding as a last favor of Heaven, “Mme. Récamier's features assumed in death a surprising beauty.” “Her expression was angelic and grave; she looked like a beautiful statue; there was no contraction, nor were there any wrinkles; and never has the majesty of the last sleep been attended with so much grace and sweetness. A sketch by Achilles Devéria has preserved the memory of this remarkable circumstance.”

Mme. Récamier counted among her friends a host of men and women of whose affection she was justly proud. Among these there were, besides those we have already mentioned, Benjamin Constant, Prince Augustus of Prussia, the Queen Hortense, Mme. Swetchine, and the wife of Murat. Of all her friendships that with Ballanche seems to us the least to be regretted. Matthieu de Montmorency's would have been nearly as beautiful, but Montmorency had a wife who could not have enjoyed the adoration lavished by her husband on another than herself. Chateaubriand's friendship was too grasping and imperative, and although it doubtless bettered him, it is far less beautiful than Ballanche's, which was always gentle and respectful, while it made constant demands on Mme. Récamier's fidelity not to himself, but to her own highest views of life and character. Of all her friendships the one least worthy of the name was that of which Augustus, Prince of Prussia, was the object. With a view of marrying this man, she wrote to her husband asking a divorce. But his feelings in the matter soon conquered her desire. With this exception, it was only friendship that this woman had to give. For this she had a genius. And she was always true to her friends; she never forsook them. It is a saying of Sainte-Beuve's that “she brought the art of friendship to perfection.”

Her power to influence men and women was indeed remarkable. Her beauty must have been almost miraculous, and was, doubtless, even to the last the means of her initiative stroke. But though beauty makes admirers, it is not sufficient to make friends. “What, then,” asks Miss Luyster, “was the secret of her influence?”

> “It lay in the subtle power of a marvellous tact. This tact had its roots deep in her nature. It was part and parcel of herself, the distinguishing trait in a rare combination of qualities. Though nurtured and ripened by experience, it was not the offspring of art. Her successes were the triumph of impulse rather than of design. In order to please, she did not study character; she divined it. Keenly alive to outward influences, and losing, in part, her own personality when coming in contact with that of others, she readily adapted herself to their moods; and her apprehension was quick if not profound.”

Mme. Récamier was not creative save in a very limited degree, but she was appreciative. Sainte-Beuve has told a great deal of her secret when he says she listened “avec séduction.” But to read these memoirs is to be convinced that still more credit for her power to fascinate and hold should go to her real kindness of heart and gentleness of disposition. She had wealth and beauty and grace, but above these, and including them, she had goodness. So it was that she could not help fascinating men and women. Her power was unavoidable. But it is very certain that not one woman in a thousand would have used it, on the whole, with more discretion and with less of foolish pride.

ENNIS ON THE ORIGIN OF THE STARS.[*]

THE author of this book has undertaken to explain the origin of the motions of the universe without having qualified himself for so great a task by so much as even making himself acquainted with one of the simplest and most elementary of the laws of motion. He may have read in the course of his somewhat extensive researches that “action and reaction are equal” in all the known causes of changes in motion; but he has signally failed to understand what this law of motion truly signifies. And of the more recondite mathematical deductions from this and the two other laws of motion he appears to be quite unconscious.

That the mutual actions by attraction, repulsion, collision, and friction between the parts of a body or a system of bodies cannot change the motion of the centre of gravity of the body or system, or change the average movements of revolution about this centre as measured by the description of areas; or, to take concrete examples—the facts that a body cannot be raised from the earth by any terrestial force without a depression of the earth by the same amount; that a body cannot be moved along the surface of the earth or around its centre of gravity without pushing the earth backwards by the same amount; that a railway train, whether moved by traction or by its own weight on a downward grade, cannot bring its freight to its destination without also turning the earth backwards by as many tons per mile; that a bird rises on the air only by forcing downward the air and the earth, and can only move forward by forcing the air backward by as many ounces per foot; that a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without raising the earth by an equal amount—these facts are elementary examples of laws of motion which, though we cannot presume the general reader to be familiar with them, ought to be known to any one who should undertake to discuss the mechanical problems of the “nebular hypothesis.” Yet the author of this book has attempted, in utter defiance of the laws of the “conservation of areas,” to account for the origin of the movements of revolution in the solar system and in sidereal systems as results of the mutual gravitation of the parts of the nebulous masses, which he does not hesitate to believe were the primitive forms of these systems. And he has done this not only in defiance of the elementary principles of motion, but also against the authority of all the best writers on the subject with whose judgments on this question he is acquainted. He appears to regard these judgments as mere opinions, or as confessions on the part of the writers of their own inability to account on the nebular hypothesis for the origination of these movements; and he therefore proposes by his contributions to remedy what he justly regards as a great deficiency in the hypothesis. But unluckily, instead of accomplishing what previous writers have failed to do, he has failed to see what previous writers have really accomplished, namely, the demonstration that the movements of revolution in the solar system could not have originated, as the author believes, in the interactions of the parts of the system, whatever may have been the original form of the system, and whatever the nature of forces of interaction, provided these have obeyed from the beginning the universal laws of motion.

[*] “The Origin of the Stars, and the Causes of their Motions and their Light. By Jacob Ennis.” New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1867. 12mo, pp. 385.

Nothing further, therefore, requires to be said about this part of our author's treatise. But this is not the only thesis on which he has opposed himself to the world of living scientific authority as well as to scientific demonstrations. He proposes to go backward and revive the antiquated doctrine that chemical action is the cause of the light and heat of the sun and the stars; and to this doctrine, and its various relations, he devotes the greater part of his volume.

As in his other doctrine he attempts to do away with an insurmountable defect in the nebular hypothesis, so here he proposes a theory in opposition to its only demonstrated sufficiency. Though gravity cannot account for the motions of revolution in a system of bodies, it is able to account for the light and heat of the heavier masses like the sun, and this by the strictest of physical demonstrations, in which nothing is hypothetical except what the author regards as established—the nebular genesis of the sun and the stars. Once grant the author's premise, the nebular hypothesis, and by the strictest reasonings on mechanical principles, as extended by recent researches in physics, it is shown that the falling forces of the matter of the contracting sun are sufficient, or at least vastly more competent than any known chemical action, to account for its light and heat. As he reasons in one of his theories in contravention of the principle of the “conservation of areas,” so in the other he is at issue with the principle of the “conservation of power,” a principle which, though not so universal in its applications to the phenomena of visible motion as the former, has become, by the extension given it in the modern “mechanical theory of heat,” of equal validity and extent.

Of this principle the author has at least learned the name, though it is evident he does not understand it. By a confusion of the two things expressed by the word force, namely, a tendency to produce or arrest motion, and the special conditions, including the tendency, by which the production or arrest of motion is rendered possible, our author has arrived at the conclusion, in opposition to the “law of power,” that “force may be annihilated.” The force of gravity is nullified, he thinks, when a body rests on the ground and is prevented by the earth's surface from falling further. But in this confusion our author does not stand alone. Several eminent physicists have failed to comprehend, on account of this ambiguity in the word force, the application of the “law of power” to the phenomena of gravity. The law that no “power” can be extinguished except by being replaced by an equivalent “power,” whether in the form of a motion or as a special new condition for the production of an equivalent motion, does not apply, it is true, to gravity as mere weight in a body and irrespective of the body's position. The position of the body, its height above the earth's surface, is a factor in the measure of the “force” of gravity, as the word is used in this law. In view of this ambiguity Dr. Mayer has proposed to limit the use of the word “force,” and to define gravity or the simple weight of bodies not as a “force” but as a “property” of matter; and he proposes the name “falling force” for the “forces” into which gravity enters as a factor, as in the “force” exhibited by a body when placed unsupported at a height above the ground. Not only the weight but the height of the body enters into the conception of “force” thus limited and defined. But, in spite of Dr. Mayer's clear exposition of this principle, our author has totally misconceived him. He says: “Mayer regards gravity as a property of matter, and not as one of the forces capable of conversion and reconversion.” In fact, Mayer proposes “falling force” as the name of the conditions for the production of motion into which gravity enters as a factor, and he does this simply to avoid an ambiguity of language, and not on account of any difficulty in the theory.

But the author says “the theory of the conservation of force is yet in its infancy.” He cannot, then, be aware that, so far as the relations of “falling forces” to the “living forces” of motion are concerned, the doctrine is almost as old as the theory of gravity; or that, by the recent extension of the doctrine to the force of heat, it is made equally extensive in all astronomical problems with the principles of the “conservation of the centre of gravity” and the “conservation of areas,” and is thus sufficiently mature to have inherited the problems which the author proposes to solve without its aid and in defiance of it. It is at least sufficiently mature in the minds of the most eminent modern physicists to discredit the “chemical theory,” which, in his ignorance of the doctrine, the author has attempted to revive.

SOUTHERN BOOKS BY SOUTHERN AUTHORS.[*]

AND of course “For Southern Readers” is implied. The words are used by Messrs. Blelock & Company at the head of a brief list of books which they publish. They publish “Ingemisco,” and no one who knows anything of the Southern literature of the past, and, for that matter, of the present, will be surprised to hear that we took up the novel without great expectations of pleasure or profit. We confess to an agreeable disappointment. There is, to be sure, one very reprehensible Yankee in it, whose feet are of enormous extent, who is extremely ill-mannered, who speaks through his nose and refers to the battle of Lexington; but he has nothing to do with the story and he fills but a very small space. We must not begrudge the Southern patriot who encourages literature something for his money, and we get off easily if we are made to swallow the Yankee alone. We might have had “the true Southern gentleman.” The Baroness Tautphœus has been the exemplar whom the authoress of “Ingemisco” has followed, and she has learned something of that admirable writer's charm. The scene of her story is Switzerland and Bavaria; her characters are a wealthy Scotch family with two human daughters, and certain foreigners, counts and peasants, whom they meet abroad; and the story tells how the high-spirited Margaret, betrothed to a good young gentleman whom she rather liked, fell in love with the Count Zalkiewski and was by him loved and married. Married against her will, however, for she had promised her father to marry his ward, and it is by the strong hand that the count carries her to church. He overbears her rather exasperating scrupulousness by offering her a choice between instant marriage and abduction. She chooses marriage, but warns her husband that she shall hate and despise him. She faithfully keeps her word, to all appearance at any rate. Aside from this fault he is a very fine fellow, and after months of unhappiness, of estrangement from her family and anger against her husband, affairs are arranged, her mother and sister come back to her, her husband breaks his arm, she nurses him, and all is well. There is much pleasant reading in the accounts, full of little details of Swiss and German life, of excursions which the party make in Switzerland and Bavaria; the love affairs of Margaret and Harry May and the Counts Zalkiewski and Falkenstein are very well managed; the people who talk and act are living people; the author's style is good, and in dialogue unusually good. The whole effect of the novel is healthful, cheerful, and every way pleasant. “Fadette” is not the Baroness Tautphœus; but a sweet sound is good and the echo of a sweet sound is good. On the whole, we hope we may have a successor to “Ingemisco.”

To point out the absurdities of “St. Elmo” will seem very much like trifling with the reader. But there are a good many people in the North who read Miss Evans's volumes. And in the South there is an enthusiastic man, a fellow-citizen of hers, who records his opinion, and his “section” would say amen, that in consideration of the fact that Miss Evans is a Mobilian, this unconstitutional and radical Congress should forthwith reconstruct the State of Alabama. This may be a reason for immediate reconstruction no better, or only a little better, than most other Southern reasons we have had; but it is plain that the critic ardently admires Miss Evans. “The Emathian conqueror bade spare the house of Pindarus”—so the classical precedent, dear to the heart of the Congressman, is not wanting in case any radical gentleman should feel moved to try the suggested “policy of conciliation and magnanimity.” This, however, by the way. In view of the two facts above-mentioned, it is probable that the authoress of “St. Elmo” is tolerably well armed against adverse criticism; they may serve, too, with our readers as an excuse for our spending a minute or two in pronouncing just condemnation of the novel.

We may say that Miss Evans's intentions are good. The idea at the bottom of her story is that a very cynical, sinful man, who has for nineteen years cast off all fear of God, who has accustomed himself to despising his fellow-creatures and treating them with contumely, may be made by the influence of his love for a noble woman a very good man. It is a subject with which, in all its aspects, a multitude of novels have made us wearily familiar, but it is the one selected by Miss Evans, and the credit must be allowed her of having selected a theme which, though threadbare, is noble. This being said, pretty much all is said that it is possible to say in her favor. What characters she has she steals and spoils. She fails in the invention of incidents probable or pleasing or adapted to the requirements of her plan. As for the thought in her book—"the sentiments," as the critics used to say—that surely need never have driven her into print. Unless one wishes to say that a moralist from Mobile has only a very provincial sort of morality to teach us, what can one say of an author who, in 1867, treats us to elaborate discourses on the sinfulness of duelling? But this is what Miss Evans does. She writes page after page of high moral indignation on this topic. Yes, she knows that the author who unsparingly lashes the sin of the duellist must look to be jeered at and hated by society; she well knows how fond society is of fighting duels; but she is prepared to perform the duty which genius owes its age—to brave the scorn of the world and bear testimony against vice. So in several places the duellist is called a murderer. It is funny, too, to read her scornful remarks on the fraternity of critics, and see the unsuspecting self-complacency with which she deals out the ancient commonplaces of abuse. We may as well speak here of another of her characteristics which does almost as much as anything else in her book to give the impression of crudity and ambitious feebleness—her way of lugging in, on every occasion, a mass of odds and ends of knowledge, some of it curious and some of it trite, and almost all of it, as she uses it, worse than useless. This she does of set purpose; she is at pains to defend the practice at length. Where she learned that it is the business of a novelist to disseminate rare or useful information we are not told, but that it is her business she seems fully convinced. And having decided on making use of bits of cyclopædias, apparently it violates none of her notions of verisimilitude to represent her characters as talking these scraps of erudition in ordinary conversation. Her lovers and frivolous young ladies and crippled children habitually make references—not allusions generally, but downright, laborious marginal-note references—to things of which the merest pedant would hardly make oral parade, unless he were lecturing. Mr. St. Elmo Murray, for instance, has offered Miss Edna Earl a most magnificent ring—a carved jacinth set in costly diamonds; Miss Earl declines the gift, and the reckless St. Elmo, regardless of expense, flings the jewel into the fire, where it is consumed while its owner, we are requested to believe, talks in this manner:

“St, Elmo. A Novel. By Augusta J. Evans.” New York: Carleton. 16mo, pp. 571.

> "Stand aside, if you please. Cleopatra quaffed liquid pearl in honor of Antony, Nero shivered his precious crystal goblets, and Suger pounded up sapphires to color the windows of old St. Denis! Chacun à son goût! If I choose to indulge myself in a diamond cremation in honor of my tutelary goddess Brimo, who has the right to expostulate? True, such costly amusements have been rare since the days of the 'Cyranides' and the 'Seven Seals' of Hermes Trismegistus. See what a tawny, angry glare leaps from my royal jacinth! Old Hecate holds high carnival down there in her congenial flames."

The same pair are talking together at another time, and they do it thus:

> "'Nineteen years ago, to satisfy my hunger, I set out to hunt the daintiest food this world could furnish, and, like other fools, have learned finally that life is but a huge mellow golden Osher, that mockingly sifts its bitter dust upon our eager lips. Ah! truly, on trouve au fond de tout le vide et le néant!'
> "'Mr. Murray, if you insist upon your bitter Osher simile, why shut your eyes to the palpable analogy suggested? Naturalists assert that the Solanum, or apple of Sodom, contains in its normal state neither dust nor ashes, unless it is punctured by an insect (the Tenthredo), which converts the whole of the inside into dust, leaving nothing but the rind entire, without any loss of color. Human life is as fair and tempting as the fruit of "Ain Jidy," till stung and poisoned by the Tenthredo of sin.'
> "All conceivable suaviter in modo characterized his mocking countenance and tone, as he inclined his haughty head and asked:
> "'Will you favor me by lifting on the point of your dissecting-knife this stinging sin of mine to which you refer? The noxious brood swarm so teasingly about my ears that they deprive me of your cool, clear, philosophic discrimination. Which particular Tenthredo of the buzzing swarm around my spoiled apple of life would you advise me to select for my anathema maranatha?'"

This St. Elmo Murray is Charlotte Brontë's Rochester so unblushingly stolen that we are in doubt whether or not to call the transfer theft. He is a very bad person. His brow is white, but the lower part of his stern face is bronzed with exposure. He has magnetic eyes. He has not been inside of a church for nearly twenty years, and "talks dreadful." One exquisite passage we must quote. It reveals the scathing power of St. Elmo's sarcasm, his sad spiritual condition, his intellectual brilliancy, and, finally, we get a glimpse of the vastness of his fund of information. His mother, let us say, has taken the orphan Edna Earl into her house, and intends to educate the child. St. Elmo speaks in deep, strong, bitter tones:

> "'With your knowledge of this precious world and its holy crew, I confess it seems farcical in the extreme that open-eyed you can venture another experiment on human nature. Some fine morning you will rub your eyes and find your acolyte non est; ditto, your silver forks, diamonds, and gold spoons.'
> "Edna felt the indignant blood burning in her cheeks, and as she could not walk without assistance, and shrank from listening to a conversation which was not intended for her ears, she coughed several times to arrest the attention of the speakers, but apparently without effect, for the son's voice again rose above the low tones of the mother.
> "'O carnival of shams! She is "pious," you say? Then, I'll swear my watch is not safe in my pocket, and I shall sleep with the key of my cameo cabinet tied around my neck. A Paris police would not ensure your valuables or mine. The fates forbid that your pen-feathered saint should decamp with some of my costly travel-scrapings! "Pious," indeed! "Edna," forsooth! No doubt her origin and morals are quite as apocryphal as her name. Don't talk to me about "her being providentially thrown into your hands," unless you desire to hear me say things which you have frequently taken occasion to inform me "deeply grieved" you. I dare say the little vagrant whines in what she considers orthodox phraseology, that "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb!" and, like some other pious people whom I have heard canting, will saddle some Jewish prophet or fisherman with the dictum, thinking that it sounds like the Bible, whereas Sterne said it. Shorn lamb, forsooth! We, or rather you, madame ma mere, will be shorn—thoroughly fleeced! Pious! Ha! ha! ha!'"

This gentleman's physical strength is great, his wealth is boundless; he has roamed all over the world; he despises the conventionalities of society; he is "quite the gentleman" when he likes, and is particularly clever at a profound, perfectly polite, but mocking bow, which he alone can do. In short, he is a very stupid copy of Rochester; and we fear the patience of our readers is exhausted by this long account of him. We may be permitted, however, to add that at the age of forty the tiger becomes a lamb, and is ordained a minister of the Gospel. We do not intend to say much of Edna Earl. She is a creature not to be suffered. The disagreeable hero is, in a sense, amusing; but the heroine carries to the third or fourth power a capacity which she has in common with every character in every book this author ever wrote—the capacity, namely, of making every reader of average sense and average temper very cordially detest her as a thoroughly uncomfortable person. One is amused with St. Elmo as with a caricature, but Edna Earl is a combination, with a woman's name, of pedantry and priggishness in the abstract, and one cannot laugh at that. She barely suggests Jane Eyre. The other personages of the story are, some of them, little better, and some of them not in the least better, than names.

Altogether, "St. Elmo" is the heaviest novel and the least weighty that we have read since we read "Macaria." Indeed, we only tried to read "Macaria."

Religious Poems. By Harriet Beecher Stowe. With illustrations. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867.)—These poems will doubtless soothe the sorrow of many suffering bereavement, or help many to be good, and their publication is therefore justified. With few exceptions, however, the verses are to be styled poetry only by courtesy or in virtue of that classification which accords the name to all compositions in rhyme. But there is some pleasing imagery to be found here and there, and we find one picture, not however carefully painted, that is fine, and in part new. The legendary Saint Catherine, unbound from the wheel, is borne by angels over the sea:

> "The restless bosom of the surging ocean
> Gives back the image as the cloud floats o'er,
> Hushing in glassy awe his troubled motion;
> For one blest moment he complains no more.
> "Like the transparent golden floor of heaven,
> His charmed waters lie as in a dream,
> And glistening wings and starry robes unfolding,
> And serious angel eyes far downward gleam."

A Rosary for Lent; or, Devotional Readings. Original and compiled, by the author of "Rutledge." (New York: Carleton & Co. London: S. Low, Son & Co.)—For those who like to have a certain track laid down for them, and to be held to that, this volume will be no unwelcome visitant. It is, of course, a track; but it has been laid down through pleasant sections of the country, where the views on every side are very beautiful. Not but that some of the beads that constitute this rosary are rather lustreless, but the most of them have been selected with much taste and carefulness. The various themes fitly illustrate the various periods in Lent. The selections are made from a wide range of authorship. It is intended for the use of persons in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Some of these will, no doubt, like it very much; but others will be satisfied with the amount of form contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and for the remainder of their reading will prefer something more continuous of such sort as their private tastes may justify. The exercise of judgment and discrimination that would thus be rendered necessary, would be no mean observance of the holy time.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

THE bill providing the machinery for carrying out the Reconstruction bill of the last Congress has just passed the House, with an amendment touching the proportion of the registered electors which shall be necessary to elect the conventions, and, unless the Senate should agree, the final passage of the bill will be delayed by a conference. Its provisions are such as we described in our last number, and no debate of importance took place on any of them in either the House or Senate. Mr. Howard made a strong effort to make improvements on the oath to be administered to persons voting for the delegates to the constitutional conventions, by requiring them to swear that they were "sincerely attached to the Constitution of the United States"—a provision which of course would simply have furnished one more temptation to commit perjury, without making the least addition to the security of the Constitution. As a general and sound rule, no man should ever be legally required to swear or affirm anything as a test of fitness for any office, or for the exercise of any franchise, unless there exists some means of proving him guilty of perjury in case he breaks his oath, or rather of knowing whether he ever breaks his oath or not. If a man promises, on oath, to support the Constitution of the United States, he fulfils his promise by being a decent citizen and letting the Constitution alone. "Supporting" a constitution consists in living quietly under it, and refusing to join in or actively opposing attempts to overthrow it. Therefore, when a man has sworn true allegiance to one, all his neighbors have the means of detecting him at once in case he breaks his oath. But when, as Mr. Sumner proposed the other day, you make a man swear to "support the diffusion of knowledge," you have no means of knowing whether he has kept his oath or not, because no definition of "support to the diffusion of knowledge" could possibly be fixed upon that would be satisfactory. A person may "support" the diffusion of knowledge by giving a small boy a primer, or by saying occasionally in his family circle that education improves the mind, and that knowledge is power; but it would always be impossible to find out whether he had even done this or not. So also, when you ask a man to swear that he is "sincerely attached" to the Constitution, you exact an affirmation of which you cannot either detect or punish the falsehood. If he is a loyal man, and really attached to the Constitution, his telling us on oath that he is will not make him one whit more so; if he is not a loyal man, he may take the oath as often as he chooses, and cannot be punished for taking it falsely. In the Middle Ages oaths were administered very lavishly, because it was generally believed that something dreadful would happen by a special act of Providence to people who swore falsely. We do not expect anything of the kind. We rely, it is true, for the sanctity of an oath on the dread of future punishment on the part of the person taking it, but only in a very small degree, because we know, as a matter of fact, that men's conduct is influenced only very slightly, as regards the grosser offences against morality, by the fear of penalties to be inflicted in the next world. Our main reliance is on the penalties inflicted by the courts in this world, and we owe it to the cause of public morality not to administer oaths, on a great scale, in cases in which those who take them know that they are, if they commit perjury, safe from human justice at least.

It may be suggested that we are wasting words on this matter, inasmuch as the amendment was not adopted; but nobody who sees the extent to which some of our radical friends in Congress are disposed to rely on test oaths for the safety of this Government at the South, can help feeling that attention ought to be called by somebody to the teachings of experience and of common sense on this point. Many attempts have been made in the Old World to bolster up institutions of all kinds, political, ecclesiastical, and social, by oaths, and they have all failed. In all countries in which this plan of securing stability or safety has been resorted to, it is being abandoned in despair after having caused an enormous amount of perjury, and made the offence seem a mere peccadillo in the eyes of the public. For us to resort to it at this day is worse than ridiculous. As we have said before, it may be, and we believe it is, proper to exclude at present from participation in the government all those who have, during the last five years, borne a prominent part in the attempt to overthrow it; but it is not desirable to exclude those who are simply not "sincerely attached to it." Our duty and interest are to make them sincerely attached to it by every means in our power, to convince them of its benefits, to interest them in its preservation. Oaths will not do this; but oaths wantonly and unnecessarily imposed may make men hate it and want to get rid of it. The oath is a capital instrument for the exclusion from a share in the government at present, or always, of persons who have taken a certain part in the rebellion, but as a guarantee for anybody's future good behavior, or for the present state of anybody's heart, it is worse than worthless.

Mr. Sumner moved one amendment, towards the close of the debate in the Senate, which was lost by a tie vote, "that the constitution of each State shall require the establishment and maintenance of a system of common schools, open to all without regard to color." No debate appears to have taken place on this, so that we are left in ignorance of the objections of those who voted against it. But whatever they were, we cannot but regard its failure as a great misfortune. No other opportunity may ever offer itself of overcoming that dislike or want of appreciation of popular education which has all along been the curse of the South, and which, like some other Southern defects, will not, in our opinion, disappear for many a day, without some pressure or interference from without. There may be objections to insisting that the public schools shall admit children of both colors indiscriminately, for this would probably result either in the forcible exclusion of the colored children from all schools, or the non-attendance of the white children. In trying to elevate or improve ignorant or prejudiced men and women, we have to take them as they are, with all their imperfections on their heads, and if they will not start on our road, we must be content to go a little way with them on theirs. We should prefer seeing separate schools for each color established at the South, to seeing schools for both colors which only one attended, or seeing none for either. The great object to be attained is education; the color prejudice will only be extirpated by the spread of knowledge and of Christianity.

But of the vast and overwhelming importance of starting some general system of popular education at the South now, and of making it an essential feature of any reconstruction plan, there can be no doubt. We have no hesitation in pronouncing the question of excluding rebels from the polls to be of a very inferior degree of importance, though it is the only thing to which most of the majority in Congress seem to give much attention. We do not hesitate to confess, once more, that we are of the number of those who think the doctrine that nothing but the common sense of an ignorant man is needed to enable him to use the ballot rightly, and that the ballot is in itself a sufficient educator or enlightener of ignorant men, or that it may not and does not prove very frequently in their hands an instrument of their own spoliation and degradation, to be a dangerous and pernicious heresy, opposed to the whole theory of democratic government, and to the principles on which the social system of the free States has been based ever since the settlement of the country. It is a doctrine imported by Southern slaveholders from English Tory manor-houses, and preached at the South through long years in the interest of slavery; and we consider its adoption by Northern preachers and politicians, under the influence of the present political excitement, as a ready means of hastening a political triumph, to be something which all intelligent and patriotic men ought to deplore and fight against. Nevertheless, even if Congress will exact no pledge from the South on this point, although it is exacting so many others, all is not lost. As long as the Government supplies protection, both Southern whites and Southern negroes can be educated. The volunteer organizations of the North are doing a great work in this field already, and if the people will only sustain the Freedmen's Associations in the support and diffusion of their schools, we think we can promise that test oaths will, in a very few years, be of little consequence, and that the National Government will be surrounded by other and better bulwarks.

"REPORTS" OF CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES.

THE resources of demagogues may be said to be for all practical purposes inexhaustible. There is hardly a hope, aspiration, desire, fear, or weakness in the human heart, hardly an incident in the national life, which they do not turn to account. And their ways of turning them to account are, of course, almost infinitely varied. To the working-men they boast of having been themselves working-men, and ask to have the hardness of their palms examined; to the poor they present reminiscences of their own poverty, past or present; exhibit the red pocket-handkerchief in which they tied up their worldly goods on their first journey, and mention the exact sum they borrowed to get a suit of clothes to fit them for their first situation in a store, and profess the greatest horror of wealth or a kind of honest scorn for rich men. As they are hardly ever farmers themselves—the farming mind being a little too staid and simple for these gymnastics—so to the farmers they boast of having been born on a farm, with as much confidence as if they had chosen their own birthday and birthplace under the influence of a fondness for the country and for agricultural pursuits. But then most of this work has to be done in stump speeches—a species of oratorical exercise which is, unfortunately, falling every day into greater and greater disrepute. The party newspapers pretend, in a fond, foolish way, to believe that whatever a politician says on a platform his hearers believe every word of, and go home and laugh and ponder over it; but then the rest of the world knows they do not. They go home and criticise and cavil, pick out what was worth anything and then throw the trash away—a fact which accounts for the gradual dying out of the once famous Fourth of July oration, and the growing sobriety which characterizes the public performances even of that "chartered libertine," the "rising and gifted young lawyer" of the country town. The spread of education—we do not mean of the mere art of reading and writing, but of that maturity of judgment and severity of taste which grow in nations, as in individuals, as they get older and stronger—is, in fact, making the "stump" every year a less elevated and less authoritative platform. People form their opinions, at the North at least, and they will soon form them at the South, mainly from reading, and written balderdash can never produce the same effect as spoken balderdash. Nobody will venture to put on paper such stuff as orators very often have no hesitation in talking, for the simple reason that a man reads calmly by his fireside, and weighs every sentence as carefully as his powers will allow as he goes along, while at a meeting he listens in a crowd to a rapid flow of words, and in a state of excitement which makes reflection for the moment impossible.

The demagogues are, therefore, beginning to find the "stump" a failing instrument; the newspaper does not meet their wants, as it is rarely under their control; even the Congressional speech, let it be distributed ever so widely in print, is but a feeble mode of expression. Few listen to it when delivered; fewer still read it, and the coarse pamphlets in which it is now circulated to constituents have come to be rather a mark of civility on the part of the member, like the cards which people send round in Paris by their lackeys, than a means of spreading opinions.

Something had, therefore, to be found which would secure more attention than the mere expression, whether oral or written, of individual sentiments, and which would, nevertheless, tend really to individual glorification—and this thing has been found, or is supposed to have been found, in "reports" of Congressional committees. The process is a very simple one. A bill—or set of resolutions—is introduced for the mere purpose of getting it "referred," and with the full certainty that it will never come to anything. But it is not intended it should ever develop into a law; what is wanted is to make it the text of remarks in the shape of "a report," by an ambitious committeeman who has "an axe to grind," a sect or party or "interest" to conciliate, or who has a damaged "record" to furbish up before the next election. The "report" rarely contains anything but his own private and individual nonsense. The rest of the committee, understanding the matter thoroughly, do not trouble him with their sentiments, and often he does not take the trouble of consulting them; so he says what he pleases, and his composition goes forth to the country with the authority of the committee, whom the country people fondly believe to have gravely studied the whole question, and sat up at night combining their views upon it; but, nevertheless, with his name associated most prominently with it. The device has worked so well hitherto, owing to its novelty, that, as might be expected, it is coming more and more into use. In the last Congress it did good service; in this Congress it promises to do better. In the present session it is very generally believed that no important measures are likely to be taken up, except the Supplemental Reconstruction bill; but, nevertheless, the committees have been nearly all appointed in order to set the reporting machine at work, and the amount of raw buncombe which is at this moment in the mill will astonish the country when it makes its appearance in the whole cloth.

The cause which is most stimulating the "reporting" mania is the rapid growth all over the country of sets or classes of people, apart from the regular political parties, commanding large numbers of votes, and acting in disciplined concert under the influence of motives in which the rest of the community does not share. This phenomenon is a new one in American politics, but we greatly fear we are only as yet witnessing its small beginnings. One of the most prominent of these classes is the Fenians, a body which takes little or no interest in American politics, gives little or no attention to them, and whose sole aim in exercising any influence at all on the Government of this country is to involve it in a foreign war for the decision of a question of foreign politics. Another of these classes is the "Working-men," meaning thereby those who work with their hands for wages. This class, which is also of recent origin, is gradually dissociating itself more and more from the ordinary political parties, withdrawing its own interest in the great political questions of the day, and using its combined strength for the sole purpose of securing legislative interference with a particular kind of bargains between individuals. It is only recently that we have begun to hear of "working-men," as a class apart, needing special legislation for their benefit or protection. A few years ago all Americans were supposed to be "working-men," whose proud privilege it was to be able to make their own way in the world, frame their own contracts, take their turn, no matter about the nature of their occupation, in the work of government, while asking nothing from the law but protection for life and limb and property. Now we are told that nobody is a "working-man" but a mechanic, and that his position is that of "a child" of the state, like that of the French workman, and that his hours of labor must be fixed for him by law lest he should hurt himself.

Another class which has grown up within a year or two is that of the "Soldiers and Sailors." They too are forming themselves into a political organization apart from the rest of the nation, and are trying to persuade themselves that they have also separate interests, which will warrant them in pursuing a separate line of political action, and that all they can get out of the national Treasury for their separate use and behoof will be so much clear gain, no matter what effect it may produce on the national credit or the national industry.

We need hardly say that the claims of these classes have begun to keep both the regular demagogues and the regular drafters of resolutions at party conventions pretty busy. It requires now almost as much skill and ingenuity to draw one of these documents as to draw an impregnable will. The Fenians, the "Working-men," the Soldiers and Sailors, have in the first place to receive each an appropriate plaster which will make the patient feel comfortable, and yet will not promise more than the doctor knows he can perform. Then come the temperance men and the anti-temperance men, the protectionists and free-traders, and other nebulous bodies which hang outside the consolidated organizations, and which, though not concentrated enough to do much damage, it is desirable to keep in a state of hopeful uncertainty. Other bodies of a similar character are making their appearance on our horizon—the negroes, for example, and the Chinese. The negroes have not as yet been courted for their own sake. Whatever respect or affection the regular political hacks have as yet professed for them has been due to a desire to curry favor with the great party which has within the last ten years devoted itself to the assertion of the equality of all men before the law. But now that the negroes are to vote, we may feel sure that the business of making Congressional "reports" to flatter their prejudices or self-love or in furtherance of their peculiar interests will be eagerly taken up. And we are bound to say that a more fruitful field has not yet been opened to an industrious and aspiring demagogue. In the first place, he will find in it an opportunity for the airing of what in Congress is called "his lore," such as he may seek in vain in Fenianism. His Plutarch and his classical dictionary will furnish him with abundant materials for the loftiest and most poetic speculations touching the early history of the negro race, in which Dido and the Carthaginians may be made to play a dazzling part, and which may profitably occupy one half of the report. Another attraction of this field is that its soil is virgin; its tropical luxuriance has never yet been disturbed by axe or plough. The first reporter on negro claims will be its first explorer, and if he does not make a good thing of it he will have himself to blame. We hope the colored voters of the South are fully prepared for what is coming, for if we are not greatly mistaken they will find friends in quarters in which they have never thought of looking for them, and from which they have received hitherto nothing but sneers or curses.

ART AT THE CAPITAL.

Within a short time two new propositions have been made for the purchase of works of art for the National Capitol. Two appropriations for a similar purpose were made at the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, and one remains in an uncertain state. Some of these would probably procure for the nation worthy work, but some, most probably, would not. But of the complete want of system or of intelligence displayed in the giving of orders for pictures or statues we propose to say a few words. If we look at any branch of the fine arts, as sculpture, for example, we must see the many difficulties which lie in the way of its acquirement. The intimate knowledge of form and structure; of the effects of light and shade; of the properties of the material in which the work is to be executed—the varying effects of the clay, the plaster, the marble, or the bronze—all these absolutely necessary to the successful execution of a work of sculpture, or, mutatis mutandis, any other work of art, are such as require years, nay, a lifetime, of study for their acquirement. And further, all this knowledge, though perhaps in a less degree, or rather in a different way, is just as necessary to a proper appreciation of a work as to its execution. And knowing this, knowing how few must be those who attain to knowledge and power in art, might we not expect that in the execution of a public work, whether monumental or of ornament, that artist should be employed who has shown his abilities in former work, and who, by his long study of his art, its laws and practice, has fairly earned his title of artist? Unfortunately this is not always, is indeed too seldom, the case. While the artist is at work in his studio, faithful to the art to which he has consecrated his life, he who calls himself an artist, perhaps on no other warrant than the construction of a few childish models, or of a tombstone in a Western cemetery, is at work in the lobby; and whoever shall prove himself (or herself) possessed of the most winning tongue, to him we may generally conclude will the "job" be awarded. It does not seem to occur to the honorable gentlemen that the mere styling of one's self artist does not of necessity imply ability to execute a work of art, or that in the execution of a public trust they are under any obligation to exercise that caution, or to look for that surety of accomplishment which would be required in any ordinary business transaction. We could almost prefer the awarding of the contract to the lowest bidder, which would have, at least, the merit of economy—a merit certainly not possessed by the prevailing system of Government commissions. There are, indeed, some few works of art at Washington worthy of their places; but it can hardly be denied that what we have said is, in most instances, true, as may be illustrated by a case which came before Congress not long ago.

But we should first allude to a more recent instance in which one House made an effort to award a commission deservedly. A resolution passed the House of Representatives, authorizing the Secretary of War to contract with Henry K. Brown for a statue of General Scott, to be erected at West Point. This was eminently proper; it was fit that the nation should honor the memory of the departed leader, and Mr. Brown had shown himself capable, as no one else in the country had, to execute the work. But mark the fate of the bill in the Senate: referred to the Military Committee, it is returned to the Senate with the name of H. K. Brown stricken out. This action, which disappointed every one who felt an interest in American art, and in the worthy execution of a public commission, would have been somewhat difficult to comprehend did not a previous action of Congress cast an unpleasant suspicion on the object of the Senate's amendment. We allude to the "Vinnie Ream contract"—an act in itself, and in the remarks which it called forth from several senators, most disgraceful to the culture, or supposed culture, and education of the United States Senate.

This, it will be remembered, is a bill which passed both Houses of Congress last July, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to contract with Vinnie Ream for a statue of Mr. Lincoln, to be erected in the Capitol, at a cost of $10,000. Now, Vinnie Ream is a young girl of sixteen, the daughter of a department clerk, who has never, upon the showing of her friends, executed a work of sculpture of any kind except some few models, including, we believe, a bust of Mr. Lincoln. But Miss R. is "an untutored child of the West," and is, therefore, entitled to construct, for the country's Capitol, a statue of the country's hero. It mattered not that she had never shown any evidence of her ability to construct such a work as it was proposed to commit to her; that the probabilities, nay, the possibilities, were most evidently against such ability; the axe had been well ground, and the lobby triumphed over the life-school.

We have taken this case, and it is the more marked in comparison with the other bill we have spoken of, as affording a notable example of the system, or want of system, pursued in procuring works of art by Government. Other bills passed by the last Congress were quite as reckless. The ignorance displayed by honorable senators in the debate upon this bill was most astounding, and would have been ludicrous had it not been so saddening. What, it may be asked, is to be hoped for art in a nation whose highest representatives can speak, as did Mr. Nesmith, of Oregon, in reply to Mr. Sumner? "Mr. President, if this was a mere matter of research, I should be very much inclined to defer to the judgment of the senator from Massachusetts; but as it is not, and as it requires no great learning, no particular devotion to reading, to discover what is an exact imitation of nature, I claim that my judgment on such a subject is as good as his own. My mind has never been perverted by the extensive reading which the gentleman from Massachusetts has had, or by that vast amount of lore in which he is so accomplished, but I claim to be equally as good a judge as he is of any mere matter of art which is an imitation of a natural object." There is an effrontery about this truly magnificent; an utter ignoring of the fact, which we should think scarcely needed demonstration, that a knowledge of art is to be acquired only by study and observation, just as a knowledge of any other branch of learning. Just as well, surely, might Mr. Nesmith claim to be naturally an entirely competent judge of music or of Greek prosody. A knowledge of art and its laws is not to be required of members of Congress. It may be a question whether or no the "condition of the senator from Massachusetts," which seems so irritating a thorn in the sides of many members, be necessary to the faithful fulfilment of their trusts, though we are inclined to think that it might do no harm even to the worthy senator from Oregon; but we are not disposed to ask of them an intimate acquaintance with art. We do ask, however, that they should acknowledge the fact that there may be others in the land, men whose lives have been devoted to the study of art, who are more competent to judge in this department than they, and to whom the purchase of works of art, and the adornment of the public buildings, might well be committed, that the public money may not be squandered in works which can be but an eyesore to all cultivated persons, and whose only tendency must be to depress the public taste.

This is no new suggestion; eight years ago, Congress, yielding to the memorials of men of culture throughout the country, established the United States Art Commission; but in the following session the Commission was abolished—actually before it had come into operation—and for no other conceivable reason than that it took from members of Congress he power of foolishly expending the public money. It is but necessary to go into any of the public buildings at Washington to recognize at once all that has been said of the grievous want of knowledge in the employment of art. The vast sums of money expended in the ornamentation of dark corridors, and in the purchase of poor figures and paintings, and of flash furniture, out of all accord with the architecture amid which it is placed, must most painfully impress every one, whether as a man of taste or as a tax-payer.

If we believe at all in art, if we hold it of any importance that our public works should be other than museums of monstrosities, we must most urgently demand of Congress to stop these worse than useless expenditures of the nation's revenue. We can hardly over-estimate the importance of art in public places; but it is sinful thus to throw away money upon what are but disfigurements, to be tolerated only till a more cultured generation shall remove them. And even if everything obtained were good, how manifestly false thus to leave it all to chance; to place a picture here, a statue there, without reference to any general plan, and with no surety of accordance. We urge the subject upon the consideration of Congress.

PARIS GOSSIP.

THE Empress, who last winter set an example of greater sobriety of toilette, has come out very "strong" in that line this winter. Her dresses at the three state balls already given have been extremely elegant, though not nearly so costly as the wonderful toilettes which used to astound an admiring crowd during the early years of her Imperial dignities; and the additional splendor imparted to her appearance by a freer use of the magnificent crown jewels makes her, of course, the most brilliant object to be seen at the great fêtes of the Tuileries. At the ball of last week she wore a tiara of diamonds, in the centre of which was the famous "Regent," one of the finest known diamonds, weighing over 136 carats, of the most exquisite water, and absolutely without a flaw. Around this blazing centre were a number of wheat-ears composed of that rarest and most costly of all gems, the black diamond, the effect of which was as splendid as original. The toilettes of many of the great ladies of the court and of the fashionable world were also unusually splendid, and the display of jewelry particularly brilliant. Both the Imperial hosts, who always show to so much advantage when dispensing the magnificent hospitalities of their home, were even more amiable and animated than usual. The state of Europe in general, and the rapid and successful progress of the preparations for the Exhibition in particular, seem to have put the Emperor into an unusually bland and benignant frame of mind, as attested by all who have the privilege of approaching the "august" personality of the modern sphinx. His health, too, has rallied wonderfully during the autumn, and though he cannot be said to be growing younger, his appearance indicates a very fair chance of his outliving a good many of those who have been most busy in consigning him to the attentions of the "Company of Funereal Pomps." The Empress, who is intending to give a great masked and fancy ball, was heard to remark that if the project were carried out the costumes would be rigorously confined to the reign of Henri II., especially rich in the variety and picturesqueness of its costumes. The epoch of the Renaissance was distinguished by a development of the arts of the toilette quite as marked as that which it witnessed in the departments of painting and architecture; the head-dresses of the women, especially, being among the most graceful and becoming ever invented. The style since known as la Ferronnière dates from that period, as do so many other modes of dressing and ornamenting the female head which we are in the habit of admiring in the chefs-d'œuvres of the painters of that time, but which are not seen out of the gilded frames of picture galleries. One of the most elegant of the head-dresses of the period in question consisted of a band of diamonds that held up the hair from the forehead and neck, and fastened over the left ear with a large rosette of pearls and rubies; another style, adopted by nearly all the leading beauties of the day, consisted of a broad ribbon, beneath which the "front hair," carefully smoothed, was passed in broad shining bands; this ribbon, which fell nearly to the shoulders, serving as the point d'appui of a veil of the rich delicate lace of those days, no longer known to the bobbins of lace-workers, which was gathered at one end into a golden tulip set with precious stones and fell over the side of the head, producing an effect which, though it would hardly be in keeping with the surroundings of ordinary drawing-rooms, was very charming when seen among the stately grandeurs of the court in the days of the second Henri. All those whose position entitles them to expect an invitation to this ball—which, if it take place, will be the most splendid affair of the season—are already busy with musty old chronicles, which they are carefully consulting for the details of the costumes to be prepared for the occasion.

Among the other splendid dissipations for which the gay world is busily preparing is the grand fancy ball to be given next week by one of the rich Pereire family, and for which eight hundred invitations have already been issued. Among the other "characters" getting ready for this ball is a cock, which is to be one of the features of the gathering. This appropriate emblem of the crowing of Gallic vanity will carry attached to its waist a basket shaped like a nest and filled with eggs, which will be offered to the ladies, and which will contain fortune-tellers' predictions, witticisms, or scraps of the cock's memoirs, each being maliciously contrived with special reference to the fair recipient to whom it is destined.

The newly-awakened but rapidly-developed passion of the Parisians for the imitations of Anglo-Saxon lectures, for which, after trying and rejecting various other designations, they have now adopted that of "conferences," seems to have extended itself to the Imperial circle. A few weeks ago, M. Leverrier, the director of the Paris Observatory, where he has inaugurated a series of lectures on astronomy and kindred scientific subjects, had the honor of holding forth, in presence of the Imperial family and the court, on the matters to which he has devoted his life; and last week the Abbé Moigno—a very clever ex-priest, widely informed though perhaps not very profound, who has devoted his energies for several years past to making money by what he calls "the popularization of science"—was sent for, with two or three other special scientific lights, to give a conférence in presence of the same brilliant circle, increased by about thirty other persons, specially invited by the Emperor. Electricity was the subject to which the evening was to be mainly devoted, and the most perfect apparatus being provided for the illustration of that pregnant theme, the lecture seems to have excited the greatest interest on the part of the audience. Some of the experiments, conducted with the aid of the most skilful electricians of the capital, and illustrating the latest developments of which the wonderful fluid has been found susceptible, interested the Emperor so much that he left his chair and took up his place at the table. The Empress followed his example, and the little Prince, who had evidently been longing to get close to the wonder-working apparatus, immediately took his place at the side of his father, testifying so eager an interest in what was going on that the Emperor was repeatedly obliged to hold him back, as the apparatus was exceedingly powerful and might easily have done mischief. Forked lightnings a foot in length, a mimic sun, so intensely luminous that it could not be steadily looked at, and a bright coruscation, resembling an aurora borealis, but with the words Vive l'Empereur Napoléon III. distinctly visible in the middle of it, were among the marvels displayed to the circle. On the conclusion of the abbé's address most of the party underwent shocks of more or less intensity; ministers, marshals, dukes, duchesses, and princesses starting, screaming, laughing, as is the wont of humanity when brought in contact with the "buttons" of an electrical machine. Experiments with the magnesian light, etc., wound up the demonstration; the Emperor and Empress conversing freely with the abbé and the other operators, complimenting them on the skill they had displayed, and assuring them of the pleasure which the evening's demonstrations had given them.

The dulness and inanity of courtly circles in past days, when the rigidity of etiquette and the ignorance of princes and courtiers concurred to reduce the fêtes of the court for the most part to a mere exhibition of stupid splendor, seem decidedly to be giving way to something better. Thus the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia—the former a sensible, highly-educated man, the latter not only most carefully educated but highly accomplished, and a thorough artist in feeling and cultivation—have just given, in honor of the betrothal of the Count of Flanders with a princess of their house, a most charming entertainment, of which the principal feature was the representation of Schiller's "Lay of the Bell," in a series of exquisitely-managed tableaux vivants, given with the aid of the handsomest women of the court and the men of the same circle whose physique rendered them the most fit to impersonate the descriptions of the poet.

To say nothing of the golden harvests being reaped by Patti and Nilsson at the soirées of wealthy entertainers, who give to those favorite warblers the pretty little payment of one hundred guineas per night, Mademoiselle Vandermeersch and her wonderful birds, and M. Lemercier de Neuville, with his equally wonderful puppets, are in such favor here at the present time that no soirée is reckoned as a "success" unless one or other of those artists be present. Even the astounding feats of Alfred de Caston are just now overshadowed by the furore excited by those successful candidates for public favor.

Several grand weddings, with the displays of magnificent trousseaux incident to such events, have given scope for much of the gossip so intensely enjoyed by the Parisians; the most noteworthy of them all being, perhaps, that of one of the noblest of the seventy-odd dukes of France, who, having run through the whole of his princely fortune, has just married the daughter and heiress of rich trades-people bent on being "Madame la Duchesse," and whose parents, sympathizing in the "noble" ambition their only child, were willing to purchase that glorious whistle by settling on their ducal son-in-law the sum of seventy-five thousand francs a year for his lifetime. The wedding accordingly took place with the usual formalities and accompaniments; but the bridegroom disappeared immediately after the conclusion of the ceremony, leaving a letter for the "duchess," which, on opening, she found to run as follows:

> "MADAME: You wished to be a duchess, and married me to obtain that title. I was penniless, and married you to repair my finances. There has been no pretence of affection on either side. Let us, therefore, leave one another free to live as each pleases. Enjoy your rank as duchess as freely as I shall enjoy the spending of the income secured to me by our marriage contract, and leave me as entirely at liberty to lead the life that pleases me as I leave you to shape your existence according to your own pleasure."

The family of the bride left to this novel species of widowhood in so unceremonious a style is about to institute proceedings with a view to obtain not a divorce, which is unknown to French law, but a declaration of "nullity of marriage," which is admitted by the Code Napoléon.

The preparations for the Exhibition are going on upon a scale that is perfectly colossal. Leaving out of sight the wonders that are being made ready in the interior of the vast, ugly building, that looks like Brobdingnagian gas-works, the mere enumeration of the annexes, with their workshops, where all nations will be represented; their dining-halls, where every variety of the world's cuisines is to be exemplified, and some of which contain 400 tables and 1,000 chairs; of the post-office, which will distribute letters seven times a day, with the aid of 300 employees, speaking all tongues that boast a grammar and dictionary; and their clubs, baths, and concerts, would require at least a dozen letters. The Emperor has determined to have a square on the high ground opposite, commanding a view of the exhibition ground; a series of concerts "exhibiting" the works of living composers, and a "competition" of poems in honor of the Exhibition and of peace, all with a tempting array of prizes. Rossini has just composed a "Cantata de l'Exposition," which is said to be a chef-d'œuvre, and which has just been rehearsed in presence of the maestro by the military bands who are to execute it, and by whom he was received with immense enthusiasm.
